Jehoiachin king of Judah, having revolted against Nebuchadnezzar, this prince besieged him in Jerusalem, and forced him to surrender. Nebuchadnezzar took him, with his chief officers, captive to Babylon, with his mother, his wives, and the best workmen of Jerusalem, to the number of ten thousand men. Among the captives were Mordecai, the uncle of Esther, and Ezekiel the prophet. He took also all the vessels of gold which Solomon made for the temple, and the king's treasury; and he set up Mattaniah, Jehoiachin's uncle by the father's side, whom he named Zedekiah.

Zedekiah continued faithful to Nebuchadnezzar nine years; being then weary of subjection, he revolted, and confederated with the neighbouring princes. The king of Babylon came into Judea, reduced the chief places of the country, and besieged Jerusalem; but Pharaoh Hophra coming out of Egypt to assist Zedekiah, Nebuchadnezzar overcame him in battle, and forced him to retire into his own country. After this he returned to the siege of Jerusalem, and was three hundred and ninety days before the place, before he could take it. But in the eleventh year of Zedekiah, in the year of the world 3416, the city was taken. Zedekiah attempted to escape, but was taken and brought to Nebuchadnezzar, who was then at Riblah in Syria. The king of Babylon condemned him to die, caused his children to be put to death in his presence, and then bored out his eyes, loaded him with chains, and sent him to Babylon.

Three years after the Jewish war, Nebuchadnezzar besieged the city of Tyre, which siege lasted thirteen years. But during this interval, he made war also on the Sidonians, Moabites, Ammonites, and Idumæans; and these he treated in nearly the same manner as the Jews. Josephus says, these wars happened five years after the destruction of Jerusalem, consequently in the year of the world 3421. The city of Tyre was taken in the year of the world 3432. Ithobaal, who was then king, was put to death; and Baal succeeded him. The Lord, as a reward to the army of Nebuchadnezzar, which had lain so long before Tyre, gave up to them Egypt and its spoils. Nebuchadnezzar made an easy conquest of it, because the Egyptians were divided by civil wars among themselves; he enriched himself with booty, and returned in triumph to Babylon, with a great number of captives.

Nebuchadnezzar, being at peace, applied himself to the adorning, aggrandizing, and enriching of Babylon with magnificent buildings. To him some ascribe those famous gardens, supported by arches, reckoned among the wonders of the world; and also the walls of Babylon, though many give the honour of this work to Semiramis.

About this time Nebuchadnezzar had a dream of a great tree, loaded with fruit. Suddenly an angel, descending from heaven, commanded that the tree should be cut down, and the branches, leaves, and fruit be shaken off, yet the trunk and the roots should be preserved in the earth; that it should be bound with chains of iron and brass, &c. among the beasts of the field for seven years. The king sent for all the diviners in the country; but none could explain his dream, till Daniel informed him that this dream regarded himself. You, says Daniel, are represented by the great tree; you are to be brought low, to be reduced to the condition of a brute, &c. but you shall afterwards be restored to your first situation.

A year after, as Nebuchadnezzar was walking on his palace at Babylon, he began to say, 'Is not this great Babylon, which I have built for the house of the kingdom, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my majesty?' Scarcely had he pronounced these words, when he fell into a distemper or distraction, which so altered his imagination, that he thought himself to be metamorphosed into an ox, and assumed the manners of that creature. After having been seven years in this state, God opened his eyes, his understanding was restored to him, and he recovered his royal dignity.

Nebuchadnezzar's repentance was neither solid nor sincere. For in the year of his restoration, according to Calmet, he erected a golden statue, whose height was sixty cubits, and breadth six cubits, in the plains of Dura, in the province of Babylon. Having appointed a day for the dedication of this statue, he assembled the principal officers of his kingdom; and published by an herald, that all should adore this image, at the sound of music, on penalty of being cast into a burning fiery furnace. The three Jews, companions of Daniel, would not bend the knee to the image. Daniel probably was absent. Nebuchadnezzar commanded Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, to be called; and he asked them, why they presumed to disobey his orders? They replied, that they neither feared the flames, nor any other penalty; that the God, whom only they would worship, knew how to preserve them: but if the Lord should not think fit to deliver them out of his hands, yet they would obey the laws of God rather than men. At these words the king caused them to be bound, and to be thrown into the furnace, which being vehemently heated, the flame consumed the men that cast them in; but it spared Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego. An angel of the Lord abated the flames, so that the fire did not touch them. Nebuchadnezzar, seeing this miracle, was much astonished, and said to his nobles, From whence is it, that I see four men walking in the midst of the flames? And the fourth is like the Son of God. Nebuchadnezzar, approaching the mouth of the furnace, called the three Hebrews, who came out of the furnace in perfect health, to the great astonishment of the whole court. Then Nebuchadnezzar gave glory to the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego; and he exalted the three Hebrews to great dignity in the province of Babylon. (Dan. iv. 1, 2, &c.)

It is observable, that Dr. Hales states the erection of the golden image, by Nebuchadnezzar, to have taken place after the dream, which it follows in detail, and about the end of the same year in which the first dream happened. This, indeed, appears to be more agreeable to the order of Daniel's narrative.

Nebuchadnezzar died in the year of the world 3442, after having reigned forty-three years. Megasthenes, quoted by Eusebius, says, that this prince, having ascended to the top of his palace, was there seized with a fit of Divine enthusiasm, and cried out, 'O Babylonians, I declare to you a misfortune, that neither our father Belus, nor queen Baltis, have been able to prevent. A Persian mule shall one day come into this country, who, supported by the power of your gods, shall bring you into slavery. He shall be assisted by the Mede, the glory of the Assyrians.' This Persian mule is Cyrus, who was born of a mother that was a Mede, and a Persian father. The Mede who assisted Cyrus, was Cyaxares, or Darius the Mede.

It may not be amiss to add a word here, concerning the metamorphosis of this prince. The most received opinion is, that, by the effect of Divine power, Nebuchadnezzar fell into a black melancholy, and in his frenzy imagined that he was become an ox, as in the disease called a Lycanthropy, a man is persuaded he is changed into a wolf, a dog, a cat; which arises solely from his distempered brain, and heated imagination, since those about him perceive no such change in his outward figure, but only in his inclinations and behaviour: hence he howls and bites like a wolf, eats raw meat, runs into the fields, and avoids the society of men, &c. Thus Nebuchadnezzar, imagining himself an ox, imitated the actions of an ox. His people, astonished at such a change, bound him as madmen or idiots are bound; but he fled into the fields, park, or garden of his palace, living there naked, exposed to the dew of heaven, and the other inclemencies of the weather, so that his hair grew like the feathers of an eagle, and his nails like the claws of a lion. Nothing more is required, to account for all that the Scripture says of Nebuchadnezzar.

A question is moved, concerning the duration of this disease. Some maintain, that the Persians distinguishing their years into two seasons, winter and summer, the seven years of Nebuchadnezzar must be reckoned in this manner, which will reduce it to three years and a half. The word time, (Dan. iv. 25.) by which is generally understood a year, denotes, according to others, the space of a month only; and hence the king's disorder continued no longer than seven months. But a year was a common measure of time among the Chaldeans, especially in the chronicles of their kings. Besides, we need no other interpreter for Daniel, than Daniel himself. It is certain that this prophet by 'a time' means a year; and that by a time, and times, and half-a-time, is denoted the space of three years and a-half.

NEBUZAR-ADAN, נְבוּזַרְאֲדָן, signifies fruits or prophecies of judgment; or winnowed, or spread. Nebuzar-adan was general of Nebuchadnezzar's armies, and chief officer of his household. He conducted the siege of Jerusalem, and took the city, while Nebuchadnezzar was at Riblah in Syria. Having plundered the city and the temple, he set them on fire. Afterwards, he assembled the captives at Ramah, and suffered Jeremiah and Baruch to go where they pleased, according to the king's order. (Jer. xxxix. 11—14.; xl. 1—6.) The other captives he carried to Babylon, leaving Gedaliah to govern the miserable remains of Judah. Some have thought that Nebuzar-adan gave Jeremiah the ark of the covenant, the golden candlestick, the tables of incense, and of the shew-bread; and that this prophet hid them in a cave of Mount Nebo, in the land of Moab. But this opinion is very uncertain.

Four years after Jerusalem was taken, while Nebuchadnezzar was engaged at the siege of Tyre, Nebuzar-adan brought to Babylon seven hundred and forty-five captives more. He afterwards marched against the Ammonites, wasted their country, and brought their king and princes captives to Babylon. The Scripture makes no farther mention of Nebuzar-adan. See NEBUCHADNEZZAR.

NECESSITARIANS. The doctrine of necessity regards the origin of human actions, and the specific mode of the Divine government; and it seems to be the immediate result of the materiality of man, for mechanism is the undoubted consequence of materialism. Hence all Materialists are of course Necessitarians; but it does not follow that all Necessitarians are, or must be, Materialists. Whatever is done by a cause or power that is irresistible, is by necessity, in which sense this term is opposed to freedom. Man is, therefore, a necessary agent, if all his actions be so determined by the causes preceding each action, that not one past action could possibly not have come to pass, or have been otherwise than it hath been; and not one future action can possibly not come to pass, or be otherwise than it shall be. But man is a free agent, if he be able, at any time, in the circumstances in which he is placed, to do different things; or in other words, if he be not unavoidably determined in every point of time by the circumstances he is in, and the causes he is under, to do that one thing he does, and not possibly to do any other thing.

This abstruse subject has occasioned much controversy, and has been debated by writers of the first eminence, from Hobbes and Clarke, to Priestley and Gregory. The Anti-necessitarians suppose, that the doctrine of necessity charges God as the author of sin; that it takes away the freedom of the will; renders man unaccountable to his Maker; makes sin to be no evil, and morality or virtue to be no good; and that it precludes the use of means, and is of the most gloomy tendency. The Necessitarians, on the other hand, deny these to be legitimate consequences of their doctrine, which they declare to be the most consistent mode of explaining the Divine government; and they observe that the Deity acts no more immorally in decreeing vicious actions, than in permitting all those irregularities which he could so easily have prevented. All necessity, say they, doth not take away freedom. The actions of a man may be at one and the same time both free and necessary. Thus, it was infallibly certain that Judas would betray Christ, yet he did it voluntarily; Jesus Christ necessarily became man, and died, yet he acted freely. A good man doth naturally and necessarily love his children, yet voluntarily. They insist that necessity doth not render actions less morally good; for, 'if necessary virtue be neither moral nor praiseworthy, it will follow, that God himself is not a moral being, because he is a necessary one; and the obedience of Christ cannot be good, because it was necessary.' Farther, say they, necessity does not preclude the use of means; for means are no less appointed than the end. It was ordained that Christ should be delivered up to death; but he could not have been betrayed without a betrayer, nor crucified without crucifiers. That it is not a gloomy doctrine they allege, because nothing can be more consolatory than to believe, that all things are under the direction of an

All-wise Being; that his kingdom ruleth over all, and that he doeth all things well. It is also observed, that to deny necessity, is to deny the fore-knowledge of God, and to wrest the sceptre from the hand of the Creator, and to place that capricious and undefinable principle, the self-determining power of man, upon the throne of the universe. Besides, say they, the Scripture places the doctrine beyond all doubt; and they quote in their favour Job xxiii. 13, 14.; xxxiv. 29. Prov. xvi. 4. Isa. xlv. 7. Matt. x. 29, 30. Luke xxiv. 26. John vi. 37. Acts xiii. 48. &c.

The doctrine of Necessity is nearly connected with that of Predestination, which, of late years, has assumed a form very different from that which it formerly possessed; for, instead of being considered as a point to be determined almost entirely by the sacred writings, in the hands of a number of able writers, it has in a great measure resolved itself into a question of natural religion, under the head of the philosophical liberty or necessity of the will; or, whether all human actions are, or are not, necessarily determined by motives arising from the character which God has impressed on our minds, and the train of circumstances amidst which his providence has placed us? The Calvinistic doctrine of predestination is, that 'God, for his own glory, hath fore-ordained whatsoever comes to pass.' The scheme of Philosophical Necessity, as stated by the most celebrated Necessitarian of the age, is, 'That every thing is predetermined by the Divine Being; that whatever has been, must have been; and that whatever will be, must be; that all events are pre-ordained by infinite wisdom and unlimited goodness; that the will, in all its determinations, is governed by the state of mind; that the state of mind is, in every instance, determined by the Deity; and that there is a continued chain of causes and effects, of motives and actions, inseparably connected, and originating from the condition in which we are brought into existence by the Author of our being.'

On the other hand, Dr. Doddridge very justly remarks, that 'those who believe the being and perfections of God, and a state of retribution, in which he will reward and punish mankind according to the diversity of their actions, will find it difficult to reconcile the justice of punishment with the necessity of crimes punished. And they that believe all that the Scripture says, on the one hand, of the eternity of future punishments, and, on the other, of God's compassion to sinners, and his solemn assurance that he desires not their death, will find the difficulty greatly increased.' It is doubtless an article of the Christian faith, that God will reward or punish every man hereafter according to his actions in this life. But we cannot maintain his justice in this particular, if men's actions be necessary either in their own nature, or by the Divine decrees. Activity, and self-determining powers, are the foundation of all morality; and to prove that such powers belong to man, it is urged that we ourselves are conscious of possessing them. We blame and condemn ourselves when we do amiss; but an inward sense of shame, guilt, and remorse of conscience, are feelings which are inconsistent with the scheme of necessity. It is also agreed, that some actions deserve praise, and afford an inward satisfaction; but for this, there would be no foundation, if we were invincibly determined in every volition: so that approbation and blame are consequent on free actions only.

The principal writers on the side of Necessity are Hobbes, Collins, Leibnitz, Hume, Hutcheson, Kaimes, Hartley, Edwards, Priestley, Crombie, Toplady, T. and W. Belsham, and perhaps Locke. Of these, Hartley, Hume, and Priestley, are, perhaps, the most profound reasoners, and Lord Kaimes, the most perspicuous writer on the subject. On the other side are Clarke, King, Law, Reid, Butler, Price, Bryant, Wollaston, Beattie, Horsley, Gregory, Butterworth, &c. NE'CHO, נֶחֱךְ, signifies lame, or who was beaten. Necho, king of Egypt, carried his arms to the Euphrates, where he conquered the city of Carchemish. He is known not only in Scripture, but by Herodotus, who says, that Necho was son of Psammetichus, king of Egypt; and, having succeeded him in the kingdom, he raised great armies, and sent out great fleets, as well on the Mediterranean Sea, as the Red Sea; that he fought the Syrians near the city of Migdol, obtained the victory, and took the city of Cadytis. The learned are not agreed about this city Cadytis. Some will have it to be Cades in Arabia Petræa; some, Jerusalem, which they say is called Cadyta or Cadytis, that is, the Holy City, because of its temple; others, the city Cedes in Galilee, of Naphthali. (2 Chr. xxv. 2 Kings xxiii.) Josiah, king of Judah, who was tributary to the king of Babylon, opposed Necho, who sent to tell him, What have I to do with thee, king of Judah? The Lord has commanded me to make war against another people. It is thought that Necho had received an admonition from Jeremiah to march against Carchemish. Josiah would not hear the remonstrances of Necho, but gave him battle at Megiddo, where he received the wound of which he died. The people of Jerusalem set up Jehoahaz as king of Judah, and Necho passed forwards, without making any long stay in Judea.

At his return from this expedition, which was very successful, he halted at Riblah in Syria; and sending for Jehoahaz king of the Jews, he deposed him, loaded him with chains, and sent him into Egypt. Then coming to Jerusalem, he set up Eliakim, or Jehoiakim, in his place, and exacted the payment of one hundred talents of silver, and one talent of gold, from the country. Jeremiah (xli. 2.) acquaints us, that the city of Carchemish was taken from Necho by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim king of Judah; so that Necho did not enjoy his conquest above four years. Josephus adds, that the king of Babylon pursuing his victory, brought under his dominion the whole country between the river Euphrates and Egypt, excepting Judea. Thus Necho was again reduced within the limits of his own country.

NECROMANCY consists in raising up the ghosts of those who are deceased. (1 Sam. xxviii. 7.) This practice the Israelites brought with them out of Egypt, which affected to be the mother of the most occult sciences; and whence it spread into the neighbouring countries, and soon infested all the East. The injunction of the law is very express against it, (Deut. xviii. 11.); and the punishment against such as practised it was, to be stoned to death. (Lev. xx. 27.) What forms of enchantment were used in the practice of Necromancy, we are at a loss to know, because we read of none that the pythoness of Endor employed: however, that there were several rites, spells, and invocations, used upon those occasions, we may learn from almost every ancient author, but from none more particularly than from Lucan. (Pharsal. lib. vi.)

NEHEMIAH, נְחִמְיָה, signifies consolation, or repentance of the Lord; otherwise, rest of the Lord; otherwise, conduct of the Lord. Nehemiah, or Neemias, son of Hachaliah, was born at Babylon during the captivity. He was, according to some, of the race of the priests; according to others, of the tribe of Judah, and of the royal family. Those who maintain the first opinion, support it by Ezra, (x. 20.) where he is reckoned in the number of the priests. But those who believe that he was of the race of the kings of Judah say, first, that Nehemiah having governed the republic of the Jews for a considerable time, there is great probability he was of that tribe of which the kings always were. Secondly, Nehemiah mentions his brethren Hanani, and other Jews, who, coming to Babylon during the captivity, acquainted him with the sad condition of their country. Thirdly, the office of cup-bearer to the king of Persia, to which Nehemiah was promoted, is a proof that he was of an illustrious family. Fourthly, he excuses himself from entering into the inner part of the temple, probably because he was only a layman. 'Should such a man as I flee? And who is there that, being as I am, would go into the temple to save his life?' (Neh. vi. 11.)

The Scripture gives him the name, or title, of tirshatha, that is, cup-bearer; which office he had at the court of Artaxerxes Longimanus. He had a great affection for the country of his fathers, though he had never seen it; and one day, as some Jews lately come from Jerusalem acquainted him with the miserable state of that city, in its destruction, he fasted, prayed, and humbled himself before the Lord, entreating that he would be favourable to the design he conceived, of asking the king's permission to rebuild Jerusalem. The course of his attendance at court being come, he presented the cup to the king, according to his duty, but with a dejected countenance. The king entertained some suspicion at this, thinking he might have some evil design. But Nehemiah discovering the occasion of his disquietude, Artaxerxes gave him leave to go to Jerusalem, and to repair its walls and gates; but appointed him a time to return.

Nehemiah arrived at Jerusalem with letters and full powers; but was there three days before he opened the occasion of his journey. On the night of the third day, he went round the city, and viewed the walls. After this, he assembled the chief of the people, produced his commission and letters, exhorted them to undertake the repairing of the gates and walls of the city; and immediately all began the work. The enemies of the Jews only scoffed at them at first; but afterwards, seeing the chief breaches repaired, they used stratagems and threats to deter Nehemiah. He therefore ordered part of his people to stand to their arms behind the walls, while others worked, having also their arms near them. His enemies then had recourse to craft and stratagem, endeavouring to draw him into an ambuscade in the fields, where they proposed to finish their dispute at an amicable conference. But Nehemiah gave them to understand, that the work he had begun required his close personal attendance, and, therefore, he could not come out to them.

About the same time he discovered that a false prophet, called Shemaiah, had been corrupted by his enemies, and that some of the chief of the city were secretly in confederacy with them. All this did not discourage him. He continued his work, and happily completed it in fifty-two days.

Then he dedicated the walls, the towers, and the gates of Jerusalem, with solemnity and magnificence. He separated the priests, the Levites, and the princes of the people, into two companies, one of which walked to the south, and the other to the north, upon the top of the walls. These two companies were to meet at the temple. The procession was accompanied with music, both vocal and instrumental. When all were come to the temple, they there read the law, offered sacrifices, and made great rejoicings; and the feast of tabernacles happening at the same time, it was celebrated with great solemnity. Nehemiah, observing that the city was too large for its present inhabitants, ordered that the chief of the nation should there fix their dwelling; and he caused them to draw lots, by which a tenth part of the whole people of Judah were obliged to dwell at Jerusalem.

He then applied himself to the reforming of such corruptions as had crept into public affairs. He restrained the inhumanity of the great, who held in slavery and subjection the sons and daughters of the poor or unfortunate, keeping also the lands, which the poor had mortgaged or sold to them. Nehemiah undertook to dissolve the marriages with strange and idolatrous women, whom he sent away. He obliged the people punctually to pay the ministers of the Lord their due, and enjoined the priests and Levites to strict attendance on their respective duties and functions. He enforced the observance of the sabbath, and would not permit strangers to come in to buy and sell, but kept the gates of the city shut all that day. To perpetuate as much as possible these good regulations, he engaged the chief men of the nation solemnly to renew their covenant with the Lord; and an instrument to this effect was drawn up, and signed by the principal men, both priests and people.

Nehemiah professes himself the author of the book which bears his name, in the very beginning of it; and he uniformly writes in the first person. He who wrote this book was a different person from the Nehemiah who returned from the Babylonian captivity with Zerubbabel. This book, which, in the Hebrew canon was joined to that of Ezra, gives an account of his appointment and administration through a space of about thirty-six years, to the year of the world 3595, at which time the Scripture history closes; and, consequently, these historical books, from Joshua to Nehemiah inclusive, contain the history of the Jewish people from the death of Moses, in the year of the world 2553, to the reformation established by Nehemiah, after the return from captivity, being a period of 1042 years. Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christian Theology, vol. i. p. 91; Le Clerc's and Poole's Annot. on Nehem. i.

NEONOMIANS, so called from the Greek νέος, new, and νόμος, law; signifying a new law, the condition of which is imperfect, though sincere and persevering, obedience.

Neonomianism seems to be an essential part of the Arminian system. 'The new covenant of grace, which, through the medium of Christ's death the Father made with men, consists, according to this system, not in our being justified by faith, as it apprehends the righteousness of Christ; but in this, that God, abrogating the exaction of perfect legal obedience, reputes or accepts of faith itself, and the imperfect obedience of faith, instead of the perfect obedience of the law, and graciously accounts them worthy of the reward of eternal life.' This opinion was examined at the synod of Dort, and has been canvassed between the Calvinists and Arminians on various occasions.

Towards the close of the seventeenth century, a controversy was agitated amongst the English Dissenters, in which the one side, who were partial to the writings of Dr. Crisp, were charged with Antinomianism; and the other, who favoured those of Mr. Baxter, were accused of Neonomianism. Mr. Daniel Williams, who was a principal writer on what was called the Neonomian side, after many things had been said, gives the following, as a summary of his faith in reference to those subjects.—'1. God has eternally elected a certain definite number of men whom he will infallibly save by Christ, in that way prescribed by the Gospel. 2. These very elect are not personally justified until they receive Christ, and yield up themselves to him; but they remain condemned whilst unconverted to Christ. 3. By the ministry of the Gospel there is a serious offer of pardon and glory, upon the terms of the Gospel, to all that hear it; and God thereby requires them to comply with the said terms. 4. Ministers ought to use these and other Gospel benefits as motives, assuring men that if they believe they shall be justified; if they turn to God, they shall live; if they repent, their sins shall be blotted out; and whilst they neglect these duties, they cannot have a personal interest in these respective benefits. 5. It is by the power of the Spirit of Christ freely exerted, and not by the power of free will, that the Gospel becomes effectual for the conversion of any soul to the obedience of faith. 6. When a man believes, yet is not that very faith, and much less any other work, the matter of that righteousness for which a sinner is justified, that is, entitled to pardon, acceptance as righteous, and eternal glory before God; and it is the imputed righteousness of Christ alone, for which the Gospel gives the believer a right to these and all saving blessings, who, in this respect, is justified by Christ's righteousness alone. By both this and the fifth head it appears that all boasting is excluded, and we are saved by free grace. 7. Faith alone receives our Lord Jesus and his righteousness, and the subject of this faith is a convinced penitent soul; hence we are justified by faith alone, and yet the impenitent are not forgiven. 8. God has freely promised, that all whom he predestinated to salvation shall not only savingly believe, but that he by his power shall preserve them from a total or final apostasy. 9. Yet the believer, whilst he lives in this world, is to pass the time of his sojourning here with fear, because his warfare is not accomplished, and that it is true, that, if he draw back, God will have no pleasure in him. Which, with the like cautions, God blesseth as means to the saints' perseverance, and these, by ministers, should be so urged. 10. The law of innocence, or moral law, is so in force still, as that every precept thereof, constitutes duty, even to the believer; every breach thereof is a sin deserving of death: this law binds death by its course on every unbeliever, and the righteousness for or by which we are justified before God, is a righteousness (at least) adequate to that law which is Christ's alone righteousness; and this so imputed to the believer, as that God deals judicially with him according thereto. 11. Yet, such is the grace of the Gospel, that it promiseth in and by Christ, a freedom from the curse, forgiveness of sin, and eternal life, to every sincere believer; which promise God will certainly perform, notwithstanding the threatening of the law.' Dr. Williams maintains the conditionality of the covenant of grace; but admits with Dr. Owen, who also uses the term condition, that 'Christ undertook that those who were to be taken into this covenant should receive grace, enabling them to comply with the terms of it, fulfil its conditions, and yield the obedience which God required therein.' On this subject, Dr. Williams further says, 'The question is not whether the first (namely, regenerating) grace, by which we are enabled to perform the condition, be absolutely given. This I affirm, though that be dispensed ordinarily in a due use of means, and in a way discountenancing idleness, and fit encouragement given to the use of means.'

The following objection, amongst others, was made by several ministers, in 1692, against Dr. Williams's Gospel Truth Stated, &c. 'To supply the room of the moral law, vacated by him, he turns the Gospel into a new law, in keeping of which we shall be justified for the sake of Christ's righteousness, making qualifications and acts of our's a disposing subordinate righteousness, whereby we become capable of being justified by Christ's righteousness.'

To this, amongst other things, he answers, 'The difference is not, 1. Whether the Gospel be a new law, in the Socinian, Popish, or Arminian sense? This I deny. Nor, 2. Is faith, or any other grace, or act of ours, any atonement for sin, satisfaction to justice, meriting qualification, or any part of that righteousness, for which we are justified at God our Creator's bar. This I deny in places innumerable. Nor, 3. Whether the Gospel be a law more new than is implied in the first promise to fallen Adam, proposed to Cain, and obeyed by Abel, to the differencing him from his unbelieving brother? This I deny. 4. Nor whether the Gospel be a law that allows sin, when it accepts such graces as true, though short of perfection, to be the conditions of our personal interest in the benefits purchased by Christ? This I deny. 5. Nor whether the Gospel be a law, the promises whereof entitle the performers of its conditions to the benefits as of debt? This I deny.

'The difference is, 1. Is the Gospel a law in this sense; namely, God in Christ thereby commandeth sinners to repent of sin, and receive Christ by a true operative faith, promising that thereupon they shall be united to him, justified by his righteousness, pardoned, and adopted; and that, persevering in faith and true holiness, they shall be finally saved; also threatening that if any shall die impenitent, unbelieving, ungodly, rejecters of his grace, they shall perish without relief, and endure sorer punishments than if these offers had not been made to them? 2. Hath the Gospel a sanction, that is, doth Christ therein enforce his commands of faith, repentance, and perseverance, by the aforesaid promises and threatenings, as motives to our obedience? Both these I affirm, and they deny; saying the Gospel in the largest sense is an absolute promise without precepts and conditions, and a Gospel threat is a bull. 3. Do the Gospel promises of benefits to certain graces, and its threats that those benefits shall be withheld, and the contrary evils inflicted for the neglect of such graces, render these graces the condition of our personal title to those benefits? This they deny, and I affirm,' &c.

It does not appear to have been a question in this controversy, whether God in his word commandeth sinners to repent and believe in Christ, nor whether he promises life to believers, and threatens death to unbelievers; but whether it be the Gospel under the form of a new law that thus commands, or threatens, or the moral law on its behalf, and whether its promises to believing render such believing a condition of the things promised. In another controversy, however, which arose about forty years afterwards amongst the same description of people, it became a question whether God did by his word (call it Law or Gospel) command unregenerate sinners to repent and believe in Christ, or do any thing also which is spiritually good? Of those who took the affirmative side of this question, one party maintained it on the ground of the Gospel being a new law, consisting of commands, promises, and threatenings, the terms or conditions of which were repentance, faith, and sincere obedience. But those who first engaged in the controversy, though they allowed the encouragement to repent and believe to arise merely from the grace of the Gospel, yet considered the formal obligation to do so as arising merely from the moral law, which, requiring supreme love to God, requires acquiescence in any revelation which he shall at any time make known. Witsius's Irenicum; Adams's View of Religions, pp. 238—242.

NE'RO. The emperor Nero is not named in Scripture; but he is indicated by his title of emperor, and by his surname Cæsar. To him St. Paul appealed after his imprisonment by Felix, and his examination by Festus, who was swayed by the Jews. St. Paul was therefore carried to Rome, where he arrived A.D. 61. Here he continued two years, preaching the Gospel with freedom, till he became famous even in the emperor's court, in which were many Christians; for he salutes the Philippians in the name of the brethren who were of the household of Cæsar, that is, of Nero's court. (Philippians iv. 22.; i. 12, 13.) We have no particular information how he cleared himself from the accusations of the Jews; whether by answering before Nero; or whether his enemies dropped their prosecutions, which seems probable. (Acts xxviii. 21.) However, it appears that he was liberated in the year 63.

Nero is reckoned the first persecutor of the Christian church: his persecution was A.D. 64. Nero, the most cruel and savage of all men, and also the most wicked and depraved, began his persecution against the Christian church, A.D. 64, on pretence of the burning of Rome, of which some thought himself to be the author. He endeavoured to throw all the odium on the Christians; those were seized first that were known publicly as such, and by their means many others were discovered. They were condemned to death, and were even insulted at their sufferings. Some were sewed up in skins of beasts, and then exposed to dogs to be torn in pieces; some were nailed to crosses, others perished by flames; they were sewed up in pitched coverings, which being set on fire, they served as torches to the people, and were lighted up in the night. Nero gave leave to use his own gardens, as the scene of all these cruelties. From this time edicts were published against the Christians, and many martyrs suffered, especially in Italy. Peter and Paul are thought to have suffered martyrdom, consequent on this persecution, in the year 65.

The revolt of the Jews from the Romans happened about A.D. 65 and 66, the twelfth and thirteenth of Nero. The city of Jerusalem making an insurrection A.D. 66, Florus there slew 3,600 persons, and thus began the war. A little while afterwards, those of Jerusalem killed the Roman garrison. Cestius on this came to Jerusalem, to suppress the sedition; but he was forced to retire, after having besieged it about six weeks, and was routed in his retreat, A.D. 66. About the end of the same year, Nero gave Vespasian the command of his troops against the Jews. This general carried on the war in Galilee, and Judea, during A.D. 66 and 67, the thirteenth and fourteenth of Nero. But Nero killing himself the fourteenth year of his reign, Jerusalem was not besieged till after his death, A.D. 70, the first and second of Vespasian.

NESTORIANS. These Christians, who are frequently called Chaldæans, from the country where they long principally resided, derive the name of Nestorians, by which they are principally known, from Nestorius, a Syrian, and patriarch of Constantinople, in the beginning of the fifth century. He was 'a man,' says Dr. Mosheim, 'remarkable for his learning and eloquence, which were, however, accompanied with much levity, and with intolerable arrogance,' and it may be added, with violent enmity to all sectaries. Anastasius, in a public discourse, delivered in 424, warmly declaimed against the title of Θεότοκος, or Mother of God, which was then frequently attributed to the Virgin Mary in the controversy with the Arians, and gave it as his opinion that the holy Virgin was rather to be called Χριστότοκος, or Mother of Christ, since the Deity can neither be born nor die, and, of consequence, the Son of Man alone could derive his birth from an earthly parent. These sentiments were applauded by Nestorius, who explained and defended them in several discourses. But both he and his friends were strongly opposed by certain monks at Constantinople, who maintained that the Son of Mary was God incarnate, and excited the zeal and fury of the populace against him, from an idea that he had revived the error of Paulus Samosatenus and Photinus, that Jesus Christ was a mere man. His discourses, however, were well received in many places, and had the majority on their side, particularly among the monks of Egypt, though in opposition to the wishes and sentiments of Cyril, bishop of Alexandria, 'a man of a haughty, turbulent, and imperious temper.' The consequence was, that Cyril and Nestorius reciprocally anathematized each other. When there was no prospect of an amicable issue to this dispute, Theodosius the Younger called a council at Ephesus, A.D. 431, which was the third general council in the annals of the church. In this council Cyril presided, though he was a party concerned, and the avowed enemy of Nestorius; and, in the absence of John, bishop of Antioch, and the other eastern bishops, pushed on matters with a lawless violence. Nestorius, who refused to obey the summons which called him to appear before a council where every thing was carried on in so irregular and unfair a manner, was judged and condemned without being heard, deprived of his episcopal dignity, and banished to Petra in Arabia, and afterwards to Oasis, in the deserts of Egypt, where he died in 435, or, according to others, not till after 439.

John of Antioch, and the other eastern bishops, for whose arrival Cyril had refused to wait, met at Ephesus, and pronounced against him and Memnon, bishop of that city, as severe a sentence as they had thundered against Nestorius. Hence arose a new and obstinate dissension between Cyril and the Orientals, with John at their head. This, however, was soon allayed through the interference of the emperor, who persuaded John to conform to the decrees of the Ephesian council: but the commotions which arose from this fatal controversy were more durable in the East, where nothing could oppose the progress of Nestorianism. The friends of the persecuted prelate carried his doctrine through all the Oriental provinces, and every where erected congregations which professed an invincible opposition to the decrees of the council of Ephesus. Among others, the Persians opposed Cyril in the most vigorous manner, maintained that Nestorius had been unjustly condemned at Ephesus, and charged Cyril with removing that distinction which subsists between the two natures in Christ. The famous Barsumas, who was consecrated bishop of Nisibis in 435, laboured with incredible zeal and dexterity to procure for the Nestorians a solid and permanent footing in Persia, in which he was warmly seconded by Maanes, bishop of Ardascira. So remarkable was the success which crowned the labours of Barsumas, that his fame extended throughout the East; and the Nestorians, who still remain in Chaldæa, Persia, Assyria, and the adjacent countries, consider him alone as their parent and founder. Nor did his zeal and activity here terminate. He erected a famous school at Nisibis, whence issued those Nestorian doctors, who, in that and the following centuries, spread abroad their tenets through Egypt, Syria, Arabia, India, Tartary, and China. In the tenth century, the Nestorians extended their spiritual conquests beyond Mount Imaus, and introduced the Christian religion into Tartary, properly so called, and especially into the country called Karit, bordering on the northern part of China. The prince of that country, whom they converted to the Christian faith, assumed, according to the vulgar tradition, the name of John after his baptism, to which he added the surname of Presbyter, from a principle of modesty; whence it is said, his successors were each of them called Presbyter, or Prester John, till the time of Gengis, or Genchiz Khan. According to Dr. Mosheim, Prester John, whose kingly name was Ungchan, was a Nestorian priest, who invaded that country about the end of the eleventh century; and it was his immediate successor that was deposed by Genchiz Khan, towards the end of the following century.

The Nestorians formed so considerable a body of Christians, that the Romanists were industrious in their endeavours to reduce them under the papal yoke, and, with this view Innocent IV., in 1246, and Nicholas III., in 1278, used their utmost efforts by means of Franciscan and Dominican missionaries; but without success. However, about the middle of the fifteenth century, these missionaries gained over to their communion a small number of Nestorians, whom they formed into a congregation or church; the patriarchs or bishops of which reside in the city of Amida or Diarbekir, and successively assume the name of Joseph.

In the earliest ages of Nestorianism, the various branches of that numerous and powerful sect were under the spiritual jurisdiction of the Catholic or patriarch of Babylon, a vague appellation, which has been successively applied to the sees of Seleucia, Ctesiphon, and Bagdad, but who now resides at Mousol. In the sixteenth century the Nestorians were divided into two sects; for in 1551, a warm dispute arose among them about the creation of a new patriarch, Simeon Barmamas or Barmana, being proposed by one party, and Sulaka, otherwise named Siud, earnestly desired by the other; when the latter, to support his pretensions the more effectually, repaired to Rome, and was consecrated patriarch in 1553, by pope Julius III., whose jurisdiction he had acknowledged, and to whose commands he had promised unlimited submission and obedience. Upon this new Chaldæan patriarch's return to his own country, Julius sent with him several persons skilled in the Syriac language, to assist him in establishing and extending the papal empire among the Nestorians: and from that time, that unhappy people have been divided into two factions, and have often been involved in the greatest dangers and difficulties, by the jarring sentiments and perpetual quarrels of their patriarchs. In 1555, Simeon Denha, archbishop of Gelu, adopted the party of the fugitive patriarch, who had embraced the communion of the Latin church; and being afterwards chosen patriarch himself, he fixed his residence in the city of Van, or Ormia, in the mountainous parts of Persia, where his successors still continue, and are all distinguished by the name of Simeon; but they seem of late to have withdrawn themselves from their communion with the church of Rome.

The great Nestorian pontiffs, who form the opposite party; and who have, since 1559, been distinguished by the general denomination of Elias, and reside constantly at Mousul, look with an hostile eye on this little patriarch: but since 1617, the bishops of Ormus have been in so low and declining a state, both in opulence and credit, that they are no longer in a condition to excite the envy of their brethren at Mousul, whose spiritual dominion is very extensive, taking in great part of Asia, and comprehending within its circuit the Arabian Nestorians, as also the Christians of St. Thomas, who dwell along the coast of Malabar.

In the beginning of the seventeenth century, Elias II. bishop of Mousul, discovered a desire to bring about a reconciliation between the Nestorians and the church of Rome; and, with that view, sent two private embassies to the Pope in 1607 and 1610. Elias III., likewise, in 1657, addressed a letter to the congregation De propaganda Fide, in which he intimated his readiness to join with the church of Rome, 'on condition that the pope would allow the Nestorians a place of public worship in that city, and would abstain from all attempts to alter the doctrine and discipline of that sect.' But it does not appear that the Nestorians were received, on these terms, into the communion of the Romish church, or that the bishops of Mousul have been, since that period, at all solicitous about the friendship or good-will of the Roman pontiff; on the contrary, they seem to persist in their refusal to enter into the communion of the church of Rome.

The Nestorian bishops of Ormus likewise, since their withdrawing from the jurisdiction of the Roman church, have sent the pope a confession of their faith, giving a clear idea of their religious tenets and institutions; and have made repeated proposals of reconciliation. 'But these proposals were little attended to by the court of Rome; which was either owing to its dislike of the doctrine of these Nestorians, or to that contempt which their poverty and want of influence excited in the pontiffs, whose ambition and avidity aimed at acquisitions of more consequence.'

The Nestorians have several doctrines, as well as some religious ceremonies and institutions, which are peculiar to themselves. But the main points that distinguish them from all other Christian societies, besides their believing that the Virgin Mary was not the mother of our Lord as God, but only as man, are, their persuasion that Nestorius was unjustly condemned by the council of Ephesus, and their firm attachment to the doctrine of that prelate, who maintained that there were not only two natures, but also two distinct persons in the Son of God. 'In the earlier ages of the church, this error was considered as of the most momentous and pernicious kind; but in our times it is esteemed of less consequence, by persons of the greatest weight and authority in theological matters even among the Roman Catholic doctors. They consider this whole controversy as a dispute about words, and the opinion of Nestorius as a nominal rather than a real heresy, that is, as an error arising rather from the words he employed, than from his intention in the use of them. It is true indeed that the Chaldæans attribute to Christ two natures, and even persons; but they correct what may seem rash in this expression, by adding, that these natures and persons are so closely and intimately united, that they have only one aspect. Now, the word barsopa, by which they express this aspect, is precisely of the same signification with the Greek word πρόσωπον, which signifies a person; and hence it is evident that they attached to the word aspect the same idea that we attach to the word person; and that they understood by the word person, precisely what we understand by the term nature. However that be, we must observe here, to the lasting honour of the Nestorians, that, of all the Christian societies established in the East, they have been the most careful and successful in avoiding a multitude of superstitious opinions and practices that have infected the Greek and Latin churches.' Adam's Religious World Displayed, vol. i. pp. 426—436.

NETH'INIM, is derived from the Hebrew nathan, to give. The nethinim were servants given and dedicated to the service of the tabernacle and temple, to perform the most laborious offices in them; as the carrying of wood and water thither. At first the Gibeonites were destined to this station; and afterwards the Canaanites who surrendered themselves, and whose lives were spared. We read (Ezra viii. 20.) that the nethinim were slaves devoted by David, and other princes, to the ministry of the temple; and (Ezra ii. 58.) that they were slaves given by Solomon, the children of Solomon's servants. We see (1 Kings ix. 20, 21.) that that prince had subdued the remains of the Canaanites. It is very probable he gave a pretty large number of them to the priests and Levites, for the temple service. The nethinim were carried into captivity with the tribe of Judah; and great numbers of them were placed on the coasts of the Caspian Sea, whence Ezra brought some of them. (Ezra viii. 17.) At the return from the captivity, they dwelt in cities appointed for them. There were some of them also at Jerusalem, who inhabited that part of the city called Ophel. Two hundred and twenty returned with Ezra: and those that followed Zerubbabel made up three hundred and ninety-two. (Nehem. iii. 26.) This number was small in regard to their offices; so that we find, afterwards, a solemnity called Xylophoria, in which the people carried wood to the temple with great ceremony, to keep up the fire of the altar of burnt sacrifices.

NICE, or NICENE, CREED is so denominated, because the greater part of it, namely, as far as the words, 'Holy Ghost,' was drawn up and agreed to at the council of Nice, or Nicæa, in Bithynia, A.D. 325: the rest of this Creed was added at the council of Constantinople, A.D. 381, except the words 'and the Son,' which follow the words 'who proceedeth from the Father,' and they were inserted A.D. 447. The addition made at Constantinople was caused by the denial of the divinity of the Holy Ghost by Macedonius and his followers; and the Creed, thus enlarged, was immediately received by all orthodox Christians. The insertion of the words, 'and the Son,' was made by the Spanish bishops; and they were soon after adopted by the Christians in France. The bishops of Rome for some time refused to admit these words into the Creed; but at last, in the year 883, when Nicholas the First was pope, they were allowed; and from that time they have stood in the Nicene Creed, in all the Western churches; but the Greek church has never received them. Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christian Theology, vol. ii. p. 218.

NICODEMUS, Νικόδημος, signifies, innocent blood; according to the Greek, victory of the people. Nicodemus, a disciple of Jesus Christ, was by nation a Jew; by sect a Pharisee. (John iii. 1.) The Gospel calls him a ruler of the Jews, and our Saviour entitles him master in Israel. When our Saviour began to manifest himself by his miracles at Jerusalem, at the first passover after his baptism, Nicodemus came to him by night, for further information. Jesus told him, that no one could see the kingdom of heaven, except he should be born again. Nicodemus taking this in a literal sense answered, How can a man that is old be born again? Can he enter a second time into his mother's womb? Jesus proceeded to explain the nature of this new birth; alluded to the history of the brazen serpent in the wilderness; and bidden plainly at his salutary mission to redeem mankind.

After this conversation, Nicodemus became a disciple of Jesus Christ, and, no doubt, he came to hear him as often as our Saviour visited Jerusalem. When the priests and Pharisees had sent officers to seize Jesus, who returning to them, reported, that never man spake as he did; the Pharisees replied, 'Are ye also deceived? Have any of the rulers or of the Pharisees believed on him?' Then Nicodemus thought himself obliged to answer, saying, Does the law permit us to condemn any one before he is heard? To this they replied, Are you also a Galilean? Read the Scriptures, and you will find that never any prophet came out of Galilee. The council broke up suddenly. Nicodemus declared himself openly a disciple of Jesus Christ, when he came with Joseph of Arimathea to pay the last duties to the body of Christ crucified, which they took down from the cross, embalmed, and laid in the sepulchre.

There is extant an apocryphal Gospel, under the name of Nicodemus, which, in some MSS. is intitled the Acts of Pilate.

NICOLA'ITANS. The Nicolaitans were frequent in Asia from the end of the first century; since Jesus Christ expressly condemns them himself, in the Revelation. Irenæus says, that adulteries, and the use of meats offered to idols, were held as indifferent things among them. Victorinus Petaviensis says, that they ate these meats after having exorcised them, and forgave fornicators eight days after their offence. Theodoret says, that the two distinguishing characters of this heresy were libertinism and folly. Epiphanius gives a long account both of their infamous actions, and of their extravagant opinions concerning God and the creation. Austin says, that they have women in common, and make no scruple to conform to all the Pagan superstitions. They tell a number of fables about the creation and disposition of the world, intermingling many barbarous names of angels and princes, to amaze their auditors; though, to people of understanding, they are rather subjects of mirth than of terror. Through all their disguises it is easy to perceive that they hold the world was not created by God; but was the work of certain powers whom they feign with an insupportable temerity, or whom they take for granted, from the credit of others, with a credulity not less blamable.

Irenæus calls them a branch of the Gnostics, and says, it was against them St. John wrote his Gospel. Clemens Alexandrinus says, they had a certain book on the authority of which they relied, and by which they imputed to God himself the infamous actions they committed.

A more correct opinion seems to be, that the term Nicolaitans (Rev. ii. 6. 15.) here is not a proper name, but symbolical; and that it refers to the same persons who are mentioned (Rev. ii. 14.) as holding the doctrine of Balaam: since the Greek name Νικόλαος corresponds with the Hebrew בלעם, which is formed from בלע, that is, νικάω, to conquer, and עם, that is, λαός, the people. The allusion, according to this interpretation, is to false and seducing teachers like Balaam, and perhaps refers more particularly to such as opposed the decree of the apostles. The Nicolaitans are conjectured to have been alluded to in 2 Pet. ii., and in Jude 7—19. Robinson's Greek and English Lexicon to the New Testament; Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 606.

NICOPOLIS, Νικόπολις, signifies the city of victory, or the victorious city. Nicopolis was a city of Epirus, on the Gulf of Ambracia, whither, as some think, St. Paul wrote to Titus, then in Crete, to come to him, (Tit. iii. 12.); but others, with greater probability, are of opinion, that the city of Nicopolis, where St. Paul was, was not that of Epirus, but that of Thrace, on the borders of Macedonia, near the river Nessus.

NIGHT. The ancient Hebrews began their artificial day in the evening, and ended it the next evening; so that the night preceded the day: whence it is said, (Gen. i. 5.) 'the evening and the morning were the first day.' They allowed twelve hours to the night, and twelve to the day. The hours of the day and those of the night were not equal, except at the equinox. At other times, when the hours of the night were long, those of the day were short, as in winter; and, contrariwise, when the hours of the night were short, as at Midsummer, the hours of the day were long in proportion.

The night was originally divided into three parts or watches, (Ps. lxxiii. 6.; xc. 4.) although the division of twelve hours, like those of the day, afterwards obtained. The first, or beginning of watches, is mentioned in Lam. ii. 19.; the middle watch, in Judg. vii. 19.; and the morning watch, or watch of day-break, in Exod. xiv. 24. It is probable that these watches varied in length according to the seasons of the year; consequently, those who had a long and inclement winter watch to encounter, would ardently desire the approach of morning light, to terminate their watch. This circumstance would beautifully illustrate the fervour of the Psalmist's devotion, (Ps. cxxx. 6.) as well as serve to explain other passages of the Old Testament. These three watches are also mentioned by various profane writers.

During the time of our Saviour, the night was divided into four watches; a fourth watch having been introduced among the Jews from the Romans, who derived it from the Greeks. The second and third watches are mentioned in Luke xii. 38; the fourth in Matt. xiv. 25.; and all the four are distinctly mentioned in Mark xiii. 35: 'Watch ye, therefore; for ye know not when the master of the house cometh; at even, (ὥσπερ, or the late watch,) or at midnight, (μεσονυκτίου,) or at the cock-crowing, (ἀλεκτοροφωνίας,) or in the morning, (πρωί, the early watch.)' Here, the first watch was at even, and continued from six till nine; the second commenced at nine, and ended at twelve, or midnight; the third watch, called by the Romans gallicinium, lasted from twelve to three; and the morning watch closed at six. A double cock-crowing, indeed, is noticed by St. Mark, (xiv. 30.) where the other evangelists mention only one. (Matt. xxvi. 34. Luke xxii. 34. John xiii. 38.) But this may be easily reconciled. The Jewish doctors divided the cock-crowing into the first, second, and third; the Heathen nations in general observed only two. As the cock crew the second time after Peter's third denial, it was this second or principal cock-crowing (for the Jews seem in many respects to have accommodated themselves to the Roman computation of time) to which the evangelists, Matthew, Luke, and John, refer. Or, what is perhaps more probable, the second crowing of the Jews might coincide with the second of the Romans. See Cock. Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. pp. 168, 169; Hales's Analysis of Chronology, vol. i. pp. 111, 112.

NILE, שֵׁרָיִר, signifies black, or turbid; otherwise, early in the morning. The Nile is a river of Egypt, whose fountain is in the Upper Ethiopia. The learned and ingenious Mr. Bruce travelled into Abyssinia, for the purpose of discovering the sources of this river. He found that the Nile has its rise in the country of the Agows, the spring of which is twelve feet in diameter, and apparently surrounded with sods by the neighbouring people, who worship the river. In the midst of this eminence is the first fountain of the Nile, in which the water is clear and limpid, and which is about three feet in diameter, and six feet in depth. The second fountain is less in diameter, but deeper than the first, and about ten feet distant. The third is about twenty feet west from the first. These several fountains, which are consecrated as altars by the natives, and from the foot of each of which issues a brisk rill, unite, and form one stream. The streams thus united run eastward, and after varying their direction due north, and receiving many subsidiary rivulets, which add to their strength and size, the river arrives at a mountainous country westward, where it descends a cataract of fifteen feet in height, and sixty yards in breadth. Proceeding forward, it joins the Jemma, about its own size, and passes through the lake Tzana or Dembea, where it still preserves its stream in all its native colour and brightness. After a progress of various, and often contrary, directions, it arrives at a confined situation, between the mountains of Begemder, and soon after reaches the famous cataract near Alata. This affords one of the grandest and most magnificent spectacles in the world. The noise of the Nile, precipitated over this dreadful cataract, resembles the loudest thunder, and may be heard at almost an incredible distance. 'This was a sight,' says Mr. Bruce, 'so astonishing, so truly grand, that ages adduced to the greatest length of human life would not efface or eradicate it from my memory. It struck me with a kind of stupor, and a total oblivion of where I was, and of every other sublunary concern.' The Nile, however, is supposed to have other sources more west, besides those discovered by Mr. Bruce.

After having watered several kingdoms, the Nile continues its course far into the kingdom of Goiam. Then it winds about again, from the east to the north. Having crossed several kingdoms and provinces, it falls into Egypt at the cataracts, which are water-falls made by meeting with steep rocks of the length of two hundred feet.

At the bottom of these rocks the Nile returns to its usual pace, with which it flows through the valley of Egypt. Its channel, according to Villamont, is about a league broad. At eight miles below Grand Cairo, it is divided into two arms, which make a triangle, whose base is at the Mediterranean Sea, and which the Greeks call the Delta, because of its figure Δ . These two arms are divided into others, which discharge themselves into the Mediterranean, whose distance from the top of the Delta is about twenty leagues. These branches of the Nile the ancients commonly reckoned to be seven. Ptolemy makes them nine, some only four, some eleven, some fourteen. Others maintain that there are no more than the mouths of Damietta, of Rozetta, and of the two canals, one of which passes by Alexandria, and the other is very small. Several have thought that the Nile was the Gihon, one of the four rivers mentioned by Moses; but this opinion cannot be supported.

Homer, Xenophon, and Diodorus Siculus testify, that the ancient name of this river was Egyptus; and the last of these writers says, that it took the name Nilus only since the time of a king of Egypt called by that name. In the Scripture, the river Nile has seldom any other name than the river of Egypt. Joshua, (xiii. 3.) and Jeremiah, (ii. 18.) express it by the name of Sihor, and when the Scriptures point out the limits of the Land of Promise, they often put the river of Egypt for its southerly limits.

The Greeks gave it the name of Melas; and Diodorus Siculus observes, that the most ancient name by which the Grecians have known the Nile was Oceanus. The Egyptians paid divine honours to this river, and called it Jupiter Nilus; for which reason some interpreters think that the Lord sometimes threatens in the prophets to smite the river of Egypt, to dry up, and kill its fishes, as it were to show the Egyptians the vanity of their worship, and the impotence of their pretended deity. (Isaiah xi. 15. Ezek. xxix. 3, 4, &c.)

The Nile overflows regularly every year in the month of August, in the Higher and Middle Egypt, where this overflowing is necessary, because it scarcely ever rains there. But in the Lower Egypt the flood is less sensible and less necessary, because it frequently rains there, and the country is sufficiently watered. It is less sensible, because they make fewer dikes there, or receptacles for the water, and the inundation spreading itself equally through all the country, does not rise higher than a cubit through the whole Delta. But in Higher and Middle Egypt, where it rains very seldom, they have made high banks at a league distance, in the midst of which there are deep canals, to receive the waters of the river. They make a breach in these dikes by the authority of the pacha, and when a country is sufficiently watered, the dike is stopped there, and opened in another place; and thus the whole land of Egypt is successively watered, as it were a garden. The Egyptians have often contentions among one another, village against village, to strive which shall have the first distribution of the waters; and when the overflowing comes as they desire, they celebrate a great festival in all parts of the country.

When the Nile overflows only to the perpendicular height of twelve cubits, a famine generally follows in Egypt; nor is the famine less certain if it should exceed sixteen cubits, as Pliny says; so that the just height of the inundation is between twelve and sixteen cubits. The Nilometer is a pillar erected in the middle of the Nile, upon which are marked the degrees of the ascent of the water. There were several of these in different places of the Nile. At this day there is one in the island which divides the Nile into two arms, one of which passes to Cairo, and the other to Gizah.

There has been a great variety of opinions concerning the cause of the overflowing of the Nile. But at present it is ascertained that it is occasioned by the great rains which fall in Ethiopia in the months of June, July, and August, which are the winter months in that country. The soil there is extremely dry and spongy, and at first soaks up the rain; but when it is glutted, the streams and rains supply the Nile with all that water which it distributes throughout Egypt. These waters carry with them much mud, which, by settling, contributes to fatten and enrich the land. When the waters are withdrawn, the culture of the land is easy. The seed is cast on the mud, and, with little tillage, produces great plenty.

'There are,' says Mr. Bruce, 'three remarkable appearances attending the inundation of the Nile. Every morning in Abyssinia is clear, and the sun shines : about nine, a small cloud, not above four feet broad, appears in the east, whirling violently round, as upon an axis ; but, arriving near the zenith, it first abates its motion, then loses its form, and extends itself greatly, and seems to call up vapours from all opposite quarters. These clouds having attained nearly the same height, rush against each other with great violence, and put me always in mind of Elisha foretelling rain on Mount Carmel. The air, impelled before the heaviest mass, or swiftest mover, makes an impression of its own form in the collection of clouds opposite, and the moment it has taken possession of the space made to receive it, the most violent thunder possible to be conceived, instantly follows, with rain ; after some hours, the sky again clears, with a wind at north, and is always disagreeably cold when the thermometer is below 63 degrees.'

Some descriptions of Egypt would lead us to think that the Nile, when it swells, lays the whole province under water. The lands adjoining immediately to the banks of the river are, indeed, laid under water ; but the natural inequality of the ground hinders it from overflowing the interior country. A great part of the lands would, therefore, remain barren, were not canals and reservoirs formed to receive water from the river when at its greatest height, which is thus conveyed every where through the fields, and reserved for watering them when occasion requires.

'It is to be remarked,' observes the Baron du Tott, 'that though this water becomes thick, by washing the clayey soil over which it passes, it appears, when drunk, as light and limpid as the clearest. The Egyptians themselves believe it nourishing, and say, whoever drinks of their river will never remove to any great distance from its banks. The Divine honours which the ancient Egyptians paid to the Nile, and for which the plenty it occasions may be some justification, are, in a manner, still preserved under the Mahometans. They give this river the title of Most Holy ; they likewise honour its increase with all the ceremonies practised by Pagan antiquity. This mud, likewise, is only washed off by the Nile from its two banks, with the clayey part of which it becomes loaded. Its lightness, together with the motion of the waters, keeps the particles suspended, till, at length, the sandy part sinks down, and appears in heaps after a decrease of the inundation. These the industry of the husbandman turns to his advantage, tempering the dryness of the sand with pigeons' dung, and the seeds of water melons, which he sows in it, and gathers an abundant harvest before the returning floods again destroy these fields, and form others in their stead.'

'The Egyptians,' says Volney, 'still retain a religious veneration for the Nile. They call it holy, blessed, sacred ; and, on the appearance of the new waters, that is, on the opening of the canals, mothers are seen plunging their children into the stream, from a belief that these waters have a purifying and divine virtue, such as the ancients attributed to every river. For six months of the year the water of this river is so thick, that it must have time to settle before it can be drunk ; and during the three months which precede the inundation, reduced to an inconsiderable depth, it grows heated, becomes green, fetid, and full of worms ; and it is necessary to have recourse to that which has been before drawn, and preserved in cisterns. At all times, people of delicacy take care to perfume it, and cool it by evaporation. Bitter almonds are made use of to purify the water, with which the vessel is rubbed, and the water then becomes really light and good. Earthen vessels, unglazed, are kept carefully in every apartment, from whence the water continually transpires. This transpiration produces the more coolness in proportion as it is more considerable ; for which reason those vessels are often suspended in passages where there are currents of air, and under the shade of trees. In several parts of Syria they drink the water which has transpired ; in Egypt they drink that which remains ; besides, in no country is so much water used. The first thing an Egyptian does on entering a house, is to lay hold of the kolla (the pitcher of water) and take a hearty draught of it, and, thanks to their perpetual perspiration, they feel no inconvenience from the practice.' Volney's Travels, vol. i. p. 19. Baron du Tott, vol. ii. pp. 24. 31. Niebuhr's Travels, vol. i. p. 87. *Supplement. NIM'ROD, נמרד, Νεμροδ, signifies rebellion, or sleep of descent, or of him that rules ; or dominion. Nimrod, the son of Cush, was a mighty hunter before the Lord. (Gen. x. 8, 9.) He began to monopolize power on the earth, and gave occasion to the proverb, 'like Nimrod, the great hunter before the Lord.' His hunting was not only of wild beasts, but also to subdue men, to reduce them under his dominion. The foundation of the empire of Nimrod was at Babylon ; and, very probably, he was among the most eager undertakers of the Tower of Babel, and built Babylon at, or near, that famous Tower. Thence he extended his dominion over the neighbouring countries, and reigned at Erech, Accad, and Calneh, in the land of Shinar.

Moses says, 'Out of that land went forth Asshur, and builded Nineveh, and the city Rehoboth, and Calah, and Resen, between Nineveh and Calah: the same is a great city.' This Bochart understands still of Nimrod, and translates the Hebrew as follows: From this place he went out to go into Assyria, where he built Nineveh, Rehoboth, Calah, and Resen; that is, when Nimrod had established the beginning of his empire at Babylon, and in the land of Shinar, he advanced towards Assyria, where he built powerful cities, as so many fortresses, to keep the people in subjection.

Nimrod, who first subverted the patriarchal government, introduced also the Sabian idolatry, or worship of the heavenly host. After his death he was deified by his subjects, and supposed to be translated into the constellation of Orion, attended by his hounds, Sirius and Canicula, and still pursuing his favourite game, the great bear, supposed also to be translated into Ursa Major, near the north pole. The Grecian name of this 'mighty hunter' may furnish a satisfactory clue to the name given him by the impious adulation of the Babylonians and Assyrians. Ὠρίων, nearly resembles Οὐρίαν, the oblique case of Οὐρίας, which is the Septuagint rendering of Uriah, a proper name in Scripture. (2 Sam. xi. 6—21.) Uriah, signifying 'the light of the Lord,' was an appropriate appellation of that most brilliant constellation.

Some think he was also called Baal, Beel, Bel, or Belus, signifying 'Lord,' or 'Master,' by the Phœnicians, Assyrians, and Greeks, and Bala Rama, by the Hindus, or Bala, the son of Rama, the Raamah of Scripture. At a village called Bala Deva, or Baldeo, in the vulgar dialect, thirteen miles east by south from Muttra, in Hindustan, there is 'a very ancient statue of Bala Rama, in which he is represented with a ploughshare in his left hand, and a thick cudgel in his right, and his shoulders covered with the skin of a tiger!' Captain Wilford supposes that 'the ploughshare was designed to hook his enemies;' but may it not more naturally denote the constellation of the great bear? Which strikingly represents the figure of a plough in its seven bright stars, and was probably so denominated by the earliest astronomers, before the introduction of the Sabian idolatry, as a celestial symbol of agriculture. The 'thick cudgel' corresponds to the 'brazen mace' of Homer. It is highly probable that the Assyrian Nimrod, or Hindu Bala, was also the prototype of the Grecian Hercules, with his club and lion's skin. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. pp. 50, 51.

NIN'VEH, נִינְוֶה, Nineveh, signifies fair, or well-looking; otherwise, a small habita- tion. Nineveh, the capital of Assyria, was founded by Asshur, son of Shem; or by Nimrod, son of Cush. (Gen. x. 11.) It was one of the most ancient, the most famous, the most potent, and the largest cities of the world. It is very difficult to assign the time of its foundation; but it could not be long after the building of Babel. It stood on the banks of the Tigris; and in the time of the prophet Jonah, who was sent thither under Jeroboam the Second, king of Israel, and, as Calmet thinks, under the reign of Pul, father of Sardanapalus, king of Assyria, Nineveh was a very great city, its circuit being three days' journey. Diodorus Siculus says, it was one hundred and fifty stadia in length, fourscore and ten stadia in breadth, and four hundred and fourscore stadia in circuit; that is, about seven leagues long, three leagues broad, and eighteen leagues round. Its walls were an hundred feet high, and so broad, that three chariots could drive abreast upon them. Its towers, of which there were fifteen hundred, were each two hundred feet high.

Some place it to the west, others to the east of the river Tigris. At the time of Jonah's mission thither, (Jonah iv. 11.) it was reckoned to contain more than six score thousand persons, who could not distinguish their right hand from their left; which is generally explained of young children, that had not yet attained the use of reason. By this reckoning, there ought to have been then in Nineveh more than six hundred thousand persons.

Nineveh was taken by Arbaces and Belesis, in the year of the world 3257, under the reign of king Sardanapalus, in the time of Ahaz, king of Judah, about the time of the foundation of Rome. It was taken a second time by Astyages and Nabopolassar, from Chinaladan, king of Assyria, in the year of the world 3378. Nineveh no more recovered its former splendour. It was entirely ruined in the time of Lucianus Samosatensis, who lived under the emperor Adrian. However, it was rebuilt under the Persians, but was destroyed by the Saracens about the seventh century.

Niebuhr mentions the site of the ancient Nineveh, now called Nunia, as opposite, across the river, to the present Mosul; and here he was shown, upon a hill, a mosque, in which the prophet Jonah is said to be interred. The Tigris is about 300 feet in width: it sometimes rises very rapidly. The number of houses in Nineveh is calculated from 20,000 to 24,000. It has fifteen chans, or places of public resort, where strangers may lodge. The number of Christians may amount to 1200 families: about one fourth of whom are Nestorians, the rest are Jacobites. Few of those born in the city speak the Syriac language; but it is still used in the country villages. The books of devotion are written in the ancient dialect. The Christians and Turks live in remarkable harmony together. The Jews are about 150 families: they are despised and ill treated. In general the country around is fertile; yet the miseries of famine have been severely felt. The terrible winter of 1756, when the Tigris was frozen over for many days, and the locusts of 1757, reduced this district to a deplorable condition. Niebuhr's Travels, vol. ii. p. 286, &c., French edition; Sacred Geography.

NISAN, a Hebrew month, which corresponds with our March, and which sometimes takes from February or April, according to the course of the moon. It was made the first month of the sacred year, at the coming out of Egypt. (Exod. xii. 2.) It was the seventh month of the civil year. By Moses it is called Abib. The name Nisan is only since the time of Ezra, and the return from the captivity of Babylon.

The first day of this month is a fast for the children of Aaron. (Lev. x. 1, 2, 3.) On the tenth day is a fast for the death of Miriam, the sister of Moses; and every one provided himself with a lamb for the passover. On this day the Israelites passed over Jordan under the conduct of Joshua. (Josh. iv. 19.) On the fourteenth day, in the evening, they sacrificed the paschal lamb, and the day following, being the fifteenth, was held the solemn passover. (Exod. xii. 18, &c.) The sixteenth they offered the sheaf of the ears of barley, as the first fruits of the harvest of that year. (Levit. xxiii. 9, &c.) The twenty-first was the octave of the passover, which was solemnized with particular ceremonies. The twenty-sixth the Jews fasted in memory of the death of Joshua. On this day they began their prayers to obtain the rains of the spring. On the 29th they call to mind the fall of the walls of Jericho.

NIS/ROCH, a god of the Assyrians. Sennacherib was killed by two of his sons, whilst in adoration to this god, Nisroch, in his temple. (2 Kings xix. 37.) It is not known who this god Nisroch was. The Septuagint call him Mesrach. Josephus calls him Arakes. The Hebrew of Tobit, published by Munster, calls him Dagon. Some think the word signifies a dove; and others understand by it an eagle, which has given occasion to an opinion that Jupiter Belus, from whom the Assyrian kings pretended to be derived, was worshipped by them under the form of an eagle, and called Nisroch. Our poet Milton gives this name to one of the rebel angels.

NO, NO-AMON, or NO-AMOUN, the Thebes of the ancient geographers, was the metropolis of Upper Egypt. Its Egyptian name was No, (Ezek. xxx. 14.); to which was added Amon, or Amoun, a title of Jupiter among the Egyptians, according to Herodotus. Whence אֲמוֹן should not be rendered 'the multitude of No,' (Jer. xlvi. 25.); but Amon [the god] of No; and which accordingly is rendered Diospolis, 'the city of Jupiter,' by the Septuagint version of Ezekiel. In Nahum (iii. 8.) the Hebrew is reversed, מֵנָה אֲמוֹן [the god] of No, Amon; and then it is variously rendered by the Septuagint 'the portion of Ammon.' The latter appears to be an etymological explanation of the word after the Coptic. In that language NOH signifies a cord, or measuring line, hence a portion measured out; and No-amon, portio, possessio Amonis, that is, the seat of the god Amon, or the place where he was principally worshipped.

It has been mistakenly supposed that the term Amon denoted Ham, the youngest son of Noah, and the father of Mizraim. Its real signification is truth or veracity, whence the Lord is styled Āel Amunah, 'God of truth.' (Deut. xxxii. 4.) According to Plato, 'the secret, invisible, creative power supreme, among the Egyptians, was called Ammon;' and Plutarch agrees that it signified 'hidden.' This also was an epithet of the true God: 'Why askest thou my name, seeing it is secret?' (Judg. xiii. 18.) Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. i. p. 378; Jablonskii Opuscula, tom. i. pp. 163—168; Gibbs's Heb. Lex. p. 406; Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 607.

NO'AH, נֹחַ, Nōē, signifies that quavers or totters; or, repose, or rest; otherwise consolation. Noah or Noe, son of Lamech, was born in the year of the world 1056. Amidst the general corruption of mankind, Noah found favour in the eyes of the Lord. God, seeing that all men had corrupted their ways, said to Noah, The end of all flesh is come before me, for the earth is filled with violence through them; and, behold, I will destroy them with the earth. Make thee an ark of gopher wood, &c. for thy preservation, and that of animals, plants, &c.

Noah performed what the Lord had commanded him; and in the year of the world 1656, God caused all the animals to come to Noah into the ark; after which he ordered him to go in himself, with his wife, his three sons, and their wives. Noah was then six hundred years old. Presently the waters of the Deluge began to fall, inasmuch that whatever had life on the earth, or in the air, was destroyed, except such animals as were with Noah in the ark.

The Lord, remembering Noah, caused the waters to diminish; so that the ark rested on the mountains of Ararat. The tenth day of the tenth month, the tops of the mountains began to appear. After forty days Noah let go the raven, who went out of the ark, and returned according to the Hebrew, or returned not, according to the Septuagint and the Vulgate; or he went out, and went and came, flying about the ark, and alighting upon its roof. Afterwards Noah sent forth the dove, which not finding a place to set his foot, returned into the ark again. Seven days after, he sent it out again, and it returned in the evening, bringing in its mouth a branch of the olive tree, having green leaves upon it, which the tree had produced since the assuaging of the waters. He stayed yet seven days longer; then he uncovered the roof of the ark; and observing the whole surface of the earth was dry, he received orders from the Lord to go out of the ark, with all the animals. He therefore came out in the six hundred and first year of his age, and the twenty-seventh day of the second month.

Then he offered as a burnt sacrifice to the Lord one of all the pure animals that were in the ark; and the Lord accepted his sacrifice, and promised to bring no more a deluge over the earth, of which promise the sign he gave to Noah was the rainbow.

Noah being an husbandman cultivated the vine; having made wine and drunk of it, he unwarily became inebriated, and, falling asleep in his tent, happened to uncover himself indecently. Ham, the father of Canaan, discovering him in this condition, made sport of him, and jeered with his two brothers; but they, instead of sporting, going backwards, covered their father's nakedness, by throwing a mantle over him. Noah awaking, and knowing what Ham had done, foretold the doom of slavery to Ham and his posterity; but he blessed his other sons.

Noah lived after the Deluge three hundred and fifty years; his whole life was nine hundred and fifty years. He died in the year of the world 2006. He left three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth; and according to the common opinion, he divided the whole world among them. To Shem he gave Asia; to Ham Africa; and to Japheth Europe. Some say, that, besides these three sons, he had several others. The spurious Berosus gives him thirty, called Titans, from the name of their mother Titæa. They pretend that the Teutons or Germans are derived from a son of Noah called Thuiskon. The false Methodius also makes mention of Jonithus, or Jonicus, a pretended son of Noah.

St. Peter called Noah a preacher of righteousness, (2 Pet. ii. 5.); because before the Deluge he was incessantly declaring to men, not only by his discourses, but by his unblamable life, and by the building of the ark, in which he was employed six-score years, the coming of the wrath of God. (Matt. xxiv. 37.)

Several learned men have observed that the Pagans confounded Saturn, Deucalion, Ogyges, the god Cœlus, or Ouranus, Janus, Proteus, Prometheus, Vertumnus, Bacchus, Osiris, Vadimon, and Xisuthrus, with Noah. The fable of Deucalion and his wife Pyrrha is manifestly derived from the history of Noah.

NOD, נוד, signifies vagabond. Nod, or the land of Nod, whither Cain retired after the murder of his brother, cannot easily be ascertained; but it is generally reckoned by the Oriental geographers to have been the low country of Susiana, or Chusistan. Jerome and the Chaldee understand the word Nod, in the sense of an appellative, a vagabond, or fugitive, that is, a wanderer on the earth. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. p. 33.

NOETIANS, a denomination that arose in the third century, and were the followers of Noetus, who pretended that he was another Moses sent by God, and that his brother was a new Aaron. He affirmed that the Supreme God, whom he called the Father, and considered as absolutely indivisible, united himself to the man Christ, whom he called the Son, and was born and crucified with him. From this opinion Noetus and his followers were distinguished by the title of Patripassians; that is, persons who believe that the Supreme Father of the universe, and not any other divine person, had expiated the guilt of the human race. Mosheim's Eccles. History, vol. i. pp. 246, 247; Broughton's Dictionary of all Religions, vol. ii. p. 172.

NOPH, נפ, signifies distillation, or honey-comb, or sieve, or elevation. Noph, or Memphis, was a very famous city of Egypt, and was long the residence of the kings of Egypt, till the times of the Ptolemies, who removed the seat of government to Alexandria. It was situated about fifteen thousand paces above the parting of the Nile, or where the Delta begins. Above Memphis, south, were the famous pyramids. In this city they fed the ox Apis. The kings of Egypt took great pleasure in adorning Memphis. It continued in its beauty till the Arabians conquered Egypt under Caliph Omar, in the eighteenth or nineteenth year of the Hegira, A.D. 640. Amron Ben-as, who took it, built another city near it, which he called Fusthat, because of the tent of this general, which was long set up in this place. The Fatimite caliphs, who became masters of Egypt, added another city near it, which is known at this day by the name of Grand Cairo. But it must be observed, that the ancient Memphis stood on the western shore of the Nile, and that which the Arabians have built is on the eastern shore.

Noph is called by the Arabs at the present day Menoph, whence Memphis, which is the Septuagint rendering of Noph, in Jer. xlv. 14. and other places. Abenephius, quoted by Kircher, (Œdip. tom. i. p. 27.) reports that Memphis is by the Coptis called Monphtha, that is, water of God, or, as Kircher explains it, God or Deity of the water, that is, perhaps, issuing from the water. Plutarch, in Iside, however, informs us, that Memphin denotes the entrance or gate of good. The explication of the Coptic name for this city, as given by Jablonski, agrees very well with this representation of Plutarch; for he translates, meh full, nouph good: whence 'full of good' seems to be the import of the name. For the same name we have in Kircher Menouph, or, without the article, Nouph, agreeing with the Hebrew Noph.

Noph, Menoph, or Memphis, was situated somewhat above the vertex of the Delta, or parting of the channels of the Nile, on quitting Upper Egypt. The founder of Memphis, according to Herodotus, was Menes, the first king of Egypt, who turned the channel of the river, and built the city in the ancient bed, where the streight between the Arabian and Libyan mountains is narrowest. It was probably, therefore, the most ancient city of Lower Egypt.

The prophets often mention this city, and predict the calamities which it was to suffer from the kings of Chaldæa and Persia. (Isai. xix. 13. Jer. xlv. 1. Hosea ix. 6. Ezek. xxx. 13. 16.) It is now completely destroyed; and the spot on which it stood is not certainly known. Jeremiah had foretold ages before, that Noph should 'be waste and desolate, without an inhabitant,' (xlv. 19.); and not a family or cottage is said to remain. Hales's Analysis of Chronology, vol. i. p. 376. Taylor's Sacred Geography.

NOVATIANS, the followers of Novatian, a priest of Rome, and of Novatus, a priest of Carthage, in the third century. They were distinguished merely by their discipline; for their religious and doctrinal tenets do not appear to be at all different from those of the church. They condemned second marriages, and for ever excluded from their communion all those who after baptism had fallen into sin. They affected very superior purity; and, though they conceived a sinner might possibly hope for eternal life, they absolutely refused to re-admit into their communion any who had lapsed into sin. They separated from the church of Rome, because the members of it admitted into their communion many who had during a season of persecution rejected the Christian faith. Gregory's Hist. of the Christian Church, vol. i. p. 136.

NUMBERS, the fourth book of the Pentateuch, and is denominated Numbers from the numbering of the families of Israel by Moses and Aaron. The Hebrews call it וידבר Vajedabber, and he spoke, because in the Hebrew it begins with these words.

The book of Numbers contains an account of the numbering of the people of Israel, both in the beginning of the second year after their departure out of Egypt, and at the conclusion of their journey in the wilderness. It comprehends a period of about thirty-eight years, but most of the events related in it happened in the first and last of those years. The dates of the facts recorded in the middle of the book cannot be precisely ascertained. The principal contents of this book, besides the numbering of the people already noticed, are, the consecration of the tabernacle; the encampments of the Israelites, with a relation of the circumstances which attended their wandering in the wilderness; a repetition of several of the principal laws which had been before given to the Israelites, with an addition of some new precepts, both civil and religious; an enumeration of the twelve tribes, and directions for the division of the land of Canaan, of which they were about to take possession.

This book contains only one prediction concerning the Messiah, (Numb. xxiv. 17. 19.) which Rosenmüller and some other eminent biblical critics have contended, cannot apply to Jesus Christ. This passage, it is true, in its primary and literal meaning, intimates that from the people of Israel should arise a mighty prince, who would obtain an entire conquest, and bear rule over the kingdoms of Moab and Edom; and it was fulfilled in David, for it is expressly recorded of him, that he finally subdued those nations. (2 Sam. viii. 2. 14.) But, in its full import, it has invariably been considered as referring to that illustrious Personage, of whom David was a type and a progenitor; and, in fact, it is a splendid prediction of the final and universal sway of the Messiah, when the middle wall of partition shall be broken down, and both Jews and Gentiles shall become one fold under one Shepherd. Rabbi Moses ben Maimon has, in my opinion, says Dr. Adam Clarke, perfectly hit the meaning of the prophecy in the following paraphrase: 'I shall see him, but not now;' this is David. 'I shall behold him, but not nigh;' this is the King Messiah. 'A star shall come out of Jacob;' this is David. 'And a sceptre shall rise out of Israel;' this is the King Messiah. 'And shall smite the corners of Moab;' this is David, as it is written, 'He smote Moab; casting them down to the ground.' (2 Sam. viii. 2.) 'And shall destroy all the children of Sheth;' this is the King Messiah, of whom it is written, 'He shall have dominion from sea to sea.' (Psal. lxxii. 8.) Dr. Hales observes, that Balaam here, in prophetic vision, describes the remote coming of Shiloh, under the imagery of a star and a sceptre, or an illustrious prince. Though it was foretold that 'the sceptre should depart from Judah' at his coming, yet this prophecy confirms to him a proper sceptre of his own; and our Lord claimed it when he avowed himself 'a King' to Pilate, but declared that 'his kingdom was not of this world.' (John xviii. 36, 37.) This branch of the prophecy was fulfilled about 1600 years after, when, at the birth of Christ, 'the Magi from the East' (who are supposed by Theophylact to have been the posterity of Balaam) came to Jerusalem, saying, 'Where is the [true] born King of the Jews? for we have seen his star, at its rising, and are come to worship him.' (Matt. ii. 2.) Hales's Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. p. 229.; Dr. Adam Clarke's Commentary on Numb. xxiv. 17.; Horne's Introduction, vol. iv. p. 17.; Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. i. pp. 79, 80.

OAT

OATH, a solemn invocation of a Superior Power, supposed to be acquainted with all the secrets of our hearts, with our inward thoughts as well as our outward actions, to witness the truth of what we assert, and to inflict his vengeance upon us if we assert what is not true, or promise what we do not mean to perform. Almost all nations, whether savage or civilized, whether enjoying the light of revelation, or led only by the light of reason, knowing the importance of truth, and willing to obtain a barrier against falsehood, have had recourse to oaths, by which they have endeavoured to make men fearful of uttering lies under the dread of an avenging Deity. Among Christians, an oath is a solemn appeal for the truth of our assertions, the sincerity of our promises, and the fidelity of our engagements, to the one only God, the maker of heaven and earth, who is every where present, and sees, and hears, and knows, whatever is said, or done, or thought, in any part of the world. Such is that Being whom Christians, when they take an oath, invoke to bear testimony to the truth of their words, and the integrity of their hearts. Surely, then, if oaths be a matter of so much moment, it well behoves us not to treat them with levity, nor ever to take them without due consideration. Hence we ought, with the utmost vigilance, to abstain from mingling oaths in our ordinary discourse, and from associating the name of God with low or disgusting images, or using it on trivial occasions.

In the present corrupt state of society, oaths, which are intended as corroborants of virtue, are rendered necessary by vice. If all men were habitually to speak truth, there would be no need of oaths to deter them from speaking falsehood. Oaths were designed to operate as a restraint on falsehood; for they forcibly impress on men's minds the inviolable sanctity of truth, and remind them of the punishment which awaits them if they speak lies. But then the familiar use of oaths must inevitably diminish their solemnity, and invalidate their force. Hence the Scripture requires us to let our conversation be Yes, yes, and No, no; and never to have recourse to oaths, except on great occasions, when they are required by the laws of our country, or men are not willing on any other terms to give credit to our testimony, or to attach validity to our promises. An oath does not of itself constitute the truth of our assertions, or the sincerity of our promises. Its use is to give us a solemn premonition against falsehood and insincerity, and to prevent us from making false assertions and false promises, from want of due consideration; and thus it affords the strongest pledge which we can give, of our truth and sincerity. The Scriptures, though they forbid us to swear falsely, and to swear at all on trifling occasions, do not forbid the use of oaths in cases when they can be made subservient to the support of truth, and the interest of justice. Moses says, 'Thou shalt fear the Lord thy God, and shalt serve him, and shalt swear by his name.' (Deut. vi. 13.) 'Thou shalt swear the Lord liveth,' says Jeremiah, 'in truth, and in judgment, and in righteousness.' (Jerem. iv. 2.) Our Saviour himself, when 'adjoined by the living God,' to say whether he were the Christ, the Son of God, did not refuse to answer the question thus solemnly and judicially put to him by the high-priest; but he certainly would have remained silent, if he had disapproved all asseverations upon oath, or all such solemn invocations of, and appeals to, the name of God, in cases where the truth is doubtful, or the testimony is suspected. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews says, that 'an oath is intended as a confirmation of the truth, and to put an end to all strife.' (Heb. vi. 16.)

Whenever we are required to take an oath, we ought not to do it without due caution and deliberation. We ought soberly to reflect on the infinite perfections of Him by whose name we swear, on his love of truth, and his utter abhorrence of falsehood. To swear falsely, is to be guilty of treason against God; to deny his knowledge, or to defy his power. As false-swearing is a crime of such magnitude, which provokes God's wrath, and brings down his heaviest judgments upon us, we ought to be very wary that we do not swear what is not conformable to truth; that we do not assert that which is not, nor deny that which is; that we do not declare what we do not know, nor promise what we do not mean to perform. Hence, when we take an oath, we ought to take it in the plain sense of the words, without any secret subterfuges, or mental reservations, without any insidious ambiguities or sly prevarications, which tend to defeat the obvious intent of an oath, or to elude the force of its obligations. When we take an oath, we should be scrupulously attentive that it be not done without necessity, but only when some important interest of truth, justice, or charity, requires it; and, consequently, no oath ought to be taken, of which the matter is contrary to good morals, or which he, who takes it, cannot take with the full approbation of his conscience.

Let us consider how unseemly and superfluous oaths are in common conversation, in which they so much abound. Let me ask those who are so lavish in their application, do they add any beauty to their discourse? Are they, like figures of rhetoric, ornaments of speech? Do they give splendour or dignity to our expressions, and thus operate on the mind by interesting the imagination? Are they in the least necessary in our rational conversation? Do they serve to illustrate what is obscure, or unravel what is intricate, to fathom what is profound? Do they give clearness to our explanations, or cogency to our arguments? If we were relating any matter of fact, except in cases where we are obliged to submit to judicial forms, may we not be believed on our simple affirmation? Can oaths make our assertions more credible? Do they not rather, when interposed without necessity, and sworn without being exacted, tend to impeach that credibility, and to render our veracity suspected? For how can we help distrusting his veracity, who is continually seeking such props for his assertions? The affirmation of a Christian ought to be as sacred as his oath. For what man, who believes in a judgment to come, when he will have to render up a strict account of every thought, word, and deed, will dare, wilfully and knowingly, to utter that which is false, and to pollute his tongue with lies?

Let me ask, what is it that men gain by interlarding their speech with oaths, and profaning the name of God with their lips? Is there any pleasure or any profit in the practice? Some transient pleasure or profit may result from other transgressions, but surely this is without any? For it gratifies none of the perverse, the vain, or sensual propensities of our nature. It may add strength to our malevolence, but it affords no gratification to our sensuality. It does not produce a single pleasurable sensation; but if it produces no pleasure, it will, in its consequences, be found to generate much pain. If other sinners derive, in this world, any emolument from their unrighteousness, surely the swearer is the most improvident of all transgressors, for he parteth with eternity, without obtaining any thing like a temporal satisfaction? With our lips we ought to glorify God, to confess our admiration of his wonderful perfections, and to express our gratitude for his infinite goodness. But instead of this employment, which is worthy of a rational nature, shall we make our tongue the organ of blasphemy, and, instead of making it vocal with adoration, use it to revile the Maker of the universe? Let us endeavour to apply the good gifts of God to their right uses and their proper ends. Let us cherish the love of God in our hearts, and then we shall not readily utter his name unadvisedly with our lips. Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. ii. pp. 282—297.

OBADI'AH, עֲבַדִּיָּה, Ὀβιδίας, signifies a slave, or labourer of the Lord. Obadiah, the prophet, is thought, by some, to have been the same as the governor of Ahab's house; (1 Kings xviii. 3, &c.) and some are of opinion, he was that Obediah whom Josiah made overseer of the works of the temple. (2 Chron. xxxiv. 12.) Indeed, the age in which this prophet lived is very uncertain. Some think that he was contemporary with Hosea, Amos, and Joel; whilst others are of opinion, that he lived in the time of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and that he delivered his prophecy about the year 585 before Christ, soon after the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. This book, which consists of a single chapter, is written with great beauty and elegance, and contains predictions of the utter destruction of the Edomites, and of the future restoration and prosperity of the Jews. Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. i. p. 123.

OB'ED-E'DOM, עֲבֵד־אֶדֹם, signifies the slave of Edom, or the Idumean; or, labourer of the man of red, or earthy. Obed-edom, was son of Jeduthun, a Levite, (1 Chron. xvi. 38.) and father of Shemaiah, Jehozabad, Joab, Sacar, Nethaneel, Ammiel, Issachar, and Peulthai. He had a numerous family, (1 Chron. xxvi. 4.) because the Lord blessed him. After the death of Uzzah, David, terrified at that accident, durst not remove the ark into the place he had provided for it in his own house, but left it in the house of Obed-edom, near the place where Uzzah was struck dead. The presence of the ark became a blessing to Obed-edom, which encouraged David some months after to remove it to the place he had appointed for it. Afterwards, Obed-edom and his sons were assigned to the keeping of the doors of the temple. (1 Chron. xv. 18. 21.) In the second book of Samuel, (vi. 10.) Obed-edom is called the Gittite, probably because he was of Gathrimmon, a city of the Levites beyond Jordan. (Josh. xxi. 24, 25.)

O'DED, עדר, signifies to sustain, to hold, to lift up. Oded was a prophet of the Lord, (2 Chron. xxviii. 9.) who being at Samaria when the Israelites returned from the war against Judah, with their king Pekah, and brought 200,000 captives, went to meet them, and remonstrated effectually with them, so that they sent back their captives. The principal men of Samaria took care of them, gave them clothes, food, and other assistances; after which, they furnished them with horses, because the greater part of them were exhausted and unable to walk. Thus they conducted them to Jericho, which was in the confines of Judah.

OFFERINGS. The Hebrews had several kinds of offerings, which they presented at the temple. Some were free-will offerings; others were of obligation. The first fruits, the tenths, the sin-offerings, were of obligation; the peace offerings, vows, offerings of wine, oil, bread, salt, and other things, made to the temple, or to the ministers of the Lord, were offerings of devotion. The Hebrews called offerings, in general, Corban. But the offerings of bread, salt, fruits, and liquors, as wine and oil, presented to the temple, they called Mincha. Sacrifices are not properly offerings; nor are they commonly included under this name.

Offerings of grain, meal, bread, cakes, fruits, wine, salt, oil, were common in the temple. Sometimes these offerings were alone; sometimes they accompanied the sacrifices. Honey was never offered with the sacrifices, but it might be offered alone, as first fruits. (Lev. ii. 11, 12.) These were the rules observed in the presenting of those offerings called Mincha, or Korban Mincha; in the Septuagint, offerings of sacrifice, and the same by Jerome, oblationem sacrificii; but by our translators, 'meat offerings.' (Lev. ii. 1, &c.) There were five sorts of these offerings: 1. fine flour or meal; 2. cakes of several sorts, baked in an oven; 3. cakes baked upon a plate; 4. another sort of cakes baked upon a plate with holes in it; 5. the first fruits of the new corn, which were offered either pure and without mixture, or roasted, or parched, in the ear, or out of the ear.

The cakes were kneaded with olive-oil, or fried in oil in a pan, or only dipped in oil after they were baked. The bread offered on the altar was to be without leaven; for leaven was never offered on the altar, nor with the sacrifices. (Lev. ii. 11, 12.) But they might make presents of common bread to the priests and ministers of the temple.

These offerings were appointed in favour of the poor, who could not afford the charge of sacrificing animals. Those also who offered living victims were not excused from giving meal, wine, and salt, which were to accompany the greater sacrifices. Those who offered only oblations of bread or of meal, offered also oil, incense, salt, and wine, which were in a manner their seasoning. The priest in waiting received the offerings from the hand of him who offered them; laid a part upon the altar; and reserved the rest for his own subsistence, as a minister of the Lord. Nothing was wholly burnt up but the incense, of which the priest retained none. (Lev. ii. 2. 13. Numb. xv. 4, 5.)

When an Israelite offered a loaf to the priest, or a whole cake, the priest broke it into two parts, setting aside that part he reserved to himself, and broke the other into crumbs, poured upon it oil, salt, wine, and incense, and spread the whole upon the fire of the altar. If these offerings were accompanied by an animal for a sacrifice, the whole was thrown upon the victim, to be consumed with it.

If these offerings were ears of new corn, (wheat or barley,) these ears were parched at the fire, or in the flame, and rubbed in the hand, and then offered to the priest in a vessel; over which he put oil, incense, wine, and salt, and then burnt it upon the altar, having first taken his own portion. (Lev. ii. 14, 15.)

The greater part of these offerings were voluntary, and of pure devotion. But when an animal was offered in sacrifice, they were not at liberty to omit these offerings. Every thing proper was to accompany the sacrifice, and what served as seasoning to the victim. In some cases the law required offerings only of corn, or bread; as, when they offered the first fruits of their harvest, whether offered solemnly by the nation, or as the devotion of private persons.

As to the quantity of meal, oil, wine, or salt, to accompany the sacrifices, the law does not appear to determine it. Generally, the priest threw a handful of meal, or crumbs, on the fire of the altar, with wine, oil, and salt in proportion, and all the incense. The rest belonged to himself; the quantity depended on the liberality of the offerer. Moses appoints an assaron, or the tenth part of an ephah of meal, for those who were unable to offer the appointed sin-offerings. (Lev. v. 11; xiv. 21.) In the solemn offerings of the first fruits for the whole nation, they offered an entire sheaf of corn, a lamb of a year old, two tenths or two assarons of fine meal mixed with oil, and a quarter of an hin of wine for the libation. (Lev. xxiii. 10, 11, 12, &c.; Numb. v. 15.)

In the sacrifice of jealousy, when a jealous husband accused his wife of infidelity, the husband offered the tenth part of a satum of barley-meal, without oil or incense, because it was a sacrifice of jealousy.

Offerings of fruits of the earth, of bread, of wine, oil, and salt, are the most ancient of any that have come to our knowledge. (Gen. iv. 3, 4.) Cain offered to the Lord fruits of the earth, the first fruits of his labour. Abel offered firstlings of his flocks, and of their fat. The heathen religions have nothing more ancient than these sorts of offerings made to their gods. They offered clean wheat, flour, and bread.

OG, og signifies a cake, bread baked in the ashes. Og, king of Bashan, was a giant, of the race of the Rephaim. We may judge of his stature by the length of his bed, which was long preserved in Rabbath, the capital of the Ammonites. (Deut. iii. 11.) It was nine cubits long, and four cubits broad; that is, fifteen feet four inches long, and six feet ten inches broad.

Moses says, (Numb. xxi. 33.) that after having conquered Sihon, king of the Amorites, he advanced toward the country of Bashan, in which reigned king Og, who marched against him to Edrei, with all his subjects; Og was conquered, and slain, with his children and all his people. Og and Sihon were the only kings that withstood Moses. Their countries were given to the tribes of Gad, Reuben, and to the half tribe of Manasseh.

OLIVES, THE MOUNT OF, is situated east of Jerusalem, and separated from the city by the brook Kidron, and by the valley of Jehoshaphat. On this mount Solomon built temples to the gods of the Ammonites and Moabites, out of complaisance to his wives. (1 Kings xi. 7.) Hence, the Mount of Olives is called the mountain of corruption. (2 Kings xxiii. 13.) Josephus says, that this mountain is five stadia (or furlongs) from Jerusalem; 625 geometrical paces; a sabbath-day's journey, says St. Luke. (Acts i. 12.) The Mount of Olives has three summits, ranging from north to south: from the middle summit, our Saviour ascended into heaven; on the south summit, Solomon built temples to his idols; the north summit is distant two furlongs from the middlemost.

This is the highest, and is commonly called Galilee.

In the time of king Uzziah, the Mount of Olives was so shattered by an earthquake, that half of the earth, on the western side, fell, and rolled four furlongs, or five hundred paces, towards the opposite mountain on the east; so that the earth blocked up the highways, and covered the king's gardens.

The Mount of Olives, says Dr. Wittman, is a very steep hill on the east of Jerusalem; the valley of Jehoshaphat lying between the mount and the city. The small building, erected over the place of Ascension, is contiguous to a Turkish mosque, and is in possession of the Turks, who show it for profit, and subject the Christians to an annual contribution for permission to officiate within it on Ascension-day. From the mosque we had a fine and commanding view of Jerusalem, Mount Zion, and the Dead Sea.

Mr. Maundrell tells us, that he and his company going out of Jerusalem, at St. Stephen's gate, and crossing the valley of Jehoshaphat, began immediately to ascend the mountain; that, being got above two-thirds of the way up, they came to certain grottos, cut with intricate windings and caverns under ground, which were called the sepulchres of the prophets; that a little higher up were twelve arched vaults under ground, standing side by side, and built in memory of the apostles, who are said to have compiled their creed in this place; that sixty paces higher, they came to the place where Christ is said to have uttered his prophecy concerning the final destruction of Jerusalem; and a little on the right hand, to another, where he is said to have dictated a second time the Lord's Prayer to his disciples; that rather higher is the cave of a saint called Pelagia; a little above that a pillar, denoting the place where an angel gave the blessed Virgin three days' warning of her death; and at the top of all, the place of our blessed Lord's ascension. Wells's Geography of the Old and New Testament, vol. ii. p. 190; Sacred Geography.

OMRI, עמרי, αμβρι, signifies sheaf, or bundle of corn; or, rebellion; or, bitter. Omri was general of the army of Elah, king of Israel. Being at the siege of Gibbethon, and hearing that his master Elah was assassinated by Zimri, who had usurped his kingdom, he raised the siege of Gibbethon, and, being elected king by his army, marched against Zimri, attacked him at Tirzah, and forced him to burn himself and all his family in the palace in which he had shut himself up. Zimri reigned only seven days, in the year of the world 3075. (1 Kings xvi. 9.)

After the death of Zimri, half of Israel acknowledged Omri for king; the other half adhered to Tibni the son of Ginath. This division continued four years. When Tibni was dead, the people united again in acknowledging Omri as king of all Israel, who reigned twelve years; six years at Tirzah, and six at Samaria.

Till that time Tirzah had been the chief residence of the kings of Israel. But when Omri purchased the hill of Shemer, (1 Kings xvi. 24.) about the year of the world 3080, for two talents of silver, (6841.) he there built a new city, which he called Samaria, from the name of the first possessor Shemer, and in which he fixed his royal seat. From this time Samaria was the capital of the kingdom of the ten tribes.

Omri did evil before the Lord, and his crimes exceeded those of his predecessors. He walked in all the ways of Jeroboam the son of Nebat. He died at Samaria in the year of the world 3086. His successor was Ahab.

O'NAN, אֲנָן, anân, signifies pain, strength, power, iniquity. Onan was son of Judah, and grandson of the patriarch Jacob. Judah having given a young woman named Tamar to his eldest son Er for a wife, Er died without children. Judah then caused his second son Onan to marry Tamar, that he might raise successors to his brother. But Onan seeing that the children begotten by him would be deemed to belong to his brother, withheld from Tamar the means of becoming a mother. This was so displeasing to the Lord, that he caused him to die (Gen. xxxviii. 6, 7, &c.); probably by some extraordinary malady.

ONESIMUS, Ὀνήσιμος, signifies useful. Onesimus was a Phrygian by nation, a slave to Philemon, and a disciple of the apostle Paul. Onesimus, having run away from his master, and also, probably, having robbed him, (Philem. 18.) went to Rome while St. Paul was there in prison the first time. As Onesimus knew him by repute (his master Philemon being a Christian), he sought him out, acquainted him with what he had done, owned his flight, and did him all the service Philemon himself could have done, had he been at Rome. St. Paul brought him to a sense of the greatness of his crime, instructed him, converted him, baptized him, and sent him back to his master Philemon, with a letter inserted among St. Paul's Epistles, which is universally acknowledged as canonical.

This letter had all the success he could desire. Philemon not only received Onesimus as a faithful servant, but as a brother and a friend; and, after a little time, he sent him back to Rome to St. Paul, that he might continue his services to him in his prison. After this, Onesimus carried such epistles as the Apostle wrote at that time; as that to the Colossians, A.D. 62.

ONESIPH'ORUS, Ὀνησιφόρος, signifies who brings profit. Onesiphorus, mentioned honourably by St. Paul, (2 Tim. i. 16.) came to Rome whilst Paul was in prison there for the faith, and at a time when almost every one had forsaken the Apostle. (2 Tim. i. 16, 17.) He arrived there from Asia, where he had already been very serviceable to the church. Having found St. Paul in bonds, after long seeking him, he often assisted him to the utmost of his power. For this reason the Apostle wishes all sort of benedictions on himself and his family.

O'PHIR, אֹפִיר, signifies ashes. Ophir was the son of Joktan. Moses says, (Gen. x. 26—30.) that the dwelling of the sons of Joktan extended from Mesha to Sephar, a mountain of the East. Calmet thinks Mesha to be Mount Masius in Mesopotamia; and Sephar the country of the Sepharvites, or Saspire, which divided Media from Colchis. The Scripture does not acquaint us who were the descendants of Ophir, nor what particular province was peopled by him between Mesha and Sephar; but it cannot be doubted that the country of Ophir, whatever country that was, was peopled by the posterity of Ophir, son of Joktan.

OPHIR, a country which is much celebrated in Scripture, and about which critics have proposed a great number of conjectures. It is agreed, with great reason, that this country was peopled by Ophir, son of Joktan, just mentioned; and Moses informs us that the thirteen sons of Joktan dwelt from Mesha to Sephar, a mountain of the east. (Gen. x. 30.) But as Mesha and Sephar are as much unknown as Ophir itself, we must take another method to discover Ophir. All the passages have been examined which mention this country, (1 Kings xxii. 48. 2 Chron. xx. 36. 1 Kings ix. 28.; x. 22.); and it has been observed, that the same ships that went to Tarshish, went also to Ophir; that these ships set out from Ezion-geber, a port of the Red Sea (1 Kings xxii. 48.; ix. 28.; x. 22.); that three years were required for Solomon's fleet to make the voyage of Ophir; that this fleet returned freighted with gold, peacocks, apes, spices, ivory, and ebony (1 Kings ix. 28.; x. 21, 22. 2 Chron. viii. 18.; ix. 10, &c.); lastly, that the gold of Ophir was in the highest esteem, and that the country of Ophir more abounded with gold than any then known. By these tokens interpreters have undertaken to search for Ophir, but almost all have taken different ways.

Josephus says that the country of Ophir is in the Indies, and is called the Gold Country. It is thought he means Chersonesus Aurea, known now by the name of Malacca, a peninsula opposite to Sumatra. Lucas Holstenius, after many inquiries, thinks we must fix on India in general, or the city of Supar, in the island of Celebes. Some place it in the kingdom of Malabar, or of Ceylon, or in the isle of Tapobrana, so famous among the ancients. Bochart has laboured to support this opinion. Eupolemus has placed Ophir in the island Durphe, in the Red Sea. Maffeus believed it was Pegu; and it is said that the Peguans pretend to be descended from those Jews, whom Solomon sent to work the mines of this country. Lepinus, who has composed a treatise concerning the country of Ophir, places it beyond the Ganges, at Malacca, Java, Sumatra, Siam, Bengal, Pegu, &c. Some have sought for Ophir in America, and have placed it in the island Hispaniola. Postel and some others have placed it in Peru, a country famous for its vast quantity of gold. Some have searched for it in Africa, on the eastern coast of Ethiopia. Some place it at Angola, on the western coast of Africa, some at Carthage, and others in Spain.

Grotius guesses, that Solomon's fleet did not perhaps go to the Indies, but only to a port of Arabia, by Arrian called Aphar, by Pliny Saphar, by Ptolemy Sapphera, and by Stephanus Saphiniri. This city was situated on the coasts of Arabia that were washed by the ocean. That the Indians brought their merchandises thither, and that Solomon's navy went thither to bring them home. Huetius, in his Dissertation on the navigation of Solomon, says, the land of Ophir was on the eastern coast of Africa, which the Arabians call Zanguebar; that the name Ophir was given more particularly to the small country of Sofala, which is on the same coast; that Solomon's fleet went out of the Red Sea, and from the harbour of Ezion-geber, entered into the Mediterranean Sea by a canal of communication; that it doubled the Cape of Guardafui, and coasted along Africa to Sofala; that there was found in abundance whatever was brought to Solomon by this voyage. Mr. Bruce has endeavoured to support this opinion by a variety of very ingenious arguments; especially the names of places on the coast, and the courses of the winds; and it must be allowed that the opinion of Huetius seems to be the most probable.

Calmet appears to be singular in his opinion on this subject. He places Ophir in some part of Armenia, not far from the sources of the Tigris and Euphrates. To obviate the objections that this country does not border on the sea, and is not sufficiently distant for a three years' voyage, he supposes that Solomon's fleet sailed on a trading voyage, and that in no one place it obtained all the commodities which it brought home: on the coast of Ethiopia it procured apes, ebony, and parrots; in Arabia, ivory and spices; and at Ophir, gold. Though this Ophir was not a maritime country, yet he thinks that the gold it produced might be brought by land to some parts of the Tigris and Euphrates.

Before the reign of David, the Hebrews did not apply themselves to trade by sea; but after David had conquered Idumæa, and was become master of Elath, and of Ezion-geber, upon the Red Sea, he considered the advantage their situation afforded for trade on the ocean. Solomon's successors, the kings of Judah, who possessed Idumæa, carried on this traffic; they used the port of Ezion-geber down to the times of Jehoshaphat.

ORACLE is by some taken for mercy-seat, or the cover of the ark of the covenant; and by others it is taken for the sanctuary, or for the most holy place, in which the ark was deposited, and finally, it is taken for the oracles of false gods, the most famous of which in Palestine was that of Baalzebub. There were also teraphim, as that of Micah. (Judg. xvii. 1. 5.)

Among the Jews are distinguished several sorts of oracles: 1. Oracles delivered viva voce; as when God spake to Moses face to face, and as one friend to another. (Numb. xii. 8.) 2. Prophetical dreams from God, as the dreams which God sent to Joseph, and which foretold his future greatness. (Gen. xxxvii. 5, 6.) 3. Visions; as when a prophet in an ecstasy had supernatural revelations. (Gen. xv. 1.; xlv. 25.) 4. The oracle of Urim and Thummim, which accompanied the ephod, or the pectoral, worn by the high-priest (Numb. xii. 6. Joel ii. 28.): this manner of inquiring of the Lord was often used, from Joshua's time to the erection of the temple at Jerusalem. (1 Sam. xxiii. 9.; xxx. 7.) 5. After the building of the temple they generally consulted the prophets, who were frequent in the kingdoms of Judah and Israel. After Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, who are the last of the prophets of whom any writings remain, the Jews pretend that God gave them what they call Bath-col, the daughter of the voice, which was a supernatural manifestation of the will of God, either by a strong inspiration, or internal voice, or by a sensible and external voice, which was heard by a number of persons sufficient to bear testimony of it. For example, such was the voice that was heard at the baptism of Jesus Christ, saying, This is my beloved Son, &c.

In the early Christian church the gifts of prophecy and inspiration were very common; and since that time God has permitted the greater part of the heathen oracles to fall into contempt and silence. Much has been written on the subject of oracles, and the learned have been divided on this matter. Some have ascribed to demons all the oracles of antiquity; some, to the knavery of the priests; others have pretended that there were several kinds of oracles; some were illusions and tricks of the devil; others, the effects of juggling and contrivance.

ORDINATION, the act of conferring holy orders, or of initiating a person into the priesthood by prayer and the imposition of hands. It is observable, that the twelve apostles, who, except Matthias, had received their commission from Christ himself, were at first the only preachers of the Gospel; and that their preaching was for some short time confined to the city of Jerusalem. Their success in making converts caused the concerns of the church so to increase, that they found it necessary to take from the disciples seven persons, to whom they gave the name of deacons, (Acts vi. 1, &c.) and assigned certain specific duties; and this was done by a regular choice, and subsequent ordination from the apostles themselves, by the imposition of hands.

The Acts of the Apostles inform us, that Paul and Barnabas ordained elders in every church, (Acts xiv. 23.) which implies a regular and formal appointment; and in the case of Timothy, before Paul took him to be his companion and assistant in propagating the Gospel, not only he himself, but the presbytery also, laid their hands upon him. (1 Tim. iv. 14.) When Christianity had made farther progress, different persons were appointed to preside over different churches, as Timothy over that at Ephesus, and Titus over those in Crete; and St. Paul gives both Timothy and Titus particular directions concerning the ordination of Bishops and Elders within their respective jurisdictions. He commands Timothy to 'lay hands suddenly on no man' (1 Tim. v. 22.); that is, not to ordain any person till he was fully convinced of his fitness for the ministerial office; and he gives him this farther precept, which proves it was intended there should be a succession of ministers in the church; 'The things which thou hast heard of me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also.' (2 Tim. ii. 2.) And as authority and obedience must ever be reciprocal, we find the strictest injunctions in Scripture to Christians to obey their spiritual guides: 'Remember them which have the rule over you, who have spoken unto you the word of God: whose faith follow, considering the end of their conversation.' (Heb. xiii. 7.) 'Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit yourselves; for they watch for your souls, as they that must give account.' (Heb. xiii. 17.) It is evident that these passages relate to the ministers of religion, and not to civil magistrates.

It appears from the writings of the apostolical fathers, that in the days immediately after the apostles, there was an order of clergy; and of its existence in following ages no doubt has ever been entertained; it is fully proved, not only by Christian writers themselves, but by a variety of imperial laws made at different periods concerning the clergy. Thus we trace a regular and continued establishment of persons to whom were committed the oracles of God, who were invested with authority to instruct the congregations entrusted to their care, to enforce obedience to their laws, and to maintain the unity of faith in the bond of peace: 'Hereupon we hold that God's clergy are a state, which hath been, and will be, as long as there is a church upon earth, necessarily by the plain word of God himself; a state whereunto the rest of God's people must be subject as touching things that appertain to their souls' health.'

Such is the corruption of human nature, that the experience of all ages teaches us, even without referring to the written word of God, that religion cannot subsist in the world without public rites, public worship, and public teaching; nor can these offices be performed with any degree of propriety or effect, but by persons duly appointed and set apart for that purpose. 'If any man may assume authority to preach and perform holy functions, it is certain religion must fall into disorder, and under contempt. Hot-headed men, of warm fancies and volatile tongues, with very little knowledge and discretion, would be apt to thrust themselves on to the teaching and governing others, if they themselves were under no government. This would soon make the public service of God to be loathed, and break and dissolve the whole body.' 'If ministers be self-ordained, modest merit will never be called forth; presumptuous vanity will be ever ready to obtrude itself; noisy ignorance will overpower diffident wisdom; and what will hinder vicious men from rising into power, especially if any considerable emoluments are annexed to the ministry? Nay, what can hinder doctrines opposite to each other from being taught, to the utter extirpation of all religious principle? What can hinder different men from officiating in such different ways, as to produce disturbance and confusion, and put to flight all religious affection? And how can it be brought about, that certain appearances, modes of dress, and behaviour, shall be so associated with piety and virtue, as instantly to produce good feelings in the mind? Besides, the learning requisite to make a man a good minister of religion requires that the ministry should be made a separate profession.'

As the Scriptures do not prescribe any definite form of church government, so they contain no directions concerning the establishment of a power by which ministers are to be admitted to their sacred office. The only persons, except the apostles, mentioned in the Acts or Epistles as invested with this power, are Timothy and Titus, both of whom received it from St. Paul, when they were placed by him at the head of the churches of Ephesus and Crete. But though episcopal ordination is not actually commanded in the New Testament, yet we know that it was invariably practised in every ancient church; and thence we infer, that it was originally instituted by the apostles themselves. 'Our adversaries have been challenged long since to produce an ordination during the first fifteen hundred years after Christ, which was performed by presbyters, and not generally looked upon as invalid; whereas, on the other hand, they who have been ordained by mere presbyters, in the primitive times, have been stripped of their pretended orders, and with derision turned down to the laic form. A famous and known instance is Ischyra, who was deposed by the synod of Alexandria, because Colluthus, who ordained him, was supposed to be no more than a presbyter, though pretending to be a bishop. The council of Sardica, and the council of Seville in Spain, acted in like manner on the like occasions.'

Though it is perfectly conformable to Scripture, and to the practice of the primitive church, that certain persons should be set apart for the public service of religion, that there should be different ranks of these persons, and that they should be regularly appointed by men who have public authority given them in the congregation for that purpose, yet there is no ground for considering ordination as a sacrament. Neither Christ nor his apostles prescribed any particular form of ordaining ministers, to be observed in succeeding ages; but they left this, with other things of a similar nature, to be regulated by the church. Prayer, and imposition of hands, have been always used upon this occasion; and therefore, as ordination wants the essential properties of a sacrament, we esteem it only as a solemn mode of appointing ministers to their sacred office. The Papists use many ceremonies in the ordination of their ministers, which were unknown in the church for at least ten centuries, and during that period Orders were never mentioned by any ecclesiastical writer as a sacrament. Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christian Theology, vol. ii. pp. 369 370, &c. 398, &c. 426, &c.

ORIGENISTS, a denomination which appeared in the third century, who derived their opinions from the writings of Origen, a presbyter of Alexandria, and a man of great and uncommon abilities, who interpreted the divine truths of religion according to the tenor of the Platonic philosophy. He alleged that the source of many evils lies in adhering to the literal and external part of Scripture; and that the true meaning of the sacred writers was to be sought in a mysterious and hidden sense, arising from the nature of things themselves.

The principal tenets ascribed to Origen, together with a few of the reasons made use of in their defence, are comprehended in the following summary:—

1. That there is a pre-existent state of human souls. For the nature of the soul is such as to make her capable of existing eternally, backward as well as forward; because her spiritual essence, as such, renders it impossible that she should, either through age or violence, be dissolved: so that nothing is wanting to her existence but the good pleasure of him from whom all things proceed. And if, according to the Platonic scheme, we assign the production of all things to the exuberant fulness of life in the Deity, which, through the blessed necessity of his communicative nature, empties itself into all possibilities of being, as into so many capable receptacles, we must suppose her existence in a sense necessary, and in a degree co-eternal with God.

2. That souls were condemned to animate mortal bodies, in order to expiate faults they had committed in a pre-existent state: for we may be assured, from the infinite goodness of their Creator, that they were at first joined to the purest matter, and placed in those regions of the universe which were most suitable to the purity of essence they then possessed. That the souls of men are an order of essentially incorporate spirits, their deep immersion into terrestrial matter, the modification of all their operations by it, and the heavenly body promised in the Gospel, as the highest perfection of our renewed nature, clearly evince. Therefore, if our souls existed before they appeared inhabitants of the earth, they were placed in a purer element, and enjoyed far greater degrees of happiness. And certainly he, whose overflowing goodness brought them into existence, would not deprive them of their felicity, till, by their mutability, they rendered themselves less pure in the whole extent of their powers, and became disposed for the susception of such a degree of corporeal life as was exactly answerable to their present disposition of spirit. Hence it was necessary that they should become terrestrial men.

3. That the soul of Christ was united to the Word before the incarnation. For the Scriptures teach us that the soul of the Messiah was created before the beginning of the world. (Phil. ii. 5—7.) This text must be understood of Christ's human soul, because it is not usual to propose the Deity as an example of humility in Scripture. Though the humanity of Christ was so God-like, he emptied himself of this fulness of life and glory, to take upon him the form of a servant. It was this Messiah who conversed with the patriarchs, under a human form; it was he who appeared to Moses upon the holy mount; it was he who spake to the prophets under a visible appearance; and it is he who will at last come in triumph upon the clouds, to restore the universe to its primitive splendour and felicity.

4. That at the resurrection we shall be clothed with ethereal bodies. For the elements of our terrestrial compositions are such as almost fatally entangle us in vice, passion, and misery. The purer the vehicle the soul is united with, the more perfect is her life and operations. Besides, the Supreme Goodness who made all things, assures us he made all things best at first; and, therefore, his recovery of us to our lost happiness, (which is the design of the Gospel,) must restore us to our better bodies and happier habitations, which is evident from 1 Cor. xv. 49. 2 Cor. v. 1. and other texts of Scripture.

5. That, after long periods of time, the damned shall be released from their torments, and restored to a new state of probation. For the Deity has such reserves in his gracious providence, as will vindicate his sovereign goodness and wisdom from all disparagement. Expiatory pains are a part of his adorable plan; for this sharper kind of favour has a righteous place in such creatures as are by nature mutable. Though sin has extinguished, or silenced, the divine life, yet it has not destroyed the faculties of reason and understanding, consideration and memory, which will serve the life that is most powerful. If, therefore, the vigorous attraction of the sensual nature be abated by a ceaseless pain, these powers may resume the seeds of a better life and nature. As in the material system there is a gravitation of the less bodies towards the greater, there must of necessity be something analogous to this in the intellectual system: and since the spirits created by God are emanations and streams from his own abyss of being, and, as self-existent Power must needs subject all beings to itself, the Deity could not but impress upon their intimate natures and substances a central tendency towards himself, an essential principle of re-union to their great original.

6. That the earth, after its conflagration, shall become habitable again, and be the mansion of men and other animals, and that in eternal vicissitudes. For it is thus expressed in Isaiah: 'Behold, I make new heavens, and a new earth,' &c.; and in Heb. i. 10—12. 'Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundations of the earth; as a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed,' &c. Where there is only a change, the substance is not destroyed, this change being only as that of a garment worn out and decaying. The fashion of the world passes away like a turning scene, to exhibit a fresh and new representation of things; and, if only the present dress and appearance of things go off, the substance is supposed to remain entire. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. i. p. 219—225; Adams's View of Religions, p. 245, &c.

OSIANDRIANS, a denomination among the Lutherans, which was founded in the year 1550, by Andrew Osiander, a celebrated German divine, whose doctrine amounted to the following propositions:—

1. That Christ, considered in his human nature only, could not, by his obedience to the divine law, obtain justification and pardon for sinners; neither can we be justified before God, by embracing and applying to ourselves, through faith, the righteousness and obedience of the man Christ. It is only through that eternal and essential righteousness which dwells in Christ, considered as God, and which resides in his divine nature, that is united to the human, that mankind can obtain complete justification.

2. That man becomes a partaker of this divine righteousness by faith, since it is in consequence of this uniting principle that Christ dwells in the heart of man with his divine righteousness. Now, wherever this divine righteousness dwells, there God can behold no sin; therefore, when it is present with Christ in the hearts of the regenerate, they are, on its account, considered by the Deity as righteous, although they be sinners. Moreover, this divine and justifying righteousness of Christ excites the faithful to the pursuit of holiness, and to the practice of virtue. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. iv. p. 46.

OSTRICH. This bird is described as the daughter of the ostrich, or the daughter of the screamer. (Lev. xi. 16. Deut. xiv. 15. Isaiah xlii. 21.; xxxiv. 13.; xliii. 20. Jerem. l. 39. Micah i. 8.) In these and some other places, our translators have rendered the Hebrew by the word 'owl.' The owl, however, is not a desert bird, but rather resides in the neighbourhood of human labours, whether in the forest, or in rustic habitations. Besides, it is not the companion of serpents. But in these passages, the Hebrew word joneh is associated with deserts; dry, extensive, thirsty deserts, and with serpents, which are their natural inhabitants. Our ignorance of the natural history of the countries where the ostrich inhabits, has undoubtedly perverted the import of the above passages; but if the reader peruse them again, and exchange the 'owl' for ostrich, he will immediately discover in them a vigour of description, and an imagery, much beyond what he formerly perceived.

The ostrich lays her eggs on the ground, covers them with sand, and the sun hatches them. It is probably on this account, that she is made the symbol of cruelty and forgetfulness. (Lament. iv. 3. Job xxxix. 13, 14.) Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary, No. cxlv. pp. 96, 97.

OTH'NIEL, עֹתְנִיֵּל, Ὀθωνιήλ, signifies the time, or the hour of God. Othniel was the son of Kenaz, of the tribe of Judah. (Josh. xv. 17.) The Scripture says, that Othniel was brother to Caleb. (Judg. i. 13.) Hence arise some difficulties. 1. If Caleb and Othniel had been brothers, Othniel could not have married his niece Achsah, the daughter of Caleb. 2. The Scripture never assigns to Caleb and Othniel the same father: it always names Kenaz as father of Othniel, and Jephunneh, as father of Caleb. 3. Caleb must be much older than Othniel, since he gave Othniel his daughter Achsah in marriage. Thus it seems much better to suppose Kenaz and Jephunneh to be brothers, and that Othniel and Caleb were cousins-german, and in this sense, brothers, according to the language of Scripture. Achsah being therefore only second cousin in respect of Othniel, he might marry her without offending the law. Some, however, think that Othniel was nephew to Caleb.

Caleb having received his portion in the mountains of Judah, in the midst of a country possessed by giants, of the race of Anak, having taken the city of Hebron, he advances towards Debir, otherwise called Kirjath-sepher, and declares, 'I will give my daughter Achsah in marriage to him that shall take Kirjath-sepher.' Othniel took it, and had Achsah to wife. But at the time that the bride was bringing home to her husband, with the usual solemnity, Othniel moved his wife Achsah to ask of her father Caleb a field of springs, that was near and above another dry field that Caleb had given him. By the Hebrew text, it should seem that it was Achsah who desired Othniel to ask this of Caleb.

After the death of Joshua, the Israelites not exterminating the Canaanites from the land, and not having continued in their fidelity to the Lord, he delivered them over to Chushan-rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, to whom they continued in subjection eight years. (Judg. iii. 4, 5, 6, 7, 9, &c.) Then they cried to the Lord, who raised them up for a deliverer Othniel, the son of Kenaz, who was filled with the spirit of the Lord, and judged Israel; and the country had rest for forty years. That is to say, it was in peace the fortieth year after the peace that Joshua had procured for it, in the year of the world 2567, ten years before his death. The year of Othniel's death is unknown. 'The spirit of the Lord,' by which Othniel was said to be inspired, denotes in this and most parts of the Old Testament the spirit of fortitude, or extraordinary courage, as opposed to 'the spirit of fear,' or faintness of heart. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. p. 302.

PAC

PACIFIC DISPOSITION. Peace, in the evangelical sense of the word, supposes the spirit of Peace, or a kind leaning of the affections towards those with whom we have any intercourse. If we wish to live in peace with our fellow-creatures, we must follow those things that make for peace. We must punctually observe our promises, faithfully adhere to our engagements, and discharge all those duties which are necessary in the intercourse of society. We must abstain from all malicious whispers, ill-natured tales, and slanderous aspersions. If we could trace the most inveterate feuds, and the most virulent animosities, to their source, we should find that they had their origin in some scornful look, some contemptuous gesture, some supercilious expression, or some trivial neglect. Hence we may learn, that even the common forms of civility, which some think useless and insipid, from their frequent recurrence, are yet, if estimated by their effect in the sensations of men, and by the degree in which they promote a benign and pacific disposition in society, matters of no inconsiderable moment. Even the outward formalities and ceremonials of politeness, which, abstractedly considered, may be thought vain and useless show, will be held in greater estimation by those who view them in their tendency to promote the progress of civilization, and to harmonize the different orders of society. Whatever makes for peace, however insignificant it may seem in the great scale of moral consideration, is one of the constituents of righteousness; nor is the will of God ever more flagrantly opposed, than when we violate the sovereign law of loving one another.

If we wish to preserve peace with our fellow-creatures, it is necessary that we should not only be wary not to give offence, but should not be quick in resenting the real or imaginary affronts which we may receive. In the daily intercourse of society, we must expect to meet with many little slights, insults, and neglects, some of which perhaps proceed from inadvertence, and others from intention, some of which are the effusions of ill-humour, others the effect of indifference rather than malevolence. But whether they originate in chance or in design, it will in a great majority of instances be found more conducive to our happiness, and always to the peace of our lives, and tranquillity of our hearts, to pass them over with a magnanimous forbearance, rather than to resent them with furious impatience.

A peaceable disposition supposes a desire not only to be at peace with others, but to have others at peace among themselves. Thus it implies an habitual inclination and willingness to compose differences, to allay heats, to still the suspicions, mitigate the jealousies, and calm the animosities of mankind. Such is the frame of heart, on which that important blessing is pronounced, 'Blessed are the peace-makers, for they shall be called the children of God' (Matt. v. 9.); or persons truly religious, lovers of God, and the children of his favour. Many are the blessings of this amiable disposition, not only future, but present; not only in Heaven, but on earth. The beginning of strife is like the letting out of waters. It is, therefore, in most cases, not more the dictate of benevolence than of prudence, to endeavour to terminate dissensions in their origin; and, where disputes have begun, to lose no opportunity of promoting the most speedy reconciliation. To take away as far as possible all occasion of strife, to prevent the breach of love in families, and of amity among neighbours, to compose differences before they inflame into rancour, and to heal the wounds of passion before they gangrene, is a truly godlike work, in which we shall find unspeakable satisfaction. The sensation of peace, the consciousness of not feeling in our own hearts one vibration of ill-will to others, is a source of pure and exquisite delight; and to a benevolent mind, the aspect of peace abroad is almost as pleasurable as the fruition of it at home. How delightful is it, says the Psalmist, to see brethren dwell together in unity! What joy does it occasion to see love and harmony around us, to behold the smiles of reciprocal affection and complacency in every countenance! It is a spectacle similar to that in which we shall participate in the courts of Heaven, and in the company of the blessed! How superior is such a disposition to that malevolent, factious, intriguing spirit, which cools friendships and prolongs enmities, which foment quarrels, excites suspicions, increases heats, inflames resentments, which fills the human breast with fury and indignation, and makes the intercourse of men like that of fiends and accursed spirits, in whom there is no feeling of charity, and no love of peace!

We naturally desire the good opinion of others; we feel a joy which it is difficult to suppress in the possession of their love, their respect, their confidence. Their approbation tends powerfully to make us self-approved; their estimation causes us to rise in our self-esteem. The ill opinion, the contempt, the distrust of others, we consider as an injury, and one too, which, if it do not inflame revenge, always excites sensible concern. This consideration may well teach us not lightly or hastily to speak ill, nor to judge ill, of others; and to be ever willing, as far as we have opportunity, to do good unto all men, without any narrow limitations or exceptions. This is to walk in the way which leads to peace, and which never terminates in strife.

A malevolent and contentious disposition, the opposite of that meek and quiet spirit, which is so precious in the sight of Heaven, is an enemy to the performance of all our religious exercises, and more especially our devout commerce with our Maker. It not only makes our hearts too gross, but too bitter, for a work which requires so much purity of thought and tenderness of affection. All anger and malevolence prevent the true devotional spirit from kindling in our breasts. The devotional flame derives its lustre and its strength from the sensations of charity within us. God requires us to address him with a forgiving disposition; the spirit of peace, of meekness, of humility, must have its abode in our hearts, or he has no pleasure in our adoration. We cannot be at peace with God, while we are at variance with each other. If we go into the sanctuary, or fall down on our knees before his throne, with any secret rancour in our hearts, any thirst of revenge, any desire to inflict pain on one sentient being, we only insult his omniscience, and become amenable to punishment. Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. ii. pp. 214. 215. 217, 218, &c.

PAGANISM. During the Jewish economy, and for the first three centuries after Christ, such ancient nations as were 'aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise,' were styled Gentiles or Heathens; the former word derived from the Latin gentes, and the latter from the Greek ἔθνη, respectively signifying nations: but ever since the conversion of Constantine, those of the Roman empire who opposed the religion of Christ, and all idolaters to the present day, have been more generally distinguished by the name of Pagans; or, according to others, since the reign of Theodosius the Younger, when the appellation of Pagans was given to the inhabitants of the country towns of Italy,—‘Pagorum incolæ Pagani,’ who retained their ancient religion. As the Greeks and Romans looked upon all nations except their own as barbarians, so the Jews called all who were not of their own nation Heathens or Gentiles; and from the giving of the law, till the propagation of the Gospel, the Jews and Gentiles divided the world between them.

The ancient Pagan religions of Europe have been distributed into five classes: 1. The Polytheism of Greece and Rome; 2. The Druidical religions of the Celtic nations; 3. The Polytheism of the Teutonic and Gothic nations; 4. The Paganism of the Slavonian nations; 5. The low, wretched superstitions of the more northern savages, the Laplanders, Finns, Greenlanders, &c. The first inhabitants of Gaul and Britain, being of Celtic race, followed the Druidical superstitions; whilst the ancient Germans, Scandinavians, &c. being of Gothic race, professed that system of Polytheism, afterwards delivered in the Edda, which contains an authentic epitome of Runic mythology, and is a valuable relic of northern genius, and at the same time one of the most portentous monuments of ancient superstition.

‘The Pagan religion,’ says Dr. Winder, ‘degenerated into greater absurdity the further it proceeded; and it prevailed in all its height of absurdity, when the Pagan nations were polished to the height. Though they set out with the talents of reason, and had solid foundations of information to build upon, it in fact proved that, with all their strengthened faculties, and growing powers of reason, the edifice of religion rose in the most absurd deformities and disproportions, and gradually went on in the most irrational, disproportioned, incongruous systems, of which the most easy dictates of reason would have demonstrated the absurdity. They were contrary to all just calculations in moral mathematics.’

Greece was partly peopled from Egypt; and the Egyptian colonies brought over with them, and introduced into Europe, the gross and childish superstitions of the country whence they came. Hence from the fountain we may form some judgment of the stream. The poet Hesiod, who flourished about 944 years before Christ, was the first that reduced the Grecian idolatry to any appearance of a system; and it would appear that the deities amounted, even in his time, to no fewer than 30,000! Among these he includes heaven, earth, ocean, morning, day, night, rivers, winds, love, desire, gracefulness, &c. &c. in one rank or other, as deities; but most of them are deified men, to whom was assigned a local jurisdiction.

The Roman deities may be distributed into three distinct classes. The first includes the ancient Celtic or Sabine gods, namely Vesta, Janus, &c. 2. The Grecian gods, introduced by Tarquin the First. 3. The Roman state deified the virtues and passions of the human mind; and these imaginary deities were adapted to impress the people with veneration for their religion and government. The Celtic, Greek, and Tuscan superstitions, thus combined in one establishment, the Roman religion made a progress in error and authority, commensurate with the growth and grandeur of the republic. It served as a state engine, and was well adapted to the genius of the Romans, actuating a superstitious people to second the ambition of their rulers. It was not only protected, but also, in many instances, administered by the civil magistrate: it grew with the growth of the republic, and seemed to promise itself a duration equal to that of the imperial and ‘eternal city.’

The dreadful and sanguinary sacrifices, of which the Peruvians and Mexicans were enormously guilty at the time their country was brought under the subjection of the Spaniards, form a striking and gloomy similitude to the bloody sacrifices of the old Scythians, Indians, and Druids, and indeed of the ancient heathen world in general; for this horrible practice of human sacrifices prevailed throughout every region of it, to a degree which is almost incredible, and still prevails in many savage countries, on which the light of Christianity has not yet beamed. We have incontestable proofs of its having subsisted among the Egyptians, the Syrians, the Persians, the Phœnicians, the ancient Hindoos, and all the various nations of the East. It was one of the crying sins of the Canaanites,—one of the causes of their extermination by the hands of the Israelites; who likewise, notwithstanding the many peremptory and tremendous prohibitions of their law, suffered themselves sometimes to be drawn into this prevailing and detestable crime, and offered up their sons and their daughters unto devils. The Thracians, the Gauls, and the Germans, were strongly addicted to it; nor were the Greeks and Romans untainted with it. Nay, no climate, no government, no state of civilization, no mode of Pagan superstition, was free from it;—even this island, where benevolence and humanity have now (thanks to the Gospel!) fixed their seat; this island was, at one time, (under the gloomy and ferocious despotism of the Druids) polluted with the religious murder of its wretched inhabitants. The history of Paganism is little else than a confirmation of the truth of the Fall, or a history of human depravity: and what a picture does this present to us of human nature unsubdued by Divine grace, and of human reason unassisted by revelation! What a deep and grateful sense ought it to impress on our minds of the infinite obligations which we owe to God, for the unspeakable gift of the Gospel! For wherever its Divine light has broke forth, this tremendous demon of superstition has disappeared; in the Christian world human sacrifices are unknown, and 'the land is no longer defiled with blood.'

Some of the most remarkable events in the history of Paganism are, its rise and first appearance in Chaldæa soon after the flood; its establishment in Egypt long before the time of Moses; its introduction into, and flourishing state in, Greece before the era of the war of Troy; its establishment in Rome under Romulus, Numa, Tarquin, &c.; its revival and restoration in Italy, by Augustus; in Greece, by Hadrian; its decline, and especially the silence of its oracles, soon after the coming of our Saviour; the conversion of the emperor Constantine from Paganism to Christianity, about A.D. 320; Julian's ineffectual attempt to restore it; and its extinction in the Christian world, that is, of the Roman and Greek idolatry, after a faint resistance, about the middle of the sixth century, under Theodosius the Great. From the destruction of the temple of Jerusalem, heathenism was the only established religion in the world for nearly 300 years. In later times we may remark its decline in America and the West Indies, ever since the first settlement of Europeans there, and especially during the first century after the discovery of the new world; together with the efforts that have been made of late, to diminish its influence, by the various missions that have been established in almost all parts of the known world, where Paganism still prevails.

The wisest and best of the heathens, and, according to some, the ancient Pagans in general, owned but one supreme God, though they had many inferior and subordinate ones, as intercessors and mediators. The first idolaters, after the knowledge of the true God was obscured in their minds, looked on the heavenly bodies, and other creatures of God, perhaps merely as proper emblems of the Deity, and therefore gave them the Divine title and attributes by way of honour, and to be a perpetual memorial of the great and true Benefactor; but such was the reverence which they paid to these, that, in process of time, they forgot the hand by which these things were framed and preserved, and looked upon the immediate means and support of life, as the primary efficient cause, to the exclusion of the real Creator. It is highly probable that, at first, they supposed the creatures which they held sacred, to be emblems or representations of certain qualities in God, or means of conveying them, as the sun, the light, the ox, &c. of benefits, the serpent of vengeance; and that they meant only, through these, to honour and worship the Creator. It cannot, however, be doubted, that, afterwards, their worship terminated in the idol before them. Thus was the only true God abridged of the honour due to him, and him only, and at last banished from the hearts of most of his reasonable creatures.

Pagans of all ages and nations have been unanimous in entertaining some notions, however imperfect and confused, of the existence of the soul after death. With regard to the ancient heathens, we have the testimony of Cicero himself, that there was an universal agreement of all people upon the earth, in this great point; and he makes this common consent one of his chief proofs of the immortality of the soul. From that time to the present, amidst all the discoveries that have been made, in every part of the globe, there has never yet, I believe, been found one single nation, however savage or barbarous, that has not had some apprehensions, or suspicions, of another state of being after this. Yet, if we examine the notions, both of the ancient heathens, and of our modern Pagans, concerning the length of the soul's duration after death, and the nature of a future retribution, we shall find so great obscurity, uncertainty, and confusion, with such a strange mixture of the most absurd and fabulous ideas, that we need not be surprised at their producing little or no effects upon their hearts and lives.

Though some of the ancient heathen philosophers believed the existence of the soul after death, yet they denied that it would exist for ever. Others admitted its eternity, but did not allow that it passed into a state of rewards and punishments; and they supposed that it would be resolved into the universal spirit from which it was originally detached. Even of those who acknowledged a future retribution, many asserted, that the punishments only are eternal, and the rewards of a temporary nature. They generally placed a future state on a wrong foundation, as on the pre-existence of the soul, &c.; many of them also believed in its transmigration, a doctrine intimately connected with the former. Though they might believe in a future state, yet they could not properly be said to hope for it, since hades is represented by Homer, and even by Plato, as a dismal and gloomy abode! Justly, therefore, does St. Paul give it as the character of the heathens in general, that they were 'without hope.' 'Look,' says

Bishop Porteus, 'into the writings of the ancient philosophers, respecting a future retribution, and (with few, if any, exceptions) you see nothing but embarrassment, confusion, inconsistency, and contradiction. In one page, you will find them expatiating, with apparent satisfaction, on the arguments then commonly produced for the immortality of the soul, and a state of recompense hereafter; answering the several objections to them with great acuteness; illustrating them with wonderful ingenuity and art; adorning them with all the charms of their eloquence; declaring their entire assent to them; and protesting, that nothing should ever wrest from them this delightful persuasion, the very joy and comfort of their souls. In another page, the scene is totally changed: they unsay almost every thing they had said before. They doubt, they fluctuate, they despond, they disbelieve. They laugh at the popular notions of future punishments and rewards; but they substitute nothing more rational or satisfactory in their room. Nay, what is still more extraordinary, although they all acknowledged, that the belief of a future life, and a future recompense, was an universal principle of nature,—that it was what all mankind, with one voice, concurred and agreed in,—yet, notwithstanding this, many of them seem even to have taken pains to stifle this voice of nature within them; and considered it as a victory of the greatest importance to subdue and extinguish those notices of a future judgment, which, in despite of themselves, they found springing up within their own breasts.'

'From a survey of the devotions of the Gentiles, it will appear,' says Dr. Jortin, 'that, some instances excepted, there was nothing spiritual in their prayers, no thanksgiving, no request for Divine assistance in the performance of their duty, no pious sorrow and acknowledgment of their offences.' After the propagation of Christianity, we indeed find forms of adoration in some Pagan writers, that are more rational and spiritual than the old prayers and hymns of their ancestors; but it is generally supposed that these improvements arose from the Gospel. They seem to have known nothing of that sublime and evangelical doctrine, the love of God. 'We never hear them urging the love of God,' says Bishop Porteus, 'as a necessary part of human duty, or as a proper ground of moral obligation. Their religion, being merely ceremonial and political, never pretended to reach the heart, or to inspire it with any sincerity or warmth of affection towards the Deity. Indeed, how was it possible to have any love for such gods as they worshipped! for gods debased with every human weakness, and polluted with every human vice? It was enough, surely, to make the people worship such a crew. To have insisted on their loving them too, would have exceeded all bounds of modesty and common sense.' Dr. White observes, that 'their oracles, their auguries, and their sacrifices, their public spectacles, and splendid games, yea, the whole apparatus of Pagan superstition, were the engines of political tyranny, and of popular delusion, and barred all access to the entrance of truth, freedom, purity, and simplicity.' It was not the office of the priests to teach men virtue; they were employed in instructing men what gods they were to worship, what sacrifices they were to offer to their several deities, and in directing them in what manner they were to observe the appointed rites.

What thanks are due to God for our deliverance from that gross idolatry, which we have now been considering, and which once prevailed among all nations except the Jews! For this deliverance we are not indebted to reason, but to revelation. Though it be no difficult matter to prove that there is only one God that ought to be worshipped, yet to demonstrate a truth already known, is a much easier task than to discover one buried under the rubbish of prejudice and superstition. Even the wisest and greatest men in the heathen world were polytheists, and adored, with the vulgar, the gods of their country, whatever idea some of them might have had of the Divine unity. Nor has this fundamental doctrine of religion—the unity of God, been publicly professed by any people, who had not previously been enlightened by revelation. The Mahometans learned it from our Scriptures; and notwithstanding the ignorant declamations of infidels concerning the powers of reason, and the discoveries which may be made by its assistance, experience will justify us in affirming, that, without the Gospel of Christ, we should have been at this day as gross idolaters as were our forefathers, the original inhabitants of Britain. Were Christianity banished from the earth, as some men earnestly wish it to be, the absurd and barbarous systems of Paganism would be restored; or some modifications of folly and absurdity, not less extravagant and ridiculous, would be substituted in their room. Thus, no sooner had the French nation renounced, in their madness, the Christian religion, than they began to revive the antiquated rites of Greece and Rome, and publicly adored a prostitute, under the title of the Goddess of Reason!

If then it be the Gospel which has turned us from these vanities to 'serve the living God,' as most certainly it is, what gratitude is due to Him for this his unspeakable gift! And being thereby delivered from the worship of idols, or the powers of darkness, and translated into the kingdom of his Son, how much is it our duty to walk as children of the light and of the day! As we profess to be the servants of the living God, let us remember, that it is a willing and cheerful service, as well as a pure and spiritual worship, which he requires. He is not to be treated like the idols of the Gentiles, to whom their votaries presented the empty homage of mere ceremonies and oblations. Then only do we worship and serve him in a manner worthy of his character and attributes, when we present to him the offering of our hearts and affections; when we love him above all things, especially for his 'inestimable love in the redemption of the world, by our Lord Jesus Christ, for the means of grace and for the hope of glory;' when we confide in his power and promises—commit ourselves to the direction of his wisdom and providence,—submit to his authority, and regulate our thoughts, and words, and actions, by his Divine laws. In a word, then only do 'we walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called,' so as to worship and serve him acceptably, when we offer up prayers expressive of holy desires, and praises from a grateful heart; when we live as becometh the disciples and servants of Christ; and, while we strive to serve him in the Gospel of his Son, we have confidence towards him, only through the great Mediator and Intercessor, the High-Priest of our profession. 'For though there be that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth (as there be gods many, and lords many) to us there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him.' PAL/ESTINE, פלשתינה, ἀλλόφρονας, signifies which is covered, watered; otherwise, to bring or cause ruin; otherwise, from the Sanscrit, shepherd. Palestine, taken in a limited sense, stands for the country of the Philistines, including that part of the Land of Promise which extended along the Mediterranean Sea, from Gaza south to Lydda north. In a more general sense, it signifies the whole country of Canaan, the whole Land of Promise, as well beyond, as on this side Jordan.

The following is Volney's description of the present state of this country:—'Palestine, in its present state, comprehends the whole country included between the Mediterranean to the west, the chain of mountains to the east, and two lines, one drawn to the south, by Kan Younes, and the other to the north, between Kaisaria and the rivulet of Yafa. This whole tract is almost entirely a level plain, without either river or rivulet in summer, but watered by several torrents in winter. Notwithstanding this dryness, the soil is good, and may even be termed fertile, for when the winter rains do not fail, every thing springs up in abundance; and the earth, which is black and fat, retains moisture sufficient for the growth of grain and vegetables during the summer. More dourra, sesamum, water-melons, and beans, are sown here than in any other part of the country. They also raise cotton, barley, and wheat; but though the latter be most esteemed, it is less cultivated, for fear of too much inviting the avarice of the Turkish governors, and the rapacity of the Arabs. This country is, indeed, more frequently plundered than any other in Syria; for being very proper for cavalry, and adjacent to the desert, it lies open to the Arabs, who are far from satisfied with the mountains: they have long disputed it with every power established in it, and have succeeded so far as to obtain the concession of certain places, on paying a tribute, from whence they infest the roads, so as to render it unsafe to travel from Gaza to Acre.' See CANAAN. Sacred Geography.

PALM-TREE. This tree was very common in Palestine. It is a very tall, upright, rising, tree, whose leaves are at its head, and whose fruit (the dates of the shops) hang in clusters from its top. There are several kinds; some rise so high as sixty, eighty, or, says Denon, even 100 feet. The palm, says Plutarch, is a tree which loves water; and Pliny says, it loves to drink throughout the whole year. Ecclesiasticus also says, (xxiv. 14.) 'I was exalted as a palm-tree in Engaddi;' which was a very watery spot, and, therefore, fit for gardens, &c.

This tree, of that kind which bears dates, is general in the East, though rare in Europe. The leaves which crown the top of it are brought over as lining to boxes of fruit, &c. to our grocers. Scripture Illustrated, Expos. Index, pp. 42, 163.

PAMPHYL/IA, Παμφυλία, signifies wholly beloved, or lovely. Pamphylia is a province of Asia, having Cilicia east, Lycia and part of Asia Minor west, Galatia and Cappadocia north, and the Mediterranean Sea, in these parts, called the Sea of Pamphylia, south. Part of Mount Taurus was included in this province. Paul and Barnabas preached at Perga in Pamphylia. (Acts xiii. 13.; xiv. 24.) Sacred Geography.

PAPER, papyrus, is a kind of reed which grows in the Nile. The Egyptians applied it to several uses, as to make baskets, shoes, clothes, little boats to swim on the Nile, and paper to write on. The following is said to be the manner of making the paper used for writing on by the ancients: the trunk of this plant is composed of several coatings, lying one on the other, which are taken off with a needle: they are afterwards spread on a table, so much of which is moistened, as is equal to the size that it is intended the leaves of the papyrus shall be. This first bed of leaves is covered with a layer of fine paste, or with the muddy water of the Nile warmed: then a second bed of paper leaves is laid upon this paste, and the whole is left to dry in the sun. Such was the Egyptian papyrus, whence our paper takes its name, though its composition be so very different from it. Varro observes, and Pliny from him, that the use of the papyrus for writing on was discovered in Egypt, at the time of Alexander's building Alexandria.

PA'PHOS, Πάφος, signifies which boils, or is very hot. Paphos was a famous city in the isle of Cyprus, where St. Paul converted the proconsul Sergius Paulus, and struck with blindness a Jewish sorcerer, called Bar-jesus, who would have hindered his conversion. Paphos was at the western extremity of the island. (Acts xiii. 6.) It is now called Baffo. Here the goddess Venus was worshipped; and maidens before their marriage gave to her temple gifts procured by prostitution. This place was very subject to earthquakes, and the old city is now in ruins, which mark its site. Sacred Geography.

PARABLE. The parabolical, enigmatical, figurative, and sententious way of speaking, was the language of the eastern sages and learned men; and nothing was more insupportable than to hear a fool utter parables; 'The legs of the lame are not equal; so is a parable in the mouth of fools.' (Prov. xxvi. 7.)

The prophets use parables, the more strongly to impress prince and people with their threatenings or promises. Nathan reproves David under a parable of a rich man who had taken away and killed the lamb of a poor man. (2 Sam. xii. 2, 3, &c.) The woman of Tekoah, who was hired by Joab to reconcile the mind of David to Absalom, proposed to him the parable of her two sons that fought together, and one having killed the other, they were going to put the murderer to death, and so to deprive her of both her sons. (2 Sam. xiv. 2, 3, &c.) Jotham, son of Gideon, proposed to the Shechemites the parable of the bramble of Libanus, whom the trees chose for their king. (Judg. ix. 7, 8, &c.) The prophets often reprove the infidelity of Jerusalem under the parable of an adulterous wife, &c. &c.

Our Saviour in the Gospel seldom speaks to the people but in parables; thereby verifying the prophecy of Isaiah, (vi. 9.) that the people should see without knowing, and hear without understanding, in the midst of instructions. Some parables in the New Testament are supposed to be true histories. In others our Saviour seems to allude to some points of history in those times; as that describing a king who went into a far country, to receive a kingdom. This may hint at the history of Archelaus, who, after the death of his father Herod the Great, went to Rome, to receive from Augustus the confirmation of his father's will, by which he had the kingdom of Judea left to him.

PAR'ADISE, פֶּרֶס, παράδεισος, signifies a garden planted with trees. The Septuagint use the word Paradise, when they speak of the garden of Eden, which the Lord planted, and in which he placed Adam and Eve; and this famous garden is commonly known by the name of the Terrestrial Paradise. There have been many inquiries about its situation. Some have thought that it never existed, but that whatever is said of it in Scripture ought to be taken allegorically. Some believed it was beyond the confines of the world; some, that it was only in the beginning, or at the creation. It has been placed in the third heaven, in the orb of the moon, in the moon itself, in the middle region of the air, above the earth, under the earth, in a distant place concealed from the knowledge of men, in the place which is now possessed by the Caspian Sea, under the Arctic pole, and to the utmost southern regions.

There is hardly any part of the world in which it has not been sought; in Asia, in Africa, in Europe, in America; in Tartary, on the banks of the Ganges, in the Indies, in China, in the island of Ceylon, in Armenia, under the equator; in Mesopotamia, in Syria, in Persia, in Babylonia, in Arabia, in Palestine, in Ethiopia, where the mountains of the moon are; near the mountains of Libanus, Antilibanus, and Damascus.

Le Clerc placed Paradise in Judea; but this system has had few followers. Huetius placed it in Babylonia, where he supposed that the Euphrates and Tigris joined, and afterwards separated; consequently the four rivers of Paradise, described by Moses, were, two below, and two above that junction: but this certainly does not meet the description of the sacred writer.

Reland places it in Armenia, where issue the heads of the Euphrates and Tigris, two of the Paradaisaical rivers seemingly well ascertained; and two others, whose springs are in the neighbourhood, agree in many respects with the third and fourth river, mentioned by Moses. 1. The nearest or western of the two lower branches, or rivers, which discharged themselves into the Persian Gulf, was called Pison, probably from the Hebrew פֶּסַח Pasah, signifying to 'spread,' or 'overspread,' descriptive of its overflowing the flat country or morasses, bordering on the Gulf to which the great tides on that coast powerfully contribute. 'The land of Havilah which it compassed,' appears to have been the north-east quarter of Arabia Felix, for it is contrasted in situation with 'the wilderness of Shur,' which lay to the south-west, bordering on Egypt, and the head of the Red Sea. (Gen. xxv. 18. 1 Sam. xv. 7.) The productions of this land belonged also to Arabia Felix, which abounded with 'all kinds of spices, precious stones, and gold.' (Ezek. xxvii. 22, 23.) Its gold was remarkably good, for, according to Diodorus, 'in Arabia was found native gold of so lively a colour, that it much resembled the brightness of fire, and so fixed, that it wanted neither fire nor refining to purify it.' Hence bedolah in the original, or bdellium, may signify either an aromatic gum; or the precious stone called a carbuncle; or pearls, for which that coast was famous. 2. Proceeding eastwards, we meet the second lower branch, or river, called Gihon; which perhaps may most naturally be derived from גיא Gia, 'a vale,' and הון Hon, 'wealth,' or 'substance;' as skirting a rich and fertile land, 'the land of Cush,' now Chusistan, or Chuzestan, recovering its primitive name, formerly called Susiana, or Asiatic Ethiopia. 3. Crossing the Gihon, and ascending to the upper branches, we reach the third river, Hiddekel, or 'the Tigris,' resembling the tiger in rapidity and devastation; for Diglath, in the Syriac and Arabic dialects, signifies 'a tiger,' to which was prefixed the He emphatic. This river skirted 'Assyria' Proper on its western side; but it lay 'eastward' of the fourth and last branch, called 4. Phrat, from the Hebrew פרה Phrah, 'to fructify,' or 'fertilize,' as this river does the countries enriched by its alluvions. It was called by the Greeks Euphrates. This river is simply mentioned by Moses, as being sufficiently known and determined from the rest. 'The Armenian mountains,' says Major Rennell, 'rise very suddenly from the north, and form the elevated level, the highest of western Asia, whence the Euphrates, the Araxes, and the Cyrus spring, at no great distance from the Euxine Sea. The Euphrates and Tigris spring from opposite sides of Mount Taurus, in Armenia; the former, from its upper level, northward, the latter, from its southern declivity; and certain of the sources of the two rivers are only separated by the summits of Taurus. And yet, notwithstanding this vicinity, the sources of the Tigris, by being in a southern exposure, where the snow melts much earlier than at the back of the mountain, and in a more elevated situation, occasion the periodical swelling of this river to happen many weeks earlier than those of the Euphrates.—Of the two, the Tigris seems to be the larger body of water.'

Captain Wilford is of opinion, that Paradise was situated in India, in the province of Kedem, the most easterly province of the Persian empire; and around this spot are Ai-shur or Ashur, Cush, Chaulon, or Chavilah, Sephar, a mountain of Kedem, Mash, Gedrosia, and other places named in Sacred Writ. He supposes, 1. the river Pison to be the Nilab, Sindus, or Little Indus; 2.

the Gihon, the Hermund; 3. the Hiddekel, the Báhlac; and 4. the Perath, the Cunduz. A late writer on sacred geography, adopting for the most part the opinions of Captain Wilford on the subject, gives the names of the rivers as follows: 1. the Pison is supposed by him to be the Nilab, Sindus, or Little Indus; 2. the Gihon, the western branch of the Oxus; 3. the Hiddekel, the eastern branch of the same, both of which unite near Balk; 4. the Perath, the Hermund. See EDEN. Sacred Geography; Asiatic Researches, vol. vi. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. i. pp. 325, 326.

PARAN, פארן, signifies beauty, glory, ornament. Paran, or El-paran, is a desert of Arabia Petræa, south of the Land of Promise, and north-east of the Gulf Elanitis. Chedorlaomer and his allies ravaged the country to the plains of Paran. (Gen. xiv. 6.) Hagar having been sent from Abraham, retired into the wilderness of Paran, where she lived with her son Ishmael. (Gen. xxi. 21.) The Israelites having decamped from Sinai, came into the desert of Paran. (Numb. x. 12.) Hence Moses sent out spies to inspect the Land of Promise, (Numb. xiii. 3.) and consequently Kadesh is in the wilderness of Paran, since these men went from Kadesh. (Numb. xiii. 26.) Moses seems to place Mount Sinai in Paran when he says, that the Lord appeared to the Israelites on the Mount of Paran. (Deut. xxxiii. 2.) Habakkuk (iii. 3.) seems to say the same thing. When David was persecuted by Saul, he withdrew into the wilderness of Paran, near Maon and Carmel. (1 Sam. xxv. 1, 2.) Hadad, son of the king of Edom, was carried when a child into Egypt. (1 Kings xi. 18.) Those who conducted him came from the eastern parts of Idumæa (or Edom) into the country of Midian, thence into the country of Paran, and so into Egypt. The greater part of the habitations of this country were dug in the rocks; and here Simon of Gerasa gathered together all that he took from his enemies.

Paran was also a city of Arabia Petræa, three days' journey from the city of Elah, or Ailat, east. This city gave name to the desert of Paran.

The desert of Paran is thus described by Dr. Shaw: 'From Mount Sinai, the Israelites directed their journey northward, towards the land of Canaan. The next remarkable stations therefore were in the desert of Paran, which seems not to have commenced till after they departed from Hazereth, three stations from Sinai. (Numb. xii. 16.) Now as tradition has preserved to us the names of Shur, Marah, and Sin, so we have also that of Paran, which we enter at about the half way betwixt Sinai and Corondel, in travelling through the midland road, along the defiles of what were probably the Black Mountains of Ptolemy.'

In one part of it, ten leagues to the northward of Tor, there are several ruins, particularly of a Greek convent, (called the convent of Paran), which was not long ago abandoned by reason of the continual insults which they suffered from the Arabs. Here likewise we should look for the city of that name, though according to the circumstances of its situation, as they are laid down by Ptolemy, Tor, a small maritime village, with a castle hard by it, should rather be the place.' Sacred Geography, p. 73.

PARENTS. This word is properly said of a father and mother, but is extended also to others related by blood, especially in a direct line upward. The Scripture commands children to honour their parents, (Exod. xx. 12.) that is to obey them, to succour them, to have an inward and outward respect for them, to give them all assistance that nature, and their, and our circumstances require. Christ in the Gospel, (Matth. xv. 5, 6.) condemns that corrupt explication which the doctors of the law gave of this precept; teaching that a child was disengaged from the obligation of supporting and assisting his parents, when he said, 'It is a gift, by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me,' as if he had said, 'I am no longer master of my own estate, it is consecrated to the Lord.' See CORBAN.

The duty of parents, says the late Dr. Paley, may be explained under the several heads of maintenance, education, and a reasonable provision for the child's happiness in respect of outward condition. 1. The wants of children make it necessary that some person maintain them; and, as no one has a right to burden others by his act, it follows, that the parents are bound to undertake this charge themselves. Besides this plain inference, the affection of parents to their children, if it be instinctive, and the provision which nature has prepared in the person of the mother for the support of the infant, concerning the existence and design of which there can be no doubt, are manifest indications of the divine will. Hence we learn the guilt of those who run away from their families, or, in consequence of idleness or drunkenness, throw them upon a parish; or who leave them destitute at their death, when, by diligence and frugality, they might have laid up a provision for their support. The Christian Scriptures have declared in explicit terms their judgment of the obligation of this duty:—'If any provide not for his own, especially for those of his own household, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel' (1 Tim. v. 8.); he hath disgraced the Christian profession, and fallen short in a duty which even infidels acknowledge.

ration that is made in our youth for the sequel of our lives. Some such preparation is necessary for children of all conditions, because without it they must be miserable, and probably will be vicious, when they grow up, either from want of the means of subsistence, or from want of rational and inoffensive occupation. In civilized life, every thing is effected by art and skill. Hence a person who is provided with neither will be useless; and he who is useless, will generally be at the same time mischievous to the community. In the inferior classes of the community, this principle condemns the neglect of parents, who do not inure their children betimes to labour and restraint, by providing them with services, or other regular employment, but who suffer them to waste their youth in idleness, or to betake themselves to some trifling and precarious calling. The consequence of having thus tasted the sweets of natural liberty, at an age when their passion and relish for it are at the highest, is, that they become incapable, for the remainder of their lives, of continued industry, or of preserving attention to any thing; they spend their time in a miserable struggle between the importunity of want, and the irksomeness of regular application; and they are prepared to embrace every expedient which presents a hope of supplying their necessities without confining them to some employment. In the middle orders of society, those parents are most reprehensible, who neither qualify their children for a profession, nor enable them to live without one; and those in the highest, who, from indolence, indulgence, or avarice, omit to procure their children those liberal attainments, which are necessary to make them useful in the stations to which they are destined.

3. A reasonable provision for the happiness of a child, in respect of outward condition, requires three things: a situation suited to his habits and reasonable expectations; a competent provision for the exigencies of that situation, and a probable security for his virtue. The first two articles will vary with the condition of the parent. Hence, a peasant satisfies his duty, who sends out his children, properly instructed for their occupation, to husbandry, or to any branch of manufacture. Clergymen, lawyers, physicians, officers in the army or navy, gentlemen possessing moderate fortunes of inheritance, or exercising trade in a large or liberal way, are required by the same rule to provide their sons with learned professions, commissions in the army or navy, places in public offices, or reputable branches of merchandise. Providing a child with a situation, includes a competent supply for the expenses of that situation, until the profits of it enable the child to support himself.

After the first requisite, namely, a provision for the exigencies of his situation, is satisfied, a parent may diminish a child's portion, in order to punish any flagrant crime, or to punish contumacy and want of filial duty in instances not otherwise criminal; for a child who is conscious of bad behaviour, or of contempt of his parent's will and happiness, cannot reasonably expect the same instances of his munificence. But let not a father hope to excuse an inofficious disposition of his fortune, by alleging, that 'every man may do what he will with his own.' All the truth which this expression contains is, that this discretion is under no control of law; and that his will, however capricious, will be valid. This by no means absolves his conscience from the obligations of a parent, or imports that he may neglect, without injustice, the several wants and expectations of his family, in order to gratify a whim or pique, or indulge a preference founded in no reasonable distinction of merit or situation. We have still to notice a principal part of a parent's duty, namely, the using of proper precautions and expedients, in order to form and preserve his children's virtue. A good parent's first care is, to be virtuous himself; his second, to make his virtues as easy and engaging to those about him, as their nature will admit. Virtue itself offends, when coupled with forbidding manners. Some virtues may be urged to such excess, or brought forward so unseasonably, as to discourage and repel those who observe, and who are acted upon by them, instead of exciting an inclination to imitate and adopt them. Young minds are particularly liable to these unfortunate impressions. Something likewise may be effected towards the correcting or improving of those early inclinations which children discover, by placing them in situations the least dangerous to their particular characters.

If it be the duty of a parent to educate his children, to form them for a life of usefulness and virtue, to provide for them situations needful for their subsistence, and suited to their circumstances, and to prepare them for those situations; he has a right to such authority, and in support of that authority to exercise such discipline, as may be necessary for these purposes. The law of nature acknowledges no other foundation of a parent's right over his children, besides his duty towards them. Hence it follows, that parents have no natural right over the lives of their children, as was absurdly allowed to Roman fathers; nor any to exercise unprofitable severities; nor to command the commission of crimes; for these rights can never be wanted for the purpose of a parent's duty. Paley's Moral and Political Philosophy, vol. i. pp. 343—363.

PARTHIANS, Παρθοί, signifies horsemen. The Parthians were the same as the ancient Persians. They were called Persians in the time of the prophets, and Parthians in that of our Saviour. However, the name of Parthians is read only in Acts, (ii. 9.) where they appear as distinct from the Elamites, though originally they formed only one people.

PARTRIDGE. In Jeremiah (xvii. 11.) we read as follows: 'As the partridge sitteth on eggs, and hatcheth them not, so he that getteth riches, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at his end shall be a fool.' It is difficult to ascertain in what sense the partridge justifies this similitude. It seems clear, that this bird 'sitteth on eggs not its own,' to correspond with the 'getting of riches not by right;' from these eggs it is driven away, 'leaves them in the midst of his days,' before the time for hatching them is expired. The same bird which does this, is also hunted upon the mountains. (1 Sam. xxvi. 20.) Mr. Parkhurst observes, that the partridge here mentioned must be the cock. The hen cannot be meant, because both the verbs are masculine; neither can כִּי, masculine, signifying laying of eggs. But why should it be said of the partridge, whether cock or hen, rather than of any other bird, that it sitteth, and hatcheth not? because the partridge's nest being made on the ground, the eggs are frequently broken by men, or other animals, and the bird is often obliged to quit them for fear of cattle, dogs, or sportsmen, which chills the eggs, and makes them unfruitful. Rain and moisture also may spoil them.

As to the hunting of the partridge, which Dr. Shaw observes, is the greater, or red-legged kind, the Dr. says, 'The Arabs have another, though a more laborious method of catching these birds; for observing they become languid and fatigued after they have been hastily put up twice or thrice, they immediately run in upon them, and knock them down with their zerwattys, or bludgeons as we should call them.'

Bochart thought that the bird in the prophet was of the snipe, or woodcock kind: that kind, however, haunts the marshes, not the mountains. As Buffon makes a separate species of the Bartavella, or Greek partridge, we shall offer that as the proper bird meant in these passages: 'To the red partridges, and principally to the Bartavella, must be referred all that the ancients have related of the partridge. Aristotle must needs know the Greek partridge better than any other, since this is the only kind in Greece, in the isles of the Mediterranean; and, according to all appearance, in that part of Asia conquered by Alexander.' Belon informs us, 'that the bartavella keeps ordinarily among rocks; but has the instinct to descend into the plain to make its nest, in order that the young may find at their birth a ready subsistence; lays from eight to sixteen eggs; is capable of connexion with the common hen, and has also another analogy with the common hen, which is, to sit upon (or hatch) the eggs of strangers for want of its own. This remark is of long standing, since it occurs in the sacred books.' Scripture Illustrated, Expos. Index, p. 90; Parkhurst's Hebrew and English Lexicon, p. 653.

PASSION, in its general import, signifies every feeling of the mind occasioned by an extrinsic cause. Among those passions, which, though distinct from benevolence, often operate as powerful allies in its support, may be reckoned the feeling of shame, and the desire of esteem. When we have done any thing which is wrong, or which conscience disapproves, we can hardly help sinking in our own estimation; and the same actions which make us, in some measure, forfeit our own esteem, must, in all cases in which they are known, cause us to lose the esteem of others. This apprehension usually enters, as a constituent, into the sensation of shame, on the first reflection of having done what is the proper object of that feeling. Thus the bitterness of our regret is increased; and thus Providence seems to employ our virtuous feelings to check the career of our iniquity. The feeling of shame, which is of so delicate and sensitive a nature, may indeed be easily diminished by neglect, till it is at last quite obliterated by perseverance in that course of conduct to which it had originally so lively a repugnance. But as long as the feeling has any hold in our hearts, its operations are uniformly in favour of virtue and beneficence.

Shame is a feeling of self-dissatisfaction; a consciousness of meriting, and a dread of incurring, the contempt and aversion of our fellow-creatures. We possess not only the feeling of shame to deter us from doing evil, but the desire of esteem, which powerfully operates with our feeling of benevolence, to impel us to do good. Though the desire of obtaining the good-will of others is certainly something very distinct from the feeling of good-will to others, yet both these passions will often unite in urging us to pursue the same course of conduct; for though they have different objects, they usually concur in adopting the same means for their attainment. As we naturally feel a certain sweet complacency and satisfaction in receiving the approbation of our own consciences, and in securing so sure a testimony to the integrity of our conduct, so the approbation of others naturally gives pleasure. For, as we are not formed to despise or hate others, so we are naturally averse to be the objects of hatred and contempt; as there is in our nature a spontaneous tendency to love others, so we naturally delight in having others love us. The desire of esteem is, indeed, only a modification of that principle, which makes our nature so forcibly gravitate towards society. And as men can really esteem and love others only for those actions which are the proper objects of esteem and love, and as no actions are the proper objects of esteem and love, but those which are morally beneficial, the desire of conciliating the good opinion, and attaching the kind affections of our fellow-creatures, was certainly designed by the wise Author of our frame as a powerful incentive to virtue and beneficence. The love of praise, which occasionally mixes itself with the desire, and is so often blended with it as not to be distinguished from it, is, indeed, often a false principle of action; but it is so only when it prevails to such a degree as to render us arrogant and self-conceited; or to counteract the growth of humility, meekness, and other qualities, which are always constituent parts of a truly virtuous and beneficent disposition. The love of praise, if by praise we mean not the vapid, not the corrupted, or prostituted applause of the multitude, but the partial regard, the favourable judgment of the wise and good, is very compatible with benevolence. The love of praise, in this sense, will be found to resolve itself into a desire to obtain the good of others by actions which are essentially good, or of which the results are most beneficial to society.

Friendship, compassion, and other affections, forcibly incline us to society; but, in fact, instead of acting in a direction opposite to our own good, they will be found to individuate our good with the good of others. Friendship, which originates in our more partial sympathies, preferring some individuals to others, tends to enlarge and diffuse the sensations of self, and to incorporate it in the persons of our friends. Compassion is a feeling which, abstractedly considered, evidently urges us, as far as we have power and opportunity, to the relief of every sentient being in distress. At first view, therefore, these affections may seem to lead us in a way very devious from that which self-love might prescribe as the shortest path to the greatest personal enjoyment. But reason will not assent to this inference, and experience proves it to be false. For, what corporeal pleasure can equal that which invariably flows from the indulgence of the softer affections of friendship and compassion? Do they not generate the most heartfelt satisfaction? Hence we see that those affections which seem, from their nature and operations, to be principally designed for, and more exclusively to tend to, the good of the species, do most effectually promote the happiness of the individual. Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol ii. pp. 134—139.

PASSOVER, פסח, pascha, signifies leap, passage. The passover was a solemn festival of the Jews, instituted in commemoration of their coming out of Egypt; because the night before their departure, the destroying angel that slew the first-born of the Egyptians, passed over the houses of the Hebrews without entering them, because they were marked with the blood of the lamb, which, for this reason, was called the paschal lamb.

The following is what God ordained concerning the passover. The month of the coming out of Egypt was after this to be the first month of the sacred or ecclesiastical year; and the fourteenth day of this month, between the two evenings, that is, between the sun's decline and its setting, or rather, according to our reckoning, between three o'clock in the afternoon and six in the evening, at the equinox, they were to kill the paschal lamb, and to abstain from leavened bread. The day following being the fifteenth, reckoned from six o'clock of the preceding evening, was the grand feast of the passover, which continued seven days; but only the first and the seventh days were peculiarly solemn. The slain lamb was to be without defect, a male, and of that year. If no lamb could be found, they might take a kid. They killed a lamb or a kid in each family; and if the number of the family was not sufficient to eat the lamb, they might associate two families together.

With the blood of the lamb they sprinkled the door-posts and lintel of every house, that the destroying angel at the sight of the blood might pass over them. They were to eat the lamb, the same night, roasted with unleavened bread, and a sallad of wild lettuces, or bitter herbs. It was forbidden to eat any part of it raw, or boiled, nor were they to break a bone; but it was to be eaten entire, even with the head, the feet, and the bowels. If any thing remained to the day following, it was thrown into the fire. (Exod. xii. 46; Numb. ix. 12; John xix. 36.) They who ate it were to be in the posture of travellers, having their reins girt, shoes on their feet, staves in their hands, and eating in a hurry. This last part of the ceremony was but little observed; at least it was of no obligation after that night they came out of Egypt. During the whole eight days of the Passover no leavened bread was to be used. They kept the first and last day of the feast; yet it was allowed to dress victuals, which was forbidden on the Sabbath-day.

The obligation of keeping the Passover was so strict, that whoever should neglect it was condemned to death. (Numb. ix. 13.) But those who had any lawful impediment, as a journey, sickness, or uncleanness, voluntary or involuntary; for example those who had been present at a funeral, or, &c. were to defer the celebration of the Passover till the second month of the ecclesiastical year, the fourteenth day of the month Jiar, which answers to April and May. We see an example of this postponed Passover under Hezekiah. (2 Chron. xxx. 2, 3, &c.)

The modern Jews observe in general the ceremonies practised by their ancestors, in the celebration of the Passover. On the fourteenth of Nisan the first-born of every family fasts, in memory of what happened the night when God smote the first-born of Egypt. The morning prayers are the same as those of other festivals; but they add the Psalms peculiar to this. They take the roll of the Pentateuch, and read Exodus xii., which contains the institution of the Passover, and Numbers xxviii., relating to the sacrifices proper to this feast. On the vigil of the feast the matron of the family sets out the table in the neatest manner she can; on which are set two unleavened cakes, two pieces of the lamb, one a shoulder roasted. to put them in mind that God delivered them with a stretched-out arm. The other piece is boiled, in memory of the sacrifice. To this they add, as is said, some small fishes, because of the Leviathan; a hard egg, because of the bird Ziz; some meat, because of the Behemoth; and nuts and pease for the children, to provoke their curiosity to ask reasons for this ceremony. It is observable, that the Leviathan, the Behemoth, and the Ziz, are three animals supposed to be appointed for the feast of the elect in the other life. They have a kind of mustard that has the appearance of mortar, which was heretofore made of dates and dried figs, and at present is made of chestnuts and apples, to represent the labour of making bricks. The father of the family sits down to table with his children and slaves; because all on this day are free. Being sat down, the chief of the family takes of the bitter herbs about the bigness of an olive, which he dips in the mustard, eats it, and distributes to the rest. Afterwards they eat the paschal lamb, the history and institution of which are explained by the father of the family. He concludes with prayer, and by exhorting to pray for the restoration of Jerusalem, and of the ancient sacrifices, that they may there eat the paschal lamb, and make God propitious to them by its blood. The same things are repeated the two following days. This festival is concluded by the ceremony of habdala, or distinction. This ceremony is performed at the closing of the sabbath day, when the master of the house pronounces certain words, and benedictions, to desire that every thing may succeed the coming week. At going out of the synagogue they go to eat unleavened bread for the last time. Whilst the temple was in existence, the Jews brought their lambs thither, and there sacrificed them; and they offered their blood to the priest, who poured it out at the foot of the altar.

The paschal lamb was an illustrious type of Christ, who became a sacrifice for the redemption of a lost world from sin and misery. It is worthy of observation, 1. that the anniversary or annual commemoration of the Passover was strictly and religiously kept by the Jews on the day, and hour of the day, on which the original transaction took place, throughout all their succeeding generations. 2. That on one of these anniversaries, and, as many suppose, on the very day and hour at which the paschal lamb was originally offered, our blessed Lord expired on the cross for the salvation of the world. 3. That after the destruction of Jerusalem, the paschal lamb ceased to be offered by the Jews throughout the world, though they continue to hold the anniversary of the Passover, but without any sacrifice, notwithstanding their deep-rooted, inveterate antipathy against the Author and grace of the gospel. 4. That the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was instituted to keep this true paschal sacrifice in commemoration, and that this has been religiously observed by nearly the whole Christian world, from the foundation of Christianity to the present day! 5. That the Jews were commanded to eat the paschal lamb; and our Lord commemorating the Passover, commanded his disciples, saying, 'Take, eat, This is my body, which is given for you; do this in remembrance of Me.' In the communion service of the Church of England, the spirit and design both of the type and antitype, are most expressively condensed into one point of view, in the address to the communicant: 'Take and eat this in remembrance that Christ died for thee; and feed on him in thy heart by faith with thanksgiving.' Thus God continues the memorial of that grand transaction which he has said should be an ordinance for ever; evidently meaning thereby, that the paschal lamb should be the significator till the passion and death of Christ; and that afterwards bread and wine taken sacramentally, in commemoration of his crucifixion, should be the continual representatives of that sacrifice till the end of the world. Thus the Passover in itself, and in its reference, is an ordinance for ever; and thus the words of the Lord are literally fulfilled. Dr. Adam Clarke's Commentary on Exod. xii. 27.

PATHROS, פתרוס, signifies the shell of dew; otherwise, persuasion, or spreading of ruin, or of distillation. It was the name of a city and district of Egypt, mentioned by the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel. (Jerem. xlv. 1. 15; Ezek. xxix. 14; xxx. 14.)

Its situation is not well ascertained, though Pliny, and Ptolemy the geographer, speak of the Phaturitic nome, in the Thebais, in Upper Egypt. Isaiah (xi. 11) calls it Pathros; and it is the country of the Pathrusim, the posterity of Mizraim, of whom Moses speaks. (Gen. x. 14.) Ezekiel threatens them with entire ruin. Notwithstanding the remonstrances of Jeremiah, the Jews retired thither; and the Lord says by Isaiah, that he will bring them back from thence.

PATIENCE is that calm and unruffled temper with which a good man bears the evils of life. Patience is apt to be ranked by many among the more humble and obscure virtues, belonging chiefly to those who groan on a sick bed, or who languish in a prison; but in every circumstance of life no virtue is more important both to duty and to happiness. It is not confined to a situation of continued adversity. It principally, indeed, regards the disagreeable circumstances which are apt to occur. But in our present state the occurrence of these is so frequent, that in every condition of life, patience is incessantly called forth. Without it, prosperity cannot be enjoyed, any more than adversity supported. If we would pass through the world with tranquillity and honour, it must enter into the temper and form the habit of the soul.

One of the purest sources of patience is faith in the superintending providence of God. When we think that every event in life is merely fortuitous, the effect of chance, or of combinations of occurrences, over which no intelligence presides, and which no goodness directs, there can be but little hope to cherish patience. Patience under those sufferings which are the natural consequence of the circumstances in which we are placed, and which may rather be ascribed to a divine agency than to human contrivance, is principally encouraged and supported by this consideration, that those sufferings do originate in a benevolent intention, and will be ultimately beneficial. Now what is there which can produce this belief in him, who thinks that there is one end to the righteous and to the wicked, that there is nothing like a moral government manifested in the vicissitudes of life, and that if there be a Supreme Being, he is an indifferent spectator of human interests and human actions? But when we believe that every event which befalls us, is the result of Wisdom and of Goodness, making the best possible contrivance for our welfare, suited to our disposition and our circumstances, this persuasion will prove a comfort in sorrow, and a stay in misery. It will enliven hope, and hope will establish patience; for we are easily reconciled to those pains which we consider as the infliction of Goodness, and subservient to our happiness.

This belief in the good providence of God will work in us that placid submission to his will, in which the perfection of patience resides. For we readily acquiesce in the determinations of one whose judgment is better than our own, and whose regard for us we believe to be equal to our regard for ourselves. If we have right notions of the perfections of God, and a hearty reliance on his goodness, we cannot but be assured, that whatever he wills must be beneficial for us to endure. No affliction is for the present matter of joy, but of grief; but that anticipation of future good, which religious trust excites, cannot but greatly blunt the edge or alleviate the pressure of any present evil. For if the whole world be subject to the administration of a Being, whose tender mercies are over all his works, our calamities, however severe they may seem, can never be more than proportioned to our necessities, and their continuance cannot be longer than our needs. It is, indeed, natural for us to desire a termination of our pains; but if we consider those pains as the effect of the most beneficent regard, and expressly designed for the prevention of our misery, or the promotion of our happiness, shall we not rather wish that they may last till they have accomplished the purpose for which they were inflicted?

Christianity not only teaches patience by precept, but it most clearly shows, and most forcibly inculcates, this and every other virtue, by an example the most perfect, most interesting, and most instructive. Our blessed Saviour was placed in such circumstances as are best fitted for the culture, and most imperiously demand the exercise, of patience. Do we repine at the meanness of our parentage, or the poverty of our circumstances? Was not he continually reproached with the obscurity of his origin, and the want of lustre in his temporal condition? Did he not endure the most distressing privations? And yet did he exhibit any marks of querulousness and impatience? Did he not rather practise the utmost complacency and forbearance?

We all possess a quick sense of insult and of injury. Every species of insult or injury soon exasperates our pride, and kindles our resentment. And it is in the victory over those passions and sensations to which we are most liable, and by which we are most easily subdued, that true evangelical patience consists. Now this patience can be founded only on a belief in this truth, that God is the avenger of all those who suffer wrong; and that he will recompense those who suffer patiently. We know that if there be a moral Governor of the universe, all wrong must ultimately turn to the hurt of him who does it. This persuasion, therefore, will serve to moderate our resentment; and to tincture the feeling with something like compassion for that blindness to his own greatest interest and happiness which he manifests who, in word or deed, commits any cruelty or injury. For the retributive vengeance of God is sure, though it is not immediate. He who is conscious of this important truth, has the strongest inducement to practise equanimity and forbearance. For, while religion forbids every act of revenge, reason will also teach us, that on almost every occasion, we aggravate rather than diminish, inflame rather than heal, the wrongs which others do us, by labouring to return evil for evil, and to retaliate one suffering by a greater. By endeavouring to avenge ourselves, we in some measure take vengeance out of the hand of God, and become obnoxious to the punishment which our enemies would otherwise, without real contrition, and, as far as in their power, actual restitution for every wrong which they have done, sooner or later have experienced. Hence, therefore, the Scriptures exhort us to render to no man evil for evil; but, on the contrary, rather to cultivate that disposition, which will induce us, when opportunity offers, to pray for those who despitefully use and persecute us, and, if our enemy hunger, to give him food, or if he thirst, to give him drink. Blair's Sermons, vol. ii. p. 102.

PATMOS, Πάτμος, signifies deadly, or mortal. Patmos is an island of the Ægean Sea, one of the Sporades, whither the apostle and evangelist St. John was banished, in the reign of Domitian. (Rev. i. 9.) In this island he had his revelations. Most interpreters think that he wrote them in the same place; but others are of opinion that he did not write them till after his return to Ephesus. The island of Patmos lies between the island of Icaria, and the promontory of Miletus. It is now called Patino, or Pactino, or Patmol. Its circuit is five-and-twenty or thirty miles. It has a city called Patmos, with a harbour, and some monasteries of Greek monks. They show you a cave, now a chapel, where they pretend St. John wrote the Revelations.

'Patmos,' says Dr. Wittman, 'has an excellent harbour; and the town being situated on the loftiest part of the island, makes a pretty appearance on entering. The houses, being constructed of a white free stone, have a peculiarly neat aspect. It has been calculated that the town has an elevation of nearly five hundred feet above the level of the sea. In its centre is a large convent dedicated to St. John the Evangelist, who was banished to this island. Here he wrote his Revelations. We saw, in walking to the summit of the hill, the grotto in which he is said to have composed them. The convent has a resident bishop, with a considerable number of monks, and is a college for the education of young men of the Greek persuasion. In those parts of the island which the inhabitants are able to cultivate, we saw several small fields or patches of corn, banked up with stones, to prevent the soil from being washed away by the rains. It appeared, however, to be capable of producing but an inconsiderable quantity of grain. The inhabitants procure sheep and cattle from the neighbouring islands. The town contains about two hundred houses. The women are to the men in the proportion of five to one.'

De la Motraye describes St. John's convent as 'the principal thing worth seeing on this island; it is a sort of a castle, flanked with several towers, with a church but indifferently built, and yet worse painted within. It is pretty well walled, as are most of the others, in general; but, what I never saw in the Turkish dominions except there, at Scio afterwards, and Mount Athos, there were two bells hanging at the gate of the convent. In this monastery were ninety-three Calayeros, or Greek monks, and (as they told me) above one hundred churches, or rather chapels, on the island, to which they had then but ten secular priests, which, with the Calayeros, were more than sufficient for the number of inhabitants, who were not four thousand. I saw also the hermit's cell, called by the people of the country Apocalypsis, where they pretend that St. John wrote his Revelations. It is not very far from the convent, and a narrow way cut in the rock, leads directly to a little chapel, whose vaulted roof was tolerably fine; from whence one passes into a grotto, where (it is believed) St. John retired to write his Revelations: and a papas (priest) showed me a cleft in the solid rock, through which he affirmed, pretty positively, the voice of God was heard by that evangelist. This grotto is a miserable hole.' Dr. Wittman's Travels, p. 113; Sacred Geography.

PATRIARCHS. This name is given to the ancient fathers, chiefly those who lived before Moses, as Adam, Lamech, Noah, Shem, &c. Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, the sons of Jacob, and heads of the tribes. The Hebrews call them princes of the tribes, or heads of the fathers. The name Patriarch is derived from the Greek Patriarcha, head of a family.

The Scripture chronology respecting the ages of some of the ante and post diluvian Patriarchs has greatly embarrassed chronologists, critics, and divines. The printed Hebrew text, the Samaritan, the Septuagint, and Josephus, are all different, and have their respective vouchers and defenders. The preceding tables of the genealogies of the Patriarchs before and after the flood, according to the Hebrew, Samaritan, and Septuagint, exhibit at once the discordances.

The period before the flood is reckoned by Josephus to be 2256 years; and the second period to the seventieth year of Terah, 1002 years.

Thus, the Hebrew says, that Adam lived 130 years, and begat Seth; and the Septuagint, that he lived 230 years, and begat Seth. The Septuagint add 100 years to the age of each of the antediluvian Patriarchs before he begat his son, except to Jared and Methuselah; and the Samaritan agrees with the Hebrew in the age of each Patriarch before he begat his son, except that it makes Jared 100, Methuselah 120, and Lamech 129 years younger. It is, however, observable that this difference in the chronology of the Hebrew, the Samaritan, and the Septuagint, affects nothing which is necessary either to be believed or practised. Every thing material and necessary for us to know and believe, in this part of Scripture, is the same in all, and no difference exists between them.

Nothing has caused so great a difference between the ancient Christian chronologers who follow the Septuagint, and those of modern times who follow the Hebrew, as the difference between the Hebrew and Greek copies, in the age of the most ancient Patriarchs when they begat their children. It would appear, however, from Philo and Josephus, that originally no difference existed between the Hebrew genealogies and those of the Greek version; that the computation of Josephus was conformable to both in his time; and that either the Hebrew copies, or the Greek copies, both of the Septuagint and of Josephus, have been adulterated since his time. The Hebrew chronology is chiefly followed; and it is generally supposed that the adulteration took place in the Greek, rather than in the Hebrew copies. Dr. Hales, however, seems to be of a different opinion. He observes, that the inspection of various editions, and the copious collations of the Hebrew text with a great number of MSS. collected from all parts of the world, by the laudable industry and extensive researches of Kennicott, De Rossi, and other learned men, have proved that the sacred classics are not less exempt from various readings than the profane. He thinks that the Hebrew copies afforded greater facilities and opportunities of adulteration than the Greek:

because the Hebrew language was not in general use like the Greek; and because copies of the Septuagint in the possession of the Christians, rendered any material adulteration of the Greek text, at least in so important a case as that of the genealogies, almost impossible. He is also of opinion, that the Hebrew copies lay under a greater temptation to be adulterated than the Greek, because the Jews were full of rage and vexation that their own Scriptures were turned against them to prove that Jesus was indeed the Christ. Hence he concludes, that the adulteration was rather of the Hebrew Genealogies than of the Greek, and that it was introduced, probably by Aquila, just before the time of the fabrication of the Seder Olam Rabba, A.D. 130, founded upon it. 'The motive,' he says, 'which led the Jews to mutilate the Patriarchal genealogies, is very clearly exposed by Ephrem Syrus, who died A.D. 378, and who states that the Jews have subtracted 600 years from the generations of Adam, Seth, &c. in order that their own books might not convict them concerning the coming of Christ, he having been predicted to appear for the deliverance of mankind after 5500 years.

According to the chronology of our English Bibles, the creation of the world was 4004 years, and the time of the Flood 2348 years before Christ. Hence the time from the creation to the Flood was 1656 years; which was exactly the time that the antediluvian patriarchs lived in their regular succession, from the creation of the world to the general deluge, according to the approved chronology in our English Bibles. The reason why the lives of the Patriarchs were so prolonged by God, is evident. Pascal observes, that it is not the number of years that renders things obscure, but generations. Lamech had a sight of Adam, to whom God probably communicated the account of his own creation and that of the world; Shem conversed with Lamech; Abraham with Shem; Jacob with Abraham; and Moses with those who had seen Jacob. Bishop Watson's Theologic. Tracts, vol. iii. pp. 55, 56; Dr. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. i. pp. 72—78.

PATRIARCHS, among Christians, are ecclesiastical dignitaries, or bishops, so called from their paternal authority in the church. The power of patriarchs was not the same in all, but differed according to the customs of different countries, or the pleasure of kings and councils. Thus the patriarch of Constantinople became a patriarch over the patriarchs of Ephesus and Cæsarea, and was called the Oecumenical and Universal Patriarch; and the patriarch of Alexandria had some prerogatives which no other patriarch but himself enjoyed; such as the right of consecrating and approving of every single bishop under his jurisdiction. The patriarchate has been ever esteemed the supreme dignity in the church. The bishop had only under him the territory of the city of which he was bishop; the metropolitan superintended a province, and had for suffragans the bishops of his province; the primate was the chief of what was then called a diocese, and had several metropolitans under him; and the patriarch had under him several dioceses, composing one exarchate, and the primates themselves were under him. Usher, Pagi, De Marca, and Morinus, attribute the establishment of the grand patriarchates to the apostles themselves, who, in their opinion, according to the description of the world then given by geographers, made choice of three principal cities in the three parts of the known world, namely, Rome in Europe, Antioch in Asia, and Alexandria in Africa; and thus formed a trinity of patriarchs. Others maintain, that the name patriarch was unknown at the time of the council of Nice; and that for a long time afterwards patriarchs and primates were confounded together, as being all equally chiefs of dioceses, and equally superior to metropolitans, who were only chiefs of provinces. Hence Socrates gives the title patriarch to all the chiefs of dioceses, and reckons ten of them.

Mosheim is of opinion, that the bishops, who enjoyed a certain degree of pre-eminence over the rest of their order, were distinguished by the Jewish title of patriarchs in the fourth century. The authority of the patriarchs gradually increased till about the close of the fifth century. All affairs of moment within the compass of their patriarchates came before them either in the first place, or by appeals from the metropolitans. They consecrated bishops; assembled yearly in council the clergy of their respective districts; pronounced a decisive judgment in those cases in which accusations were brought against bishops; and appointed vicars or deputies, clothed with their authority, for the preservation of order and tranquillity in the remoter provinces.

Bishop Tomline thinks, that the date of the patriarchates of Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch, was certainly prior to the council of Nice, and probably much earlier. 'The see of Constantinople,' he observes, 'was not raised into a patriarchate till the first council of Constantinople, A.D. 381. It was at the same time decreed, that the patriarch of Constantinople should rank immediately after the patriarch of Rome, who had precedence of the other patriarchs; and this distinction was confirmed by the council of Chalcedon, and the second council of Constantinople, and by several imperial edicts; and, therefore, at the end of the fourth century, and for some time afterwards, the whole of Christendom may be considered as divided into four parts, two of which were in the east, and were subject to the patriarchs of Constantinople and Antioch; the south was under the patriarch of Alexandria; and the west under the patriarch of Rome. The patriarchs had the power of assembling the archbishops and bishops within their jurisdiction, of consecrating archbishops, and of hearing appeals from them.' Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christian Theology, vol. ii. p. 392; Broughton's Hist. Dictionary, vol. ii. p. 227; Biographia Britannica; Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. i. p. 349, vol. ii. p. 23. edit. 1811.

PATRIPASSIANS, a denomination that arose in the second century. Praxeas, a man of genius and learning, denied any real distinction between the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and maintained that the Father, sole Creator of all things, had united to himself the human nature of Christ. Hence his followers were called Monarchians, because of their denying a plurality of persons in the Deity; and also Patripassians, because they believed that the Father was so intimately united with the man Christ, his son, that he suffered with him the anguish of an afflicted life, and the torments of an ignominious death. It does not appear, that this sect formed to itself a separate place of worship, or removed from the ordinary assemblies of Christians. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. i. p. 235, edit. 1811.

PAUL, Παῦλος, signifies small, or little. Paul, originally named Saul, was of the tribe of Benjamin, a native of Tarsus in Cilicia, and of the sect of the Pharisees. He was first a persecutor of the church, afterwards a disciple of Jesus Christ, and apostle of the Gentiles. Bishop Pearce conjectures, that he changed his Hebrew name Saul to the Roman name Paul, from respect to his first Roman convert Sergius Paulus. (Acts xiii. 7.) He was a Roman citizen, (Acts xxii. 27, 28.) because Augustus had given the freedom of Rome to all the freemen of Tarsus, in consideration of their firm adherence to his interests. It is probable that he laid the foundation of those literary attainments, for which he was so eminent in the future part of his life, at his native city of Tarsus; and he afterwards studied the law of Moses, and the traditions of the elders, at Jerusalem, under Gamaliel, a celebrated Rabbi.

St. Paul is not mentioned in the Gospels; nor is it known whether he ever heard our Saviour preach, or saw him perform any miracle. His name first occurs in the account given in the Acts of the martyrdom of St. Stephen, to which he is said to have consented: he is upon that occasion called a young man, but we are no where informed what was then his precise age. This might happen A.D. 34.

At the time of the persecution against the church, after the death of Stephen, Saul was one who shewed most violence in distrekking the believers. (Gal. i. 13.; Acts xxvi. 11.) He entered into their houses, and forcibly seized both men and women, and sent them to prison. (Acts viii. 3.; xxii. 4.) In the synagogues he caused those to be beaten who believed in Jesus Christ, compelling them to blaspheme the name of the Lord. Having received credentials from the high-priest Caiaphas, and the elders of the Jews, to the chief Jews of Damascus, with power to bring to Jerusalem all the Christians he should find there, he departed, full of threats, and breathing out slaughter. But, being on the road, and near to Damascus, suddenly about noon a great light from heaven encompassed him and all his company. This splendour struck them to the ground, and Saul heard a voice saying to him, 'Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?' Saul answered, 'Who art thou, Lord?' The Lord replied, 'I am Jesus of Nazareth, whom thou persecutest; it is hard for thee to kick against the pricks.' Saul in consternation asked, 'Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?' Jesus bid him go to Damascus, where he should learn his will.

Saul now, though his eye-lids were open, yet could not see; but his companions led him by the hand to Damascus, where he continued three days without sight, and without nourishment. On the third day, the Lord commanded a disciple of his, Ananias, to find out Saul, to lay his hands on him, and to cure his blindness. This he did; then Saul was baptized, and filled with the Holy Ghost. He continued some days with the disciples at Damascus, preaching in the synagogues, and proving that Jesus was the Messiah. The conversion of Paul may be dated A.D. 35.

Having preached some time at Damascus, he went into Arabia, (Gal. i. 17.) probably into the neighbourhood of Damascus, then under the government of Aretas, king of Arabia. After some time, he returned to Damascus, and preached the Gospel. The Jews, unable to endure the progress of the Gospel here, resolved to put him to death, and gained over the governor. Saul, however, escaped, by being let down over the wall in a basket, (Acts ix. 24, 25, 26, 27.) A.D. 38.

Coming to Jerusalem to see St. Peter, the disciples were afraid of him, not believing him to be a convert; (Gal. i. 18.) but Barnabas having introduced him to the apostles, Saul related to them the manner of his conversion, &c. From Jerusalem he went to Cæsarea of Palestine, and thence into his own country, Tarsus in Cilicia.

A. D. 39. While Saul was in Cilicia, he had those divine visions and revelations of which he speaks; (2 Cor. xii.) on which occasion there was given him a thorn in the flesh, lest he should have been exalted above measure, through the abundance of the revelations. By this thorn in the flesh is now generally supposed a paralytic affection, brought on by his vision, which occasioned a distortion of countenance, stammering, and paralytic affection of the nerves. But the words of the original do not compel us to suppose that the infirmity was absolutely occasioned by his vision, since this would exclude the instrumentality of Satan. It may be inferred, that the infirmity came on after the vision. Indeed, it is probable, that the high excitement of that vision, and of the other revelations with which he had been favoured, and was afterwards favoured, and the excessive and constant ferment of mind, joined to fatigues of body, would bring on chronic infirmities of the paralytic kind, such as, especially with diabolical co-operation, might occasion distortion of countenance, and some slight defect in utterance, yet fatal to oratory, not to mention hypochondriac and nervous affections, all which would tend to raise contempt with the multitude, and which joined to his diminutive size, and crooked form, will readily account for the ἀσθένεια τοῦ σώματος dwelt upon by his adversaries.

Saul continued in Cilicia for some time, till A. D. 42, when Barnabas coming to Antioch by order of the Apostles, and having found many Christians there, went to Tarsus to seek Saul, and brought him to Antioch, where they continued a whole year. (Acts xi. 20, 25, 26.) During this time there happened a great famine in Judea, which commenced in the fourth, but raged chiefly in the fifth and sixth years of Claudius Cæsar; and the Christians of Antioch having made collections to assist their brethren at Jerusalem, they deputed thither Saul and Barnabas with their offerings, A. D. 44. Having acquitted themselves of their commission, they returned to Antioch. Shortly after, God warned them by his prophets in this church, that he had appointed them to carry his word into other places. Then the church, after fasting and praying, with the prophets Simeon, Lucius, and Manaen, laid their hands on them, and sent them to preach whither the Holy Ghost should conduct them.

Saul and Barnabas went first into Cyprus, preaching in the synagogues of the Jews. At Paphos, A. D. 45, they found a Jewish magician, called Bar-jesus, with the proconsul Sergius Paulus. Bar-jesus did all he could to hinder the proconsul from embracing the Christian faith. As a punishment, Saul deprived him of his sight for a time, and the proconsul, having seen this miracle, became a convert.

From Cyprus St. Paul and his company went A. D. 46, to Perga in Pamphylia, where John Mark left them to return to Jerusalem. Making no stop at Perga, they came to Antioch in Pisidia, where being desired to speak in the synagogue, St. Paul in a long discourse shewed that Jesus was the Messiah foretold by the prophets; and that he rose again the third day. He was desired to discourse again on the same subject the next sabbath-day, when almost all the city came together to hear. The Jews seeing this concourse, and moved with envy, opposed what St. Paul said. Then said Paul and Barnabas boldly, 'We turn to the Gentiles.' (Acts xiii. 1—46.)

The Jews, unable to bear this happy progress of the Gospel, drove away Paul and Barnabas from thence, who went to Iconium. They preached in their synagogue, converted a great number, both of Jews and Gentiles, and God confirmed their mission by many miracles. In the mean time, the Jews having incensed the Gentiles against Paul and Barnabas, and threatening to stone them, they retired to Lystra and Derbe, cities of Lycaonia. At Lystra was a man called Æneas, crippled in his feet from his mother's womb. This man the apostle bid to rise and stand upon his feet. The people seeing this miracle, cried out, that the gods were descended among them in human shape. They would have offered sacrifices to them; but Paul and Barnabas, with much ado, restrained them.

Some Jews of Antioch in Pisidia, and of Iconium, coming to Lystra, animated the people against the apostles, who stoned Paul, and drew him out of the city, thinking him to be dead. But the disciples gathering about him, he rose up, and the next day went for Derbe. Having here also preached the Gospel, they returned to Lystra, to Iconium, and to Antioch of Pisidia; to Pamphylia, and Perga; thence they went down into Attalia, and sailed for Antioch in Syria, whither they returned A.D. 47. This first apostolical journey of St. Paul, in which he was accompanied and assisted by Barnabas, is supposed to have occupied about two years. (Acts xiii. 46—52.; xiv. 1—27.)

Paul and Barnabas continued at Antioch a considerable time; and while they were there, a dispute arose between them and some Jewish Christians of Judea. These men asserted, that the Gentile converts could not obtain salvation through the Gospel, unless they were circumcised: Paul and Barnabas maintained the contrary opinion. This dispute was carried on for some time with great earnestness; and it being a question, in which not only the present, but all future Gentile converts were concerned, it was thought right that Paul and Barnabas, with some others, should go up to Jerusalem to consult the apostles and elders concerning it. They passed through Phœnice and Samaria, and upon their arrival at Jerusalem, A.D. 49, a council was assembled for the purpose of discussing this important point. Peter, and James the Less, were present, and delivered their sentiments, which coincided with those of Paul and Barnabas; and, after much deliberation, it was agreed, that, as a term or condition of salvation, neither circumcision, nor conformity to any part of the ritual law of Moses, was necessary in Gentile converts; but that it should be recommended to them to abstain from certain specified things prohibited by that law, lest their indulgence in them should give offence to their brethren of the circumcision, who were still very zealous for the observance of the ceremonial part of their ancient religion. This decision, which was declared to have the sanction of the Holy Ghost, was communicated to the Gentile Christians of Syria and Cilicia, by a letter written in the name of the apostles, elders, and whole church at Jerusalem, and conveyed by Judas and Silas, who accompanied Paul and Barnabas to Antioch for that purpose. (Acts xv. 1—35.)

Not long after Paul's return to Antioch, Peter came thither, and at first associated freely with the Gentile converts; but he afterwards withdrew himself from them, through fear of incurring the displeasure of some Jewish Christians, who had come from Jerusalem. Paul publicly, and with great severity, reproved him for this instance of weakness or dissimulation, and pointed out the impropriety and inconsistency of such conduct.

St. Paul, in this journey to Jerusalem, declared the doctrine he preached among the Gentiles, and discoursed of some points of it in private, in the presence of Barnabas and Titus, with Peter, James, and John, who could find nothing amiss in it. They saw with joy the grace that God had given him, and his appointment as apostle of the Gentiles.

After Paul and Barnabas had continued a short time at Antioch, Paul proposed to Barnabas to visit the cities where they had planted the Gospel. Barnabas consented, but wished to take Mark with them. This was opposed by St. Paul, and caused a separation between them. Barnabas and Mark went together to Cyprus; and St. Paul, taking Silas, they crossed over Syria and Cilicia, and came to Derbe, and afterwards to Lystra, A.D. 50. Here they found a disciple called Timothy, the son of a Jewish mother, but of a Gentile father, whom St. Paul took with him, and circumcised him, that he might not offend the Jews. They went over the provinces of Lycaonia, Phrygia, and Galatia, to Mysia, and, coming to Troas, they were joined by the evangelist Luke, and St. Paul had here a vision in the night. 'There stood a man of Macedonia, and prayed him, saying, Come over into Macedonia, and help us.' (Acts xv. 35—41.; xvi. 1—9.)

Paul knew this to be a command from heaven. Embarking, therefore, at Troas, they sailed to Neapolis, a city of Macedonia, near the frontiers of Thrace, and came to Philippi, where they found some religious women, among whom was Lydia. Another day they happened to meet with a maid servant, who was possessed with a spirit of Python. Paul, turning towards her, said to the spirit, I command thee, in the name of Jesus Christ, to come out of her; upon which it immediately left her. But the masters of the servant, who made great profit by her, accused Paul and Silas before the magistrates, who ordered them to be whipped with rods, and sent them to prison.

Towards midnight, as Paul and Silas were singing hymns to God, there was a great earthquake; the foundations of the prison were shaken, all the doors flew open, and the fetters of the prisoners burst. The gaoler awaked, and, seeing all this, drew his sword with intention to kill himself; but Paul cried out to him to do himself no mischief, for they were all safe. The gaoler then brought out Paul and Silas, asking them what he must do to be saved? Paul and Silas instructing him and his family, baptized them. In the morning the magistrates sent to release his prisoners; but Paul refused, saying, After they have publicly whipped us, being Roman citizens, they shall come themselves and fetch us out: the magistrates hearing they were Roman citizens, did so. Paul and Silas went first to Lydia, and comforted the brethren; then they departed from Philippi. (Acts xvi. 9—40.)

Passing through Amphipolis and Apollonia, they came to Thessalonica, the capital of Macedonia, where the Jews had a synagogue. Paul, according to his custom, there preached the Gospel three sabbath-days successively. Several believed in Jesus Christ; but the greater part of the Jews raised a tumult in the city. The night following, the brethren conducted Paul and Silas towards Berea, where many were converted.

The Jews of Thessalonica, being informed that Paul and Silas were at Berea, came thither, and animated the mob against them; so that St. Paul was forced to withdraw, and went to Athens.

Disputing with the Athenian philosophers, they brought him before the Areopagus, where he made his defence, intending to instruct them respecting the 'Unknown God.' A few embraced the faith at Athens. (Acts xvii.) See ALTAR, ATHENS.

Timothy came from Berea to Athens, according to the request of St. Paul, and informed him of the persecution which afflicted the Christians of Thessalonica.

This obliged the apostle to send him into Macedonia, that he might comfort them. After this, St. Paul went to Corinth, where he lodged with one Aquila, a Jew, a tent-maker; and with him St. Paul worked, as being of the same trade. Here he made several converts, and baptized Stephanas and his house, with Crispus and Gaius. (1 Cor. i. 11. 16. 17.; xvi. 15.) Silas and Timothy came to Corinth, (Acts xviii. 5. 1 Thess. iii. 6. 9.) A.D. 51, and brought him great comfort, acquainting him with the good state of the faithful of Thessalonica. Shortly after he wrote his first Epistle to the Thessalonians, which is the first Epistle he wrote, A.D. 52.

The second Epistle to the Thessalonians was written not long after the first. St. Paul, encouraged by the presence of Silas and Timothy, prosecuted the work of his ministry with new ardour; but the Jews opposing him with blasphemous and opprobrious words, 'he shook his raiment, and said unto them, Your blood be upon your own heads; I am clean: from henceforth I will go unto the Gentiles.' He then quitted the house of Aquila, and went to lodge with one Titus Justus, who was originally a Gentile, but one that feared God. In the mean time, God encouraged him by a vision, and told him that he had much people in Corinth. He continued here a year and six months, during which time he probably also wrote his Epistle to the Galatians.

From Corinth Paul sailed into Syria, and thence he went to Ephesus. The Ephesians, upon hearing the Gospel explained by Paul, desired that he would continue with them; but, as it was necessary for him to keep the approaching feast at Jerusalem, he could not comply with their request: however, he promised that, with the permission of God, he would return to them. He sailed from Ephesus to Cæsarea, and is supposed to have arrived at Jerusalem just before the feast of Pentecost. After the feast he went to Antioch; and this was the conclusion of his second apostolical journey, in which he was accompanied by Silas; and, in part of it, Luke and Timothy were also with him.

Having made a short stay at Antioch, Paul set out upon his third apostolical journey. He passed through Galatia and Phrygia, confirming the Christians of those countries; and thence, according to his promise, he went to Ephesus, A.D. 54. (Acts xviii.) He found there some disciples who had only been baptized with John's baptism. He directed that they should be baptized in the name of Jesus; and then he communicated to them the Holy Ghost. He preached for the space of three months in the synagogue; but the Jews being hardened beyond conviction, and speaking reproachfully of the Christian religion before the multitude, he left them; and, from that time, he delivered his instructions in the school of a person called Tyrannus, who was probably a Gentile. Paul continued to preach in this place about two years, so that all the inhabitants of that part of Asia Minor 'heard the word of the Lord Jesus, both Jews and Greeks.' During this stay of St. Paul at Ephesus, he wrote his first Epistle to the Corinthians, probably in the beginning of the year 56; and from this Epistle we learn that he supported himself by his own labour at Ephesus, as he had before done at Corinth. (1 Cor. iv. 11, 12.) He alludes to the same thing in his speech to the Ephesian elders at Miletus. (Acts xx. 34.) He performed many miracles at Ephesus; and not only great numbers of people were converted to Christianity, but many also of those, who in this superstitious city used incantations and magical arts, professed their belief in the Gospel, and renounced their former practices, by publicly burning their books.

Such was the general success of Paul's preaching at Ephesus. But Demetrius, a silversmith, who sold models of the temple and image of Diana, observing the tendency of the Gospel to put an end to every thing connected with idolatry, represented to the workmen employed by him, and to others of the same occupation, that not only their trade would be ruined, which they knew by experience to be very lucrative, but also that the temple of their 'great goddess, Diana,' the pride and glory of their city, would be brought into discredit and contempt, if Paul were permitted to propagate his doctrines, and to persuade the people 'that they be no gods which are made with hands:' these men, thus instigated both by interest and superstition, raised a great tumult in the city, and probably would have proceeded to extremities against Paul and his companions, if the chief magistrate had not interposed, and by his authority dispersed the multitude. (Acts xix.)

Previously to this disturbance Paul had intended to continue at Ephesus till Titus should return, whom he had sent (2 Cor. xii. 18.) to enquire into the state of the church at Corinth. He now thought it prudent to go from Ephesus immediately; (Acts xx.) and having taken an affectionate leave of the disciples, he set out for Troas, (2 Cor. ii. 12, 13.) where he expected to meet Titus.

Titus, however, from some cause which is not known, did not come to Troas; and Paul was encouraged to pass over into Macedonia, with the hope of making converts. He met Titus there, (2 Cor. vii. 6.) and sent him back, with several other persons, to apprise the Corinthians of his intention to visit them shortly. St. Paul's second Epistle to the Corinthians was written at this time. St. Paul, after preaching in Macedonia, and receiving from the Christians of that country liberal contributions for their poor brethren in Judea, (2 Cor. viii. 1.) went to Corinth, and remained there about three months. Just before Paul left Corinth, he wrote his Epistle to the Romans, probably in the beginning of the year 58. The Christians also of Corinth, and of the rest of Achaia, contributed to the relief of their brethren in Judea.

St. Paul's intention was to have sailed from Corinth into Syria; but being informed that some unbelieving Jews, who had discovered his intention, lay in wait for him, he changed his plan, passed through Macedonia, and sailed from Philippi to Troas in five days. He staid at Troas seven days, and preached to the Christians on the first day of the week, the day on which they were accustomed to meet for the purpose of religious worship. St. Paul, being to depart the day following, discoursed to them till midnight. During this time, a young man, called Eutychus, happening to sit in a window, overcome by sleep, fell down from three stories high, and was killed by the fall. St. Paul came down to him, embraced him, and restored him to life. He went on foot as far as Assos, (otherwise Apollonia) and embarked at Mitylene; whence he came to Miletus, whither the elders of the church of Ephesus came to see him.

After having exhorted them, and having prayed with them, he went on board, and arrived safe at Tyre. At Cæsarea they found Philip the Evangelist, who was one of the seven deacons. While St. Paul was here, the prophet Agabus arrived also from Judea; and having taken St. Paul's girdle, he bound his own hands and feet with it, saying, 'So shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man that owneth this girdle, and shall deliver him into the hands of the Gentiles.' This prediction caused great uneasiness to Paul's friends; and they endeavoured to dissuade him from his intention of going thither. Paul, however, would not listen to their entreaties, but declared that he was ready to die at Jerusalem, if it were necessary, for the name of the Lord Jesus. Seeing him thus resolute, they desisted from their importunities, and accompanied him to Jerusalem, where he is supposed to have arrived just before the feast of Pentecost, A.D. 58. This may be considered as the end of St. Paul's third apostolical journey.

At Jerusalem the brethren received him with great joy; and the day following he went to see St. James, at whose house Paul gave an account of what God had done among the Gentiles by his ministry. St. James informed him that the converted Jews were strangely prejudiced against him. He advised Paul to join himself to four men who were there, and who had had a vow of Nazariteship, and to contribute to the charge of their purification, and purify himself also, that he might offer with them the offerings and sacrifices ordained for the purification of a Nazarite. Others, however, seem more rightly to refer this vow, which was a civil vow, and not one of Nazariteship, to Aquila. See NAZARITES.

St. Paul followed this advice, and the next day went into the temple, where he declared to the priests, that in seven days these four Nazarites would complete their vow of Nazariteship, and that he would contribute his share of their charges. But towards the end of these seven days, the Jews of Asia observing him in the temple, moved the people against him, seized him, shut the gates of the temple, and would have killed him, had not Lysias, the tribune of the Roman garrison there, run and rescued him. St. Paul being on the steps, desired the tribune to suffer him to speak to the people. The tribune permitted him: and St. Paul related the manner of his conversion, and his mission from God to preach to the Gentiles. At his mentioning the Gentiles, the Jews cried out, Away with this wicked fellow out of the world, for he is not worthy to live!

The tribune brought him into the castle, and ordered that he should be put to the question by whipping; but being bound, he said to the tribune, Is it lawful for you to whip a Roman citizen before you hear him? The tribune, hearing this, caused him to be unbound, and, assembling the priests and the chiefs of the Jews, he brought Paul before them, that he might know the occasion of this tumult. Paul said, 'Brethren, I have lived in all good conscience before God until this day.' At these words, Ananias, the high-priest, ordered to give him a blow in the face. St. Paul replied to him, 'God shall smite thee, thou whited wall: for sittest thou to judge me after the law, and commandest me to be smitten contrary to the law?' Those present said to him, 'Revilest thou God's high-priest?' St. Paul excused himself by saying, that he did not know he was the high-priest. Then, perceiving that part of the assembly were Sadducees, and part Pharisees, he cried out, 'Brethren, I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee: of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question.'

The assembly being divided in opinion, and the clamour increasing, the tribune and the soldiers fetched him out of the assembly into the castle. The following night the Lord appeared to Paul, to encourage him. The next day more than forty Jews engaged themselves by an oath, not to eat or drink till they had killed Paul. But St. Paul, being informed of this conspiracy by his sister's son, acquainted the tribune with it; who gave orders that the night following he should be sent to Cæsarea, to Felix the governor. (Acts xxii. xxiii.)

Five days afterwards, Ananias, the high-priest, and some of the council, came to Cæsarea, bringing with them Tertullus, an advocate, to plead against St. Paul. St. Paul easily refuted all their calumnies; and Felix, having heard these discourses, put off the cause. It does not appear that Felix ever took any further step in this trial; but, not long after, he and his wife Drusilla, who was a Jewess, sent for Paul to hear him, 'concerning the faith in Christ.' Paul knew the characters of the persons before whom he was to speak, and enlarged upon such points as were likely to affect them; and as he reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come, Felix trembled, and answered, Go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season, I will call for thee. Felix was a man of profligate life and corrupt principles; and this discourse of the apostle, though it caused a temporary remorse of conscience, and excited some dread of future punishment, made no lasting impression upon his mind; on the contrary, he frequently sent for Paul afterwards, not for the purpose of hearing the great truths of the Gospel explained and enforced, but with the hope that he would offer him money for his release. (Acts xxiv.)

At the end of two years, A.D. 60, Felix resigned the government of Judea to Portius Festus; and, with a view of gratifying the Jews, he left Paul a prisoner at Cæsarea. Three days after Festus landed at Cæsarea, he went up to Jerusalem; and the high-priest and the principal Jews, still retaining their malice, requested their new governor to send for Paul from Cæsarea. Their intention was to have murdered him upon the road: but Festus refused to send for him, stating, that he should shortly return to Cæsarea, and that he would try him there. In about ten days Festus went to Cæsarea, and the day after his arrival Paul was brought before him: and the Jews, who had come from Jerusalem for that purpose, 'laid many and grievous complaints against him, which they could not prove.' Paul defended himself by declaring, in a few simple words, that he had been guilty of no offence, either against the law of Moses, or the authority of Cæsar: but Festus, wishing to ingratiate himself with the Jews, asked Paul, whether he were willing to be tried at Jerusalem? He again asserted his innocence, and, availing himself of his privilege as a Roman citizen, appealed to the emperor himself: and Festus, after some deliberation, informed him, that he should be sent to the emperor, as he desired.

Not long after, king Agrippa, with his sister Bernice, came to congratulate Festus upon his accession to the government of Judea. Festus acquainted him with all the circumstances relative to Paul; and Agrippa expressing a desire to hear Paul, Festus promised that he should hear him the next day. Accordingly, on the following morning, Paul was brought in bonds before Agrippa, Bernice, the military officers, and principal persons of the city. Festus represented to the assembly, that the Jews had laid very heavy charges against Paul, declaring that he was not worthy to live; that he had himself found no guilt of that description in him; but, upon his appealing to Cæsar, he had determined to send him immediately to Rome; and that he had now brought him before them, and especially before Agrippa, that after examination he might be enabled to state to the emperor, as it was his duty to do, the nature of the crimes alleged against him. Then Agrippa, who is said to have been well acquainted both with the Jewish and Roman laws, told Paul, that he was permitted to speak for himself. In the course of his defence Paul argued so forcibly in support of the Gospel, and justified his own conduct in so satisfactory a manner, that Agrippa acknowledged himself almost persuaded to be a Christian, and declared that Paul might have been set at liberty, if he had not appealed unto Cæsar. After an appeal was made to the emperor, the judge, from whom the appeal was made, could neither condemn nor release the prisoner. (Acts xxv. xxvi.)

As it was resolved to send Paul into Italy, he was taken on board a ship of Adramyttium, for Myra, in Lycia, where having found a ship bound for Italy, they sailed. But the season being far advanced, and the wind proving contrary, they arrived with difficulty enough at the Fairhavens, in Crete. St. Paul advised them to winter here; but others preferred Phenice, another harbour of the same island. As they were going thither, the wind drove them upon a little island, called Claudia, where the mariners, fearing to strike upon some sand bank, lowered their mast, and lay at the mercy of the waves. Three days afterward they threw overboard the tackling of the ship. Neither the sun nor stars appeared for fourteen days. In this extreme danger an angel assured St. Paul, that God had given him the lives of all who were in the ship with him, being two hundred and seventy-six persons. On the fourteenth night the seamen thought by their sounding they approached land. They were attempting to save themselves in the boat; but St. Paul told the centurion and the soldiers, that, except the sailors continued in the ship, the lives of the passengers could not be saved.

About day-break St. Paul persuaded them to take nourishment, assuring them that not a hair of their heads should perish; and after his example they took food. The soldiers, fearing lest any of the prisoners should escape by swimming, were for putting them all to the sword: but the centurion would not suffer that, being willing to save Paul: and all of them came safe to shore. The island was called Melita, and the inhabitants received them with great humanity. (Acts xxviii. 1, 2, 3, &c.)

Being all very wet and cold, a great fire was lighted to dry them; and Paul having gathered a handful of sticks, and put them on the fire, a viper sprung out of the fire, and seized his hand. The people said, This man is surely a murderer, and Divine vengeance still pursues him. But Paul, shaking off the viper into the fire, received no injury from it. The people seeing this, changed their opinion, and took him for a god. He cured the father of Publius, the chief man of the island, of a fever and bloody flux. After this miracle all their sick were healed. See MELITA.

At the end of three months they embarked again, and arrived, first at Syracuse, then at Rhegium, and lastly at Puteoli. Here St. Paul found some Christians, who detained him seven days; then he set out for Rome. The Roman Christians having been informed of St. Paul's arrival, came to meet him as far as Appii-Forum, and the Three Taverns. St. Paul arrived at Rome in the spring of the year 61. At Rome he was allowed to dwell where he pleased, having a soldier to guard him, joined to him with a chain. Three days after his arrival, St. Paul desired to see the chief of the Jews. A day was appointed, and St. Paul preached to them the kingdom of God, endeavouring to convince them from Moses and the prophets, that Jesus was the Messiah. Some believed, and others disbelieved.

Paul dwelt two whole years at Rome, in a hired lodging, where he received all that came to him, preaching the kingdom of God, and the religion of Jesus Christ, without interruption. His captivity contributed to the advancement of religion; and he converted several persons, even of the emperor's court. (Philip. i. 12. 14. 18.; iv. 22.) The Scriptures do not inform us whether he was ever tried before Nero, who was at this time emperor of Rome; and the learned are much divided in their opinion on this point. St. Luke only says, 'Paul was suffered to dwell by himself with a soldier that kept him. And Paul dwelt two whole years in his own hired house, and received all that came in unto him, preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, no man forbidding him.' Lardner, however, thinks it very strange, that any should be of opinion that Paul's cause was not heard at Rome, during the two years he remained in that city. The same writer supposes Paul to have come to Jerusalem at the Pentecost of the year 58, to Rome in the spring of the year 61, and to have been released in the former part of the year 63. During the apostle's imprisonment at Rome, he wrote his Epistles to the Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and to Philemon; and it seems probable that he wrote his Epistle to the Hebrews soon after his release.

As St. Luke has not continued St. Paul's history beyond his first imprisonment at Rome, we have no authentic record of his subsequent travels and labours from the spring of A.D. 63, when he was released, to the time of his martyrdom. By what means St. Paul was delivered from prison is not known. Calmet, with great probability, conjectures that the Jews durst not prosecute him before the emperor. It seems probable that, immediately after he recovered his liberty, St. Paul went to Jerusalem; and that afterwards he travelled through Asia Minor, Crete, Macedonia, and Greece, confirming his converts, and regulating the affairs of the different churches which he had planted in those countries. St. Paul probably wrote his first Epistle to Timothy, and his Epistle to Titus, at this time; that is, between his first and second imprisonments at Rome. Some modern authors consider St. Paul as making two apostolical journeys after the first of these imprisonments; the first by way of Crete, through Judea, to Antioch; the second from Antioch, through Syria, Cilicia, Phrygia, Macedonia, and thence to Rome. No mention, however, is made of these journeys in any ancient author. Whether the apostle preached the Gospel in Spain at this time, as some have imagined, seems very uncertain. The opinion that Paul preached the Gospel in Spain probably arose from the following passage in his Epistle to the Romans: 'Whosoever I take my journey into Spain, I will come to you;' but we have no certain information whether he ever went into Spain or not. Some, however, have argued from an expression of Clement, in his Epistle to the Corinthians, that Paul went into Spain. Clement says, that this apostle, 'having taught the whole world righteousness, and having come to the borders of the West, and having suffered martyrdom, went to the holy place.' By 'the borders of the west,' some contend that Spain is meant; but, observes Lardner, by this expression is meant only Italy, or Rome, where Clement was, and where Paul suffered.

It was the unanimous tradition of the church, that St. Paul returned to Rome; that he underwent a second imprisonment there, and at last was put to death by the emperor Nero. During his second imprisonment at Rome, he wrote his second Epistle to Timothy. Tacitus and Suetonius have mentioned a dreadful fire which happened at Rome in the time of Nero. It was believed that the emperor himself was the author of that fire; but, to remove the odium from himself, he chose to attribute it to the Christians; and, to give some colour to that unjust imputation, he persecuted them with the utmost cruelty. In this persecution Peter and Paul suffered martyrdom, probably in the year 65; and if we may credit Sulpicius Severus, a writer of the fifth century, the former was crucified, and the latter beheaded.

The following masterly observations on St. Paul's moral character are the production of Dr. Paley: "St. Paul's letters furnish evidence of the soundness and sobriety of his judgment. His caution in distinguishing between the occasional suggestions of inspiration, and the ordinary exertions of his natural understanding, is without example in the history of enthusiasm. His morality is every where calm, pure, and rational; adapted to the condition, the activity, and the business of social life, and of its various relations; free from the over-scrupulousness and austerities of superstition, and from, what was more perhaps to be apprehended, the abstractions of quietism, and the soarings or extravagancies of fanaticism. His judgment concerning a hesitating conscience; his opinion of the moral indifferency of many actions, yet of the prudence and even the duty of compliance, where non-compliance would produce evil effects upon the minds of the persons who observed it, is as correct and just as the most liberal and enlightened moralist could form at this day. The accuracy of modern ethics has found nothing to amend in these determinations. What Lord Lyttleton has remarked of the preference ascribed by St. Paul to inward rectitude of principle above every other religious accomplishment, is very material to our present purpose. 'Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal;' &c. (1 Cor. xiii. 1—3.) Did ever enthusiast prefer that universal benevolence, meant by charity here, (which, we may add, is attainable by every man,) to faith and to miracles, to those religious opinions which he had embraced, and to those supernatural graces and gifts which he imagined he had acquired; nay even to the merit of martyrdom? Is it not the genius of enthusiasm to set moral virtues infinitely below the merit of faith; and of all moral virtues to value that least which is most particularly enforced by St. Paul, a spirit of candour, moderation, and peace? Certainly, neither the temper nor the opinions of a man subject to fanatic delusions are to be found in this passage. His letters, indeed, every where discover great zeal and earnestness in the cause in which he was engaged; that is to say, he was convinced of the truth of what he taught, he was deeply impressed, but not more so than the occasion merited, with a sense of its importance. This produces a corresponding animation and solicitude in the exercise of his ministry. But would not these considerations, supposing them to have been well founded, have holden the same place, and produced the same effect, in a mind the strongest and the most sedate? Here, then, we have a man of liberal attainments, and in other respects of sound judgment, who had addicted his life to the service of the Gospel. We see him, in the prosecution of his purpose, travelling from country to country, enduring every species of hardship, encountering every extremity of danger, assaulted by the populace, punished by the magistrates, scourged, beat, stoned, left for dead; expecting, wherever he came, a renewal of the same treatment, and the same dangers; yet, when driven from one city, preaching in the next; spending his whole time in the employment, sacrificing to it his pleasures, his ease, his safety; persisting in this course to old age, unaltered by the experience of perverseness, ingratitude, prejudice, desertion; unsubdued by anxiety, want, labour, persecutions; unwearied by long confinement, undismayed by the prospect of death. Such was St. Paul."

"Paul," says Mr. Locke, "is full of the matter he treats; and writes with warmth, which usually neglects method, and those partitions and pauses, which men educated in the schools of rhetoricians usually observe." There is, however, a real connexion and coherence in all his writings; and his reasoning, although it may sometimes seem to be desultory, will always be found to be correct and convincing. Instead of the beauties which arise from a nice arrangement of words, an harmonious cadence of periods, and an artificial structure of sentences, we have a style at once concise and highly figurative, and a striking peculiarity and uncommon energy of language. Whenever he speaks of the doctrines and excellency of the Christian religion, enlarges upon the nature and attributes of the Deity, or terrifies with the dread of divine judgments, his style rises with the subject; and while our minds are impressed with the justness and the dignity of the sentiments, we cannot but admire the force and sublimity of the expressions. Though he never departs from the authority of the apostolic character, yet the sensibility of his own heart frequently leads him to appeal to the feelings and affections of those to whom he writes; and the zeal of his temper is so constantly apparent throughout his Epistles, that no one can read them with attention, without catching some portion of that fire by which he was animated. Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. i. pp. 345—380; Paley's Horæ Paulinæ, pp. 411—425; Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book ii. p. 1254, note; Bishop Watson's Theolog. Tracts, vol. ii. p. 181, &c.

PAULIANS, or PAULIANISTS, a denomination which appeared in the third century; so called from Paul of Samosata, bishop of Antioch. He taught that the Son and the Holy Ghost exist in God in the same manner as the faculties of reason and activity do in man; that Christ was born of a mere man, but that the reason, or wisdom, of the Father descended into him, and by him wrought miracles upon earth, and instructed the nations; and finally, that, on account of this union of the divine Word with the man Jesus, Christ might, though improperly, be called God. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. i. p. 248.

PAULICIANS, a denomination formed in the seventh century by two brothers, Paul and John, inhabitants of Jerusalem, from the former of whom they derive their name.

The tenets attributed to this sect are as follow:—(1.) That the inferior and visible world is not the production of the Supreme Being.—(2.) That the evil principle was engendered by darkness and fire, not self-originated and eternal.—(3.) That, though Christ was the Son of Mary, yet he brought from heaven his human nature.—(4.) That Christ was clothed with an ethereal, celestial, and impassable body, and did not really expire on the cross: hence they refused to pay religious homage to the cross.—(5.) That the bread and wine which Christ is said to have administered to his disciples at his Last Supper, only signifies the divine discourses and exhortations of the Saviour, which are a spiritual food and nourishment to the soul, and fill it with repose, satisfaction, and delight; hence they refused to celebrate the institution of the Lord's Supper.—(6.) They rejected the books of the Old Testament, and looked upon its writers as inspired by the Creator of the world, and not by the Supreme God. They received all the books of the New Testament, except the Epistles of St. Peter, which they rejected for reasons unknown to us.

This denomination had not, like the Manicheans, an ecclesiastical government, administered by bishops, priests, and deacons. They had no sacred order of men, distinguished by their manner of life, their habit, or any other circumstance, from the rest of the assembly; nor had councils, synods, or such-like institutions, any place in their religious polity. They had certain doctors, whom they called Synecdemi, that is, companions in the journey of life; and also Notarii. Among these there reigned a perfect equality; and they had no peculiar rights, or privileges, or any external mark of dignity to distinguish them from the people. The only singularity which attended their promotion to the rank of doctors was, that they changed their lay-names for Scripture ones, as if there had been something peculiarly venerable in the names of holy men, whose lives and actions are recorded in the sacred writings. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. ii. pp. 175, 176.

PE'KAH, פֶּקַח, phakai, phakai, signifies he that opens; otherwise, that opens the eye, or that is at liberty. Pekah, son of Remaliah, was general of the army of Pekahiah, king of Israel. He conspired against his master, (2 Kings xv. 25.) in the year of the world 3245, attacked him in the tower of his royal palace of Samaria, and being seconded by Argob and Arieah, and by fifty men of Gilead, he slew him, and reigned in his place twenty years. Perhaps Argob and Arieah may here signify the cities of Argob and Areopolis, beyond Jordan, which were parties in the conspiracy of Pekah. Pekah did evil before the Lord, and followed the wicked example of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin. Under the reign of Pekah came Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, into the country of Israel, and took Ijon, Abel-beth-maachah, Janoah, Kedesh, Hazor, Gilead, and all the country of Naphtali, and carried away all the inhabitants into Assyria. At last, Hoshea, son of Elah, formed a conspiracy against Pekah, slew him, and reigned in his stead.

PEKAHIAH, פֶּקַחְיָה, Pakiaia, signifies, it is the Lord that opens. Pekahiah, son and successor of Menahem, king of Israel, (2 Kings xv. 22, 23.) in the year of the world 3243, reigned only two years. He did evil before the Lord, and followed the steps of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin. Pekah, the son of Remaliah, conspired against him, and killed him in his own palace.

PELAGIANS, a sect that arose in the fifth century. Pelagius was a British monk, of some rank, and very exalted reputation. He, with his friend Celestius, travelled to Rome, where they resided very early in the fifth century, and opposed with warmth the doctrines of original sin, and the necessity of divine grace. What reception their doctrines met with at Rome does not appear; but their uncommon piety and virtue excited general approbation. On the approach of the Goths, they retired to Africa, where Celestius remained, with a view of gaining admittance as a presbyter into the church of Carthage. Pelagius proceeded to Palestine, where he enjoyed the favour and protection of John, bishop of Jerusalem. But his friend and his opinions met with a very different reception from Augustine, the celebrated bishop of Hippo.

Whatever parts were visited by these unorthodox friends, they still asserted their peculiar opinions; and they were gradually engaged in a warm contest, in the course of which they were probably led to advance more than had originally occurred to them. In contending for the truth of their doctrines, they asserted, 'that mankind derived no injury from the sin of Adam; that we are now as capable of obedience to the will of God, as he was; that, otherwise, it would have been cruel and absurd to propose to mankind the performance of certain duties, with the sanction of rewards, and the denunciation of punishments; and that, consequently, men are born without vice, as well as without virtue.' Pelagius is said also to have maintained, 'that it is possible for men, provided they fully employ the powers and faculties with which they are endued, to live without sin;' and though he did not deny, that external grace, or the doctrines and motives of the Gospel, are necessary, yet he is said to have rejected the necessity of internal grace, or the aids of the Divine Spirit. He acknowledged 'that the power we possess of obeying the will of God, is a Divine gift;' but asserted, 'that the direction of this power depends upon ourselves; that natural death is not a consequence of the sin of Adam, but of the frame of man; and that Adam would have died, though he had not sinned.' Isidore, Chrysostom, and Augustine, strenuously opposed these opinions; and the last procured their condemnation in a synod held at Carthage, in 412. They were, however, favourably received at Rome; and pope Zozimus was at the head of the Pelagian party; but his decision against the African bishops, who had opposed Pelagianism, was disregarded by them, and the pontiff yielded at length to their reasonings and remonstrances, and condemned the men whom he had before honoured with his approbation. The council of Ephesus likewise condemned the opinions of Pelagius and Celestius; and the emperor Honorius, in 418, published an edict, which ordained that the leaders of the sect should be expelled from Rome, and their followers exiled. Some of the Pelagians taught that Christ was a mere man, and that men might lead sinless lives because Christ did so—that Jesus became Christ after his baptism, and God after his resurrection; the one arising from his unction, the other from the merit of his passion. The Pelagian controversy, which began with the doctrines of grace and original sin, was extended to predestination, and excited continual discord and division in the church. Dr. Gregory's History of the Christian Church, vol. i. pp. 272—274.

PELATIAH, פֶּלַטִּיָּה, signifies let the Lord deliver, or deliverance, or flight of the Lord. Pelatiah, son of Benaiah, was a prince of the people, who lived under Zedekiah, king of Judah, and opposed the advice given by Jeremiah, to submit to Nebuchadnezzar. Ezekiel, being a captive in Mesopotamia, had a vision, (chap. xi. 1, 2, &c.) in which he saw twenty-five men at the door of the temple of Jerusalem, among whom Jaazaniah, the son of Azur, and Pelatiah, the son of Benaiah, were the most remarkable. The Lord said to him, Son of man, these are the men who have thoughts of iniquity, and who are forming pernicious designs against this city, &c. As he was prophesying in this manner, Pelatiah, the son of Benaiah, died.

PELEG, פֶּלֶג, signifies division. Peleg, son of Eber, was born in the year of the world 1757. The Scripture says, that his father named him Peleg, signifying division, because in his time the earth was divided, (Gen. xi. 16.; x. 25.): whether Noah had begun to distribute the earth among his descendants some years before the building of Babel; or that Peleg came into the world the same year that Babel was begun; or that Eber, by a spirit of prophecy, named his son Peleg some years before the tower of Babel was commenced. What here perplexes interpreters is, 1. That Peleg was born not above one hundred years after the deluge. But it should seem that the number of men was not then sufficient for such an undertaking as that of Babel. 2. Joktan, the brother of Peleg, had already thirteen sons at the time of the dispersion, after the confusion of Babel. Peleg being born in the thirty-fourth year of Eber, (Gen. xi. 16.) it is impossible his brother Joktan should have such a number of children at the birth of Peleg. It seems, therefore, that he was not born at the time of the dispersion. To this it may be answered, that Moses has enumerated the names of the thirteen sons of Joktan, (Gen. x. 26.) by way of anticipation, though they were not born till after the confusion of Babel; but, as they possessed a very large country, it was convenient to notice and to name them among the other descendants of Noah, who participated in the provinces of the East. However this be, at the age of thirty years Peleg begat Reu; and he died at the age of two hundred and thirty-nine.

Dr. Hales observes, that 'of Peleg's allotted settlement a trace may perhaps remain in the town of Phalga, not far from the conflux of the river Chaboras with the Euphrates, where the town of Charan was seated. Bochart rather derives the name of the town from Phalga, signifying, in the Syriac dialect, "the middle," because it was midway between the two Seleucias; the one city in Pieria, the other in Mesopotamia. Peleg began the third reduction of the standard of human life.' Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. p. 47.

PE/LETHITES, פֶּלֶטִּי, פֶּלֶטִּי, פֶּלֶטִּי, in Chaldee, signifies those that draw the bow, or slingers; in Hebrew, judges, or destroyers. The Pelethites and the Cherethites are famous under the reign of David, as the most valiant men of his army, and the guards of his person. They were originally Philistines, of Gath. See CHERETHIM.

PELICAN. The Talmud describes the kaat as a water bird, with a long neck; the Septuagint read pelecas, and the Vulgate onocrotalus. The principal food of the pelican, or onocrotalus, is shell-fish, which it is said to swallow shells and all, and afterwards, when, by the heat of its stomach, the shells begin to open, to vomit them up again, and pick out the fish. But it may be justly questioned whether this bird does really take its prey into its stomach in the first instance. It is more probable, that its prey goes no farther than the bag or pouch under its lower chap, which 'serves not only as a repository for its food, but as a net to catch it. And it may be further observed, that in feeding its young ones, (whether this bag is loaded with water or more solid food,) the onocrotalus squeezes the contents of its mouth into their mouths, by strongly compressing it upon its breast with its bill; an action which might well give occasion to the received tradition and reports that the pelican, in feeding her young, pierced her own breast, and nourished them with her blood.' 'This bird,' says Mr. Edwards, 'seemed to me to be more than double the bigness of the largest swan. I thought it something incredible in Willoughby's Description, that a man should put his head into the pouch under the bill, till I saw it performed in this bird by its keeper, and am sure a second man's head might have been put in with it at the same time. The academy of Paris think the bird (of this kind) they have described is the pelican of Aristotle, and the onocrotalus of Pliny. The pelican seems to inhabit the greatest part of the old world, it being found in many climates, both far north and south, as well as in the intermediate latitudes, it being pretty common in Russia, abounding in Egypt, and sometimes found at the Cape of Good Hope.' Edwards's Nat. Hist. of Birds, part ii. p. 92; Parkhurst's Hebrew and English Lexicon, pp. 631, 632.

PENANCE. The popish sacrament of penance is derived from the Scripture doctrine of repentance; but it is, in fact, a corruption of a practice which prevailed in the primitive church. During the severe persecutions which the Christians suffered in the early ages of the Gospel, many, through fear of tortures and death, apostatized from the faith. It frequently happened, that these men, after the danger was past, were desirous of returning to communion with the church; but they were not allowed, till they had made a public confession of their offence in the presence of the congregation. In this manner confession began to be a part of ecclesiastical discipline; and being thus, in the first instance, applied to a crime of a public nature, it was afterwards extended to private sin. Besides the shame of public confession, the offending party was compelled to submit to public reproof, to acts of penance, to exclusion from the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and to a temporary suspension of all the privileges of a Christian. We learn from the canons of the numerous councils, which were held in the fourth and fifth centuries, that they were chiefly occupied in regulating the nature and duration of these censures, and in settling the degree of discretionary power to be vested in bishops for the purpose of relaxing or shortening them, according to the circumstances of the case. Public confession was soon found to be attended with many inconveniences; and, therefore, instead of it, offenders were permitted to confess their sins privately, either to the bishops themselves, or to penitentiary priests appointed by them. When the punishment, which was still public, though the sins remained secret, was finished, the penitent was formally received into communion with the church, by prayer and imposition of hands. The office of a penitentiary priest was abolished in the East in the reign of Theodosius; but it was retained much longer in the western church. In the fifth century, public penance was submitted to with difficulty and reluctance; and it was thought expedient to allow penance, in certain cases, to be performed in monasteries, or in some private place, before a small select number of persons; this private penance was gradually extended to more and more cases; and before the end of the seventh century, the practice of public penance for private sins was entirely abolished. About the end of the eighth century, penance began to be commuted; in the room of the ancient severities, prayers, masses, and alms were substituted; and in process of time the clergy of the church of Rome gained such an ascendancy over the minds of the people, as to persuade them that it was their duty to confess all their sins, however private or heinous, to the priest, who had power to prescribe the conditions of absolution; and, to give a greater sanction to this delusion, they called it a sacrament, and made it to consist in confession to the priest, and in absolution from him, after or before such acts of devotion, mortification, and charity, as he should think fit to enjoin. By a canon of the council of Lateran, held A.D. 1215, every person was directed to confess his sins, at least once in every year, to the priest of his parish. A ritual was drawn up for this purpose, which is still used by Papists, and in which the priest absolves without any qualification or reserve; and it was decreed by the council of Trent, that all were to be anathematized who maintained 'non requiri confessionem pœnitentis, ut sacerdos eum absolvere possit;' or who asserted 'absolutionem sacramentalem sacerdotis non esse actum judiciale, sed nudum ministerium pronuntiandi et declarandi remissa esse peccata.'

It is, therefore, scarcely necessary to observe, that the penance of the church of Rome is totally different from the Gospel doctrine of repentance, which consists in an inward sorrow for past sins, and a firm resolution of future amendment. 'The true penance enjoined by the Gospel, is the forsaking of sin, and the doing acts of virtue. Fasting, prayers, and alms-giving, are acts that are very proper means to raise us to this temper. If fasting is joined with prayer, and if prayer arises out of an inward devotion of mind, and is serious and fervent, then we know that it has great efficacy, as being one of the chief acts of our religious service of God, to which the greatest promises are made, and upon which the best blessings do descend upon us. Alms-giving is also a main part of charity, which, when done from a right principle of loving God and our neighbour, is of great value in his sight. But if fasting is only an exercise of the body, and of abstaining so long, and from such things, this may, perhaps, trouble and pain the body, but bodily exercise profiteth nothing; so not to mention the mockery of fasting, when it is only a delay of eating, after which all liberties are taken, or an abstinence which is made up with other delicious and inflaming nutritives, these are of no value, being only inventions to deceive men, and to expose religion to mockery. But even severe and afflicting fasting, if done only as a punishment, which, when it is over, the penance is believed to be completed, gives such a low idea of God and religion, that from thence men are led to think very slightly of sin, when they know at what price they can carry it off. Such a continuance in fasting, in order to prayer, as humbles and depresses nature, and raises the mind, is a great means to reform the world; but fasting, as a prescribed task to expiate our sins, is a scorn put upon religion. Prayer, when it arises from a serious heart that is earnest in it, and when it becomes habitual, is certainly a most effectual means to reform the world, and to fetch down divine assistances; but to appoint so many vocal prayers to be gone through as a task, and then to tell the world, that the running through these with few or no inward acts accompanying them, is contrition or attrition, this is liker a design to root out all the impressions of religion, and all sense of that repentance which the Gospel requires, than to promote it. This may be a task fit to accustom children to, but it is contrary to the true genius of religion, to teach men, instead of that reasonable service that we ought to offer up to God, to give him only the labour of the lips, which is the sacrifice of fools. Prayers gone through as a task can be of no value, and can find no acceptance in the sight of God. And, as St. Paul said, that if he gave all his goods to the poor, and had not charity, he was nothing; so the greatest profusion of alms-giving, when done in a mercenary way, to buy off, and to purchase a pardon, is the turning of God's house from being a house of prayer, to be a den of thieves.' Burnet's Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles, pp. 351, 352; Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. ii. pp. 420—423.

PENIN'NAH, פִּנְחָה, phenanè, signifies pearl, precious stone; otherwise, his face. Peninnah was the second wife of Elkanah, the father of Samuel. (1 Sam. i. 2, 3, &c.) Peninnah had several children, but Hannah, afterwards mother of Samuel, was barren. Peninnah, instead of giving glory to God, the author of fruitfulness, was elevated with pride, and insulted Hannah. But the Lord having graciously visited Hannah, Peninnah was humbled; and some interpreters think, that God took her children from her, or at least that she ceased bearing after this time, according to the expression of Hannah, 'the barren hath borne seven, and she that hath many children is waxed feeble.'

PENTAPOLIS, Πεντάπολις, signifies a country of five cities. This name is given to the five cities, Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Zoar. They were all five condemned to destruction; but Lot interceded for Zoar, otherwise called Bala. The other four were consumed by fire from Heaven, and the place where they had stood became the lake Asphaltites.

PENTATEUCH, Πεντάτευχος, signifies the five books. This word, derived from the Greek, signifies, literally, the collection of the five instruments or books of Moses; that is, Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy.

The first argument in favour of the genuineness of the Pentateuch, is the universal concurrence of all antiquity. The rival kingdoms of Judah and Israel, the hostile sects of Jews and Samaritans, and every denomination of early Christians, received the Pentateuch as unquestionably written by Moses. It is also mentioned and referred to by many heathen authors in a manner which shows it plainly to have been the general and undisputed opinion of the Pagan world, that this book was the work of the Jewish legislator. Nicolaus of Damascus, a philosopher, poet, historian, and orator, in the time of Augustus, after describing Baris, a high mountain in Armenia, upon which it was reported that many who fled at the time of the Deluge were saved, and that one came on shore upon the top of it, adds, 'this might be the man about whom Moses, the legislator of the Jews, wrote.' Diodorus Siculus, who also lived in the time of Augustus, mentions Moses as the legislator of the Jews in three different places of his remaining works; and in a fragment of the fortieth book, after giving some account of the conduct and laws of Moses, he says, that 'Moses concludes his laws by declaring, that he had heard from God the things which he addresses to the Jews.' Strabo, who also lived in the time of Augustus, considered the Pentateuch as written by Moses. The emperor Julian, whose apparent favour to the Jews proceeded only from his hostility to the Christians, was obliged to confess that the books which bore the name of Moses were genuine, and that the facts which they contained were worthy of credit.

To this testimony from profane authors may be added the positive assertions of the sacred writers both of the Old and New Testament. Moses frequently speaks of himself as directed by God to write the commands which he had received from him, and to record the events which occurred during his ministry, (Exod. xvii. 14.; xxiv. 4.; Numb. xxxiii. 2.); and at the end of Deuteronomy he expressly says, 'And Moses wrote his law, and delivered it unto the priests, the sons of Levi, which bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord, and unto all the elders of Israel.' (Deut. xxxi. 9.) Afterwards, in the same chapter, he says still more fully, 'And it came to pass, when Moses had made an end of writing the words of this law in a book, until they were finished, that Moses commanded the Levites, which bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord, saying, Take this book of the law, and put it in the side of the ark of the covenant of the Lord your God, that it may be there for a witness against thee.' (Deut. xxxi. 24, &c.) If the Pentateuch had been forged, or even written in a subsequent age from existing materials, these passages must have excited inquiry, and have caused the fraud to be detected. In the New Testament also the writing of the Law, or Pentateuch, is expressly ascribed to Moses, (John i. 45.); and in a variety of passages in the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles, Moses is evidently considered as the author of the Pentateuch, and every one of the five books is quoted as written by him. It is likewise material to remark, as of itself a sufficient proof of the inspiration of the Pentateuch, that Christ called the words of Exodus and Deuteronomy the words of God himself. (Compare Matt. xv. 4. with Exodus xx. 12. and Deuteronomy v. 16.)

Mr. Whiston asserts, and in support of his assertion appeals to a similar declaration of the learned Grotius, 'That there do not appear in the genuine records of mankind, belonging to ancient times, any testimonies that contradict those produced from the Old Testament; and that it may be confidently affirmed, there are no such to be found.' We are not, however, confined to negative testimony; for it would be easy to bring forward nearly demonstrative evidence to prove the positive agreement of antiquity with the narrative of the sacred historian. It appears that the most ancient traditions remarkably agree with Moses's account of the creation of the world, the fall of man, the deluge, and the dispersion of mankind; that about the time mentioned in the Pentateuch, a part of the inhabitants of Egypt, who came originally from the East, did migrate under a person of the name of Moyses, or Moses; that a people with such laws and institutions as he professes to have given them, have existed from remote antiquity; and we ourselves are eye-witnesses that such a people, so circumstanced, exist at this hour, and in a state exactly conformable to his predictions concerning them. But the civil history of the Jews is seldom contested, even by those who imagine the Pentateuch to have been written in some age subsequent to that of Moses, from a collection of annals or diaries; it is the miraculous part of it which is disputed. To this observation, however, we may oppose the conclusive argument of a professed enemy to revealed religion, 'that the miraculous part of the Mosaic history is not like the prodigies of Livy, and other profane authors, unconnected with the facts recorded; it is so intermixed and blended with the narrative, that they must both stand or fall together.' With respect to the annals which are mentioned as the supposed foundation of this history, they must have been either true or false: if true, the history of the Israelites remains equally marvellous; if false, how was it possible for the history to acquire the credit and esteem in which it was so universally held?

Among the objections to the divine authority of the Pentateuch, the command to destroy the nations of Canaan, is considered as being absolutely irreconcilable with Divine justice, and therefore as impossible to have proceeded from God. It is a curious example of the inconsistency of sceptical arguments, that the destruction of the inhabitants of a small part of the earth is pronounced to be incompatible with the Divine attributes, while the destruction of the whole world by the Deluge is passed by without any such comment. But the Deluge is a fact authenticated by such a variety of proofs, and so universally acknowledged in all ages and countries, that its consistency with the justice of God must be allowed, or his moral government must be at once denied. And yet, in reality, the general destruction of the human race by the Deluge, and the partial extermination of the inhabitants of Canaan by the Israelites, are to be accounted for upon precisely the same principle. In both cases it was the enormous wickedness of the people which drew upon them such signal punishment.

With respect to the marks of a posterior date, or at least of posterior interpolation, so often urged with an insidious design to weaken the authority of the Pentateuch, it will be sufficient to observe, that it may safely be admitted that Joshua, Samuel, or some one of the succeeding prophets, wrote the account of the death of Moses, contained in the last chapter of Deuteronomy; and that Ezra, when he transcribed the history written by Moses, changed the names of some places, which were then become obsolete, to those by which they were called in his time, and added, for the purpose of elucidation, the few passages which are allowed to be not suitable to the age of Moses. Now surely, when it is considered that these few passages are of an explanatory nature; that they are easily distinguished from the original writings of Moses; and that Ezra was himself an inspired writer, raised up by God to re-establish the Jewish church, after the return from captivity, the cavils founded upon such circumstances can scarcely be thought deserving of any serious attention.—Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. i. pp. 30—74.

PEN'TECOST, Πεντηκοστή, signifies the fiftieth. Pentecost is derived from the Greek pentecoste, the fiftieth, because the feast of Pentecost was celebrated the fiftieth day after the sixteenth of Nisan, which was the second day of the feast of the Passover. (Levit. xxiii. 15, 16.) The Hebrews call it (Exod. xxxiv. 22.) the Feast of Weeks, because it was kept seven weeks after the Passover. They then offered the first fruits of their wheat-harvest, which at that time was completed. (Deut. xvi. 9, 10.) The first fruits consisted in two loaves of leavened bread; of two assarons of meal, or of three pints of meal each. (Levit. xxiii. 16, 17.) Some interpreters think, that each family was obliged to give two loaves for first fruits; but others maintain, and perhaps with more reason, that they offered only two loaves in the name of the whole nation; this is sufficiently hinted by Josephus, who puts only one loaf of two assarons. Besides these, they presented at the temple seven lambs of that year, one calf, and two rams, for a burnt-offering, two lambs for a peace-offering, and a goat for a sin-offering. We do not find in Scripture, or in Josephus, that the Pentecost had an octave, though it was one of the three great solemnities, in which all the males were to appear before the Lord. Besides the victims appointed (Lev. xxiii. 18, 19.) for the day of Pentecost, they offered two calves and a ram for a burnt-offering, seven lambs for a peace-offering, and a goat for a sin-offering. (Numb. xxviii. 27.) Josephus puts all these sacrifices together. The feast of Pentecost was instituted, first, to oblige the Israelites to repair to the temple of the Lord, there to acknowledge his dominion over their country, and their labours, by offering to him the first fruits of all their harvests. Secondly, to commemorate, and to render thanks to God, for the law given from Mount Sinai, on the fiftieth day after their coming out of Egypt.

The modern Jews celebrate the Pentecost for two days. They adorn the synagogue and the places appointed for the reading of the law, and even their houses, with roses and flowers, in crowns and garlands. The prayers are accommodated to the festival; and they read from the Pentateuch the sacrifice that was offered on that day, with a lesson out of the prophets, which has relation to the feast of Pentecost. Afterwards they pronounce a blessing for the sovereign, and a sermon in commendation of the law. The Jews of Germany, in order to recall to mind more sensibly the Mount of Sinai, upon which the law was given, make a very thick cake, of seven layers of paste; this they call Sinai, and inculcate that these seven thicknesses of paste represent the seven heavens, which God was to re-ascend, from this mountain to the heaven of heavens, his abode.

The Christian church celebrates the feast of Pentecost fifty days, or seven weeks, after the passover, or the resurrection of our Saviour. After the ascension of Christ, the apostles returned to Jerusalem, where they waited for the Holy Ghost, which our Saviour had promised them. On the day of Pentecost, about the third hour of the day (nine o'clock in the morning), suddenly they heard a great noise, like the rushing of a mighty wind, from heaven, which filled the whole house where the apostles were assembled. At the same time appeared among them, as it were, tongues of fire, parted, or cloven, and rested on each of them, who were immediately filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak different tongues of languages, as the Spirit gave them utterance. (Acts ii. 1, 2, 3.) There were at that time at Jerusalem pious Jews of all nations, who were astonished to hear such a variety of languages. Others, probably the Jews of Jerusalem, mocked and said, These men are full of new wine. Peter undertook their defence, and said, 'These are not drunken, as ye suppose, seeing it is but the third hour of the day. But this is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel, (ii. 28.) 'I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh,' &c.; and whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be delivered.' It is observable, that, on festivals, the Jews did not eat before noon, and especially the tasted nothing before nine in the morning, which was an hour of prayer. Those who heard Peter were moved with compunction, and said, 'Men and brethren, what shall we do?' Peter answered, 'Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost.' That day three thousand persons were baptized. Dr. Hales observes, that 'this amazing and astonishing gift, the gift of tongues, was a miracle, new and unheard of before in former ages; and greater, or more decisive, than any wrought by our Lord himself during his ministry. Possessions, or diseases, might be counterfeited; even death might be only apparent; the reality, therefore, of such cures, and restorations to life, might be questioned by gainsayers, and denied by infidels; but to inspire a company of 'unlettered Galileans,' who knew only their mother tongue, and whose dialect was proverbial for its vulgarity, suddenly and instantaneously with the knowledge and expression of sixteen or eighteen different languages or dialects; when, in the ordinary course of things, the acquisition of a single new language is a work of so much time and pains to understand, and still more to speak it with fluency and correctness, was indeed a miracle of the most stupendous size, carrying with it the most overpowering and irresistible conviction, the simplest and plainest in itself, and the most impossible to be counterfeited. No wonder then, that the effect was so prodigious, as the conversion of three thousand prejudiced Jews, in one day, to the faith of a crucified Saviour, at Jerusalem, the scene of his disgrace, and only fifty-two days after, on the memorable day of Pentecost.' (Acts ii.) Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book ii. p. 1063.

PENUEL, פְּנוּאֵל, signifies the sight of God; that is, where God graciously manifested himself. Penuel, or Peniel, was a city beyond Jordan, near the ford of the brook Jabbok. When Jacob returned from Mesopotamia he rested at the brook Jabbok; and very early the next morning, having sent all his people before, he remained alone, and an angel came and wrestled with him, till the day dawned. The angel blessed him in the same place, which Jacob from hence called Peniel, saying, I have seen God face to face, yet continue alive. (Gen. xxxii. 30.)

In following ages the Israelites built a city at this place, which was given to the tribe of Gad. Gideon, returning from the pursuit of the Midianites, overthrew the Tower of Peniel, (Judg. viii. 17.) and slew the inhabitants, for having refused sustenance to him and his people, in a very insulting manner. Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, rebuilt the city of Peniel. (1 Kings xii. 25.) Josephus says that this prince built himself a palace here.

PERFUMES. The use of perfumes was frequent among the Hebrews, and among the Orientals in general, before it was known to the Greeks and Romans. They must have been known in Egypt in the time of Moses, since that legislator speaks of the art of the perfumer, and gives the composition of two perfumes, of which one (Exod. xxx. 25.) was to be offered to the Lord, upon the golden altar in the holy place; and the other (Exod. xxx. 34, 35.) was appointed for the anointing of the high-priest and his sons, of the tabernacle, and the vessels of divine service. (Exod. xxx. 23.) The first of these perfumes was composed of stacte, the onyx, or odoriferous shell-fish, of galbanum, and incense, each of equal weight. This perfume was sacred and inviolable; and it was forbidden to be used by any man, on pain of death. It was placed every morning and evening upon the golden altar in the holy place, by one of the priests of the week. This perfume Zacharias, father of John the Baptist, went to offer, when the angel foretold to him the birth of that forerunner of the Messiah. The other kind of perfume was rather an ointment, to anoint the priests and the sacred vessels of the tabernacle. It was composed of the best myrrh five hundred shekels, of cinnamon two hundred and fifty shekels, of calamus a like quantity, of cassia five hundred shekels, and one hin of oil olive. But it is thought that they did not afterwards anoint the successors of Aaron, because the dignity being hereditary in his family, this unction did not seem necessary. God reserved this ointment, or this perfume, to his own service; and whoever should make it, either for himself or another, was to be cut off from his people.

The Hebrews had also perfumes which they used for embalming the dead. The composition is not exactly known; but they used myrrh, aloes, and other strong and astringent drugs, proper to prevent putrefaction, infection, and corruption. See EMBALMING.

Besides these perfumes, others are noticed in Scripture. The spouse in the Canticles commends the scent of the perfumes of her lover; and her lover in return says, that the scent of the perfumes of his spouse surpasses the most excellent odours. He names particularly the spikenard, the calamus, the cinnamon, the myrrh, and the aloes, as composing these perfumes. The voluptuous woman described by Solomon, (Prov. vii. 17.) says, that she had perfumed her bed with myrrh, aloes, and cinnamon. The epicures in the Book of Wisdom, (ii. 7.) encourage one another to the luxuriant use of odours and costly perfumes.

Isaiah reproaches Judea, whom he describes as a faithless spouse to God, as being painted and perfumed to please strangers, (Isaiah lvii. 9.); 'Thou wentest to the king with ointment, and didst increase thy perfumes.' Ezekiel (xxiii. 41.) seems to accuse the Jews of having profaned the odours and perfumes, whose use was reserved to sacred things, by applying them to their own use.

PER/GA, Πέργη, signifies extremely earthy. Perga was a city of Pamphylia, (Acts xiii. 14.) to which, as it was not a maritime city, St. Paul must have gone up the river Caystrus, or otherwise on foot. It was one of the most considerable cities of Pamphylia; and when that province was divided into two parts, this city became the metropolis of the one part, and Sidé of the other. Upon a neighbouring mountain was a very famous temple of Diana, surnamed Pergæa, from the name of the city; and it appears that Bacchus was also worshipped at Perga. Sacred Geography.

PER/GAMUS, Πέργαμος, signifies height, or sublimity. John the Evangelist (Rev. ii. 13.) speaks thus to the angel, or bishop, of Pergamus: 'I know thy works, and where thou dwellest, even where Satan's seat is,' &c.

Pergamus was one of the most renowned cities in Asia. It was in Mysia, and the residence of king Eumenes, and of the other Attalic princes. Sacred Geography.

PER/IZZITES, פריזיט, signifies who dwell in villages, or places not inclosed with walls.

The Perizzites, ancient inhabitants of Palestine, mingled with the Canaanites. It is very probable, that they themselves were Canaanites, but having no fixed habitations, and living sometimes in one country, sometimes in another, were called Perizzites, which signifies scattered or dispersed. Pherazoth stands for hamlets or villages. The Perizzites did not inhabit any certain portion of the land of Canaan; there were some on each side of the river Jordan, in the mountains and in the plains. In several places of Scripture the Canaanites and Perizzites are mentioned as the chief people of the country. It is said, for example, in the time of Abraham and Lot, the Canaanite and Perizzite were in the land. (Gen. xiii. 7.) The tribe of Ephraim complained to Joshua, that they were too much confined in their possession; he bid them go, if they pleased, into the mountains of the Perizzites and Rephaim, there clear the land, cultivate, and inhabit it. (Josh. xvii. 15.) Solomon subdued the remains of the Canaanites and Perizzites, which the children of Israel had not rooted out, and made them tributary. (1 Kings ix. 20, 21. 2 Chron. viii. 7.) Mention is made of the Perizzites by Ezra, after the return from Babylon; and several Israelites had married wives from that nation. (Ezra ix. 1.)

PERSECUTION is any pain or affliction which a person designedly inflicts upon another; and, in a more restrained sense, the sufferings of Christians on account of their religion. The establishment of Christianity was opposed by the powers of the world, and occasioned several severe persecutions against Christians, during the reigns of several Roman emperors. Though the absurdities of polytheism were openly derided and exposed by the first teachers of Christianity, yet it does not appear that any public laws were enacted against it till the reign of Nero, in the year 64, by which time it had acquired considerable stability and extent. As far the greater number of the first converts to Christianity were of the Jewish nation, one secondary cause for their being so long preserved from persecution may probably be deduced from their appearing to the Roman governors only as a sect of Jews, who had seceded from the rest of their brethren on account of some opinion trifling in its importance, and, perhaps, difficult to be understood. Nor when their brethren were fully discovered to have cast off the religion of the synagogue, did the Jews find it easy to infuse into the breasts of the Roman magistrates that rancour and malice which they themselves experienced. But the steady and uniform opposition made by the Christians to heathen superstition could not long pass unnoticed. Their open attacks upon Paganism made them extremely obnoxious to the populace, by whom they were represented as a society of atheists, who, by attacking the religious constitution of the empire, merited the severest animadversion of the civil magistrate. Horrid tales of their abominations were circulated throughout the empire; and the minds of the Pagans were, from all these circumstances, prepared to regard with pleasure, or indifference, every cruelty which could be inflicted upon this despised sect. Historians usually reckon ten general persecutions.

First general persecution.—Nero selected the Christians as a grateful sacrifice to the Roman people, and endeavoured to transfer to this hated sect the guilt of which he was strongly suspected, that of having caused and enjoyed the fire which had nearly desolated the city. With this view, he inflicted upon them the most exquisite tortures, attended with every circumstance of the most refined cruelty. Some were crucified; some impaled; some were thrown to wild beasts; and others were wrapped in garments dipped in pitch and other combustibles, and burned as torches in the garden of Nero, and other parts of the city, by night. This persecution was not confined to Rome: the emperor issued edicts against the Christians throughout most of the provinces of the empire. He was far, however, from obtaining the object of his hopes and expectations; and the virtues of the Christians, their zeal for the truth, and their constancy in suffering, must have considerably contributed to the respectability of their sect, and to make their tenets more generally known.

Second general persecution.—From the death of Nero to the reign of Domitian, the Christians remained unmolested, and daily increasing; but towards the close of the first century, they were again involved in all the horrors of persecution. In this persecution many eminent Christians suffered; but the death of Domitian soon delivered them from this calamity.

Third general persecution.—This persecution began in the third year of the emperor Trajan, A.D. 100. Many things contributed towards it; as, the laws of the empire, the emperor's zeal for his religion, and aversion to Christianity, and the prejudices of the Pagans, supported by falsehoods and calumnies, against the Christians. Under the plausible pretence of their holding illegal meetings and societies, they were severely persecuted by the governors and other officers; in which persecution great numbers fell by the rage of popular tumult, as well as by laws and processes. This persecution continued several years, with different degrees of severity, in many parts of the empire, and was so much the more afflicting, because the Christians generally suffered under the notion of malefactors and traitors, and under an emperor famed for his singular justice and moderation. The most noted martyr, in this persecution, was Clement, bishop of Rome. After some time, the fury of this persecution was abated, but did not cease during the whole reign of Trajan. In the eighth year of his successor, Adrian, it broke out with new rage. This is by some called the fourth general persecution; but is more commonly considered as a revival or continuance of the third.

Fourth general persecution.—This took place under Antoninus, the philosopher, and at different places, with several intermissions, and different degrees of severity; it continued the greatest part of his reign. Antoninus himself has been much excused as to this persecution. As the character of the virtuous Trajan, however, is sullied by the martyrdom of Ignatius, so the reign of the philosophic Marcus is for ever disgraced by the sacrifice of the venerable Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, the friend and companion of St. John. A few days previous to his death, he is said to have dreamed that his pillow was on fire. When urged by the proconsul to renounce Christ, he replied, 'Four-score and six years have I served him, and he has never done me an injury; can I blaspheme my King and my Saviour?' Several miracles are reported to have happened at his death. The flames, as if unwilling to injure his sacred person, are said to have arched over his head; and, it is added, that at length being dispatched with a sword, a dove flew out of the wound; and that from the pile proceeded a most fragrant smell. It is obvious that the arching of the flames might be an accidental effect, which the enthusiastic veneration of his disciples might convert into a miracle; and as to the story of the dove, &c. Eusebius himself apparently did not credit it, since he has omitted it in his narrative of the transaction. Among many other victims of persecution in this philosophic reign, we must also record that of the excellent and learned Justin. But it was at Lyons, and Vienne, in Gaul, that the most shocking scenes were acted. Among many nameless sufferers, history has preserved from oblivion Pothinus, the respectable bishop of Lyons, who was then more than ninety years of age; Sanctus, a deacon of Vienne; Attalus, a native of Pergamus; Maturus and Alexander; some of whom were devoured by wild beasts, and some of them tortured in an iron chair, made redhot. Some females also, and particularly Biblias and Blandina, reflected honour both upon their sex and their religion, by their constancy and courage.

Fifth general persecution.—A considerable part of the reign of Severus proved so far favourable to the Christians, that no additions were made to the severe edicts already in force against them. For this lenity they were probably indebted to Proculus, a Christian, who, in a very extraordinary manner, cured the emperor of a dangerous distemper, by the application of oil. But this degree of peace, precarious as it was, and frequently interrupted by the partial execution of severe laws, was terminated by an edict, A.D. 197, which prohibited every subject of the empire, under severe penalties, from embracing the Jewish or Christian faith. This law appears, upon a first view, designed merely to impede the further progress of Christianity; but it incited the magistracy to enforce the laws of former emperors, which were still existing against the Christians, and, during seven years, they were exposed to a rigorous persecution in Palestine, Egypt, the rest of Africa, Italy, Gaul, and other parts. In this persecution, Leonides, the father of Origen, and Irenæus, bishop of Lyons, suffered martyrdom. On this occasion, Tertullian composed his Apology. The violence of Pagan intolerance was most severely felt in Egypt, and particularly at Alexandria.

Sixth general persecution.—This persecution began with the reign of the emperor Maximinus, A.D. 235, and seems to have arisen from that prince's hatred to his predecessor, Alexander, in whose family many Christians had found shelter and patronage. Though this persecution was very severe in some places, yet we have the names of only a few martyrs. Origen, at this time, was very industrious in supporting the Christians under these fiery trials.

Seventh general persecution.—This was the most dreadful persecution that ever had been known in the church. During the short reign of Decius, the Christians were exposed to greater calamities than any they had hitherto suffered. It has been said, and with some probability, that the Christians were involved in this persecution by their attachment to the family of the emperor Philip. Considerable numbers were publicly destroyed; several purchased safety by bribes, or secured it by flight; and many deserted from the faith, and willingly consented to burn incense on the altars of the gods. The city of Alexandria, the great theatre of persecution, had even anticipated the edicts of the emperor, and had put to death a number of innocent persons, among whom were some women. The imperial edict for persecuting the Christians was published in the year 249; and shortly after Fabianus, bishop of Rome, with a number of his followers, was put to death. The venerable bishops of Jerusalem and Antioch died in prison; the most cruel tortures were employed, and the numbers that perished are by all parties confessed to have been very considerable.

Eighth general persecution.—The emperor Valerian, in the fourth year of his reign, A.D. 257, listening to the suggestions of Macrinus, a magician of Egypt, was prevailed upon to persecute the Christians, on pretence that, by their wicked and execrable charms, they hindered the prosperity of the emperor. Macrinus advised the emperor to perform many impious rites, sacrifices, and incantations, to cut the throats of infants, &c., and edicts were published in all places against the Christians, who were exposed, without protection, to the common rage. We have the names of several martyrs, among whom was the famous St. Laurence, archdeacon of Rome, and the great St. Cyprian, bishop of Carthage.

Ninth general persecution.—This persecution took place under the emperor Aurelian, A.D. 274, but it was so small and inconsiderable, that it gave little interruption to the peace of the church.

Tenth general persecution.—The tenth and last general persecution of the Christians began in the nineteenth year of the emperor Diocletian, A. D. 303. The most violent promoters of it were Hierocles the philosopher, who wrote against the Christian religion, and Galerius, whom Diocletian had declared Cæsar. This latter was excited not only by his own cruelty and superstition, but likewise by his mother, who was a zealous Pagan. Diocletian, contrary to his inclination, was prevailed upon to authorize the persecution by his edicts. Accordingly, it began in the city of Nicomedia, whence it spread into other cities and provinces, and became at last universal. Great numbers of Christians suffered the severest tortures in this persecution; though the accounts given of it by succeeding historians are probably exaggerated. There is, however, sufficient of well-authenticated facts, to assure us amply of the cruel and intolerant disposition of the professors of Pagan philosophy. The human imagination was, indeed, almost exhausted in inventing a variety of tortures. Some were impaled alive, some had their limbs broken, and in that condition were left to expire. Some were roasted by slow fires, and some suspended by the feet with their heads downward, and a fire being placed under them, were suffocated by the smoke. Some had melted lead poured down their throats, and the flesh of some was torn off with shells, and others had splinters of reeds thrust under the nails of their fingers and toes. The few who were not capitally punished had their limbs and their features mutilated. It would be endless to enumerate the victims of superstition. The bishops of Nicomedia, of Tyre, of Sidon, of Emesa; several matrons and virgins of the purest character, and a nameless multitude of plebeians, arrived at immortality through the flames of martyrdom. At last it pleased God that the emperor Constantine, who himself afterwards became a Christian, openly declared for the Christians, and published the first law in favour of them. The death of Maximin, emperor of the East, soon after put a period to all their troubles; and this was the great epoch, when Christianity triumphantly got possession of the thrones of princes, and to its own native power obtained the additional strength of human laws and constitutions. In this state, though with different degrees of success and splendour, it has since continued.—Broughton's Histor. Dictionary, vol. ii. pp. 240—242; Dr. Gregory's History of the Christian Church, vol. i. pp. 39, 40, 41, &c.

PERSIA, Πέρσαι, signifies breaking, or dividing; otherwise, a claw, or a griffin.

Persia is a kingdom of Asia. It was bounded on the west by Media and Susiana, on the south by the Persian Gulf, on the north by the great Desert, which divided it from Parthia Proper, and on the east by another still greater between it and the river Indus. The Persians became very famous from the time of Cyrus, the founder of the Persian monarchy. Their ancient name was Elamites; in the time of the Roman emperors they were called Parthians: at present Persians. See PARTHIANS.

Authors speak differently of the religion of the ancient Persians. Herodotus is the first that has given any account of it. He tells us, that they had neither temples, nor statues, nor altars. They look on it as folly to make, or to suffer any, because they did not believe, as the Greeks, that the gods were of human origin. They sacrificed to Jupiter upon the highest mountains. They gave the name of God to the whole circuit of the heavens. They sacrificed also to the sun, and the moon, and the earth, to the fire, and the water, and the winds. They knew no other gods, anciently, but these. Since that time they have learned from the Assyrians and the Arabians, to sacrifice to Urania, or heavenly Venus; whom the Assyrians call Militta, the Arabians Alitta, and the Persians Mithra.

A modern author, very skilful in the eastern languages, and who had purposely studied the religion of the Persians, pretends that these people had just notions concerning the Deity, and believed but one God. That, indeed, they admitted of two principles: but one of them was uncreated, and the other created. The created principle was the world. He maintains, that the worship they paid the sun and fire was merely civil and relative.

The modern Persians refer their religion to Abraham, whom some confound with Zoroaster, and others will have to have been the master of Zoroaster. They think the world was created in six days; that in the beginning God created a man and a woman, from whom mankind are derived. That there are several terrestrial paradises, one universal Deluge, one Moses, one Solomon. All this, without doubt, is taken from the history of the Jews, and from the traditions of the Mahometans.

They hold one eternal God, called in their language Jazdan, or Ormuzd, who is the true God, called by the Arabians, Allah, the author of all good; also another god produced by darkness, whom they name Aherman (properly the Eblis of the Arabians, or the devil) the author of all evil. They have a very great veneration for light, and great aversion from darkness. God the Creator of all things has produced light and darkness, and from a mixture of these two, of good and evil, of generation and corruption, the composition and decomposition of the parts of the world is effected, and will always continue, till light withdrawing itself on one side, and darkness on the other, shall cause a destruction and dissolution. This is an abridgment of the doctrine of Zoroaster, which is still maintained by the Magians and Guebres, who are worshippers of fire; and who always, when they pray, turn themselves towards the rising sun.

PETER, Πέτρος, signifies a stone or rock. Peter, the apostle, born at Bethsaida, in Upper Galilee, was son of John, Jonas, or Joanna, and brother of Andrew. (John i. 42, 43.) His first name was Simon, to which our Saviour afterwards added that of Cephas, which in Syriac signifies a stone or a rock; and hence he was called Peter, from the Latin word Petra. He was a married man, and dwelt with his mother-in-law, and his wife, at Capernaum, on the lake of Gennesareth. (Mark i. 29. Matt. viii. 14. Luke iv. 38.) Andrew was a disciple of John the Baptist, and hearing him declare Jesus to be the Lamb of God, he followed Jesus, and continued with him the rest of that day. Andrew, having found his brother, carried him to Jesus. (John i. 41.) Though Peter and Andrew seem to have been now convinced that Jesus was the Messiah, yet they continued to carry on their trade of fishing. It is thought, however, that they were present with our Lord at the marriage of Cana in Galilee.

Jesus, being on the shore of the lake of Gennesareth, saw Peter and Andrew busy, washing their nets. (Luke v. 1, 2, 3, &c.) He entered their boat, and bade Peter throw out his nets into the sea, in order to fish. Peter obeyed him, though he had been fishing the whole night without catching any thing. They took so many fishes at this draught, that their own vessel, and that of James and John, the sons of Zebedee, were filled. Then Peter threw himself at the feet of Jesus, and said, Depart from me, Lord, for I am a sinner. Jesus said to them, Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men. He said the same to James and John, who immediately quitted their boats and nets, and followed our Saviour.

Soon after (Luke iv. 38. Matt. viii. 14.) Jesus, coming to Capernaum, entered the house of Peter, where his mother-in-law lay sick of a fever. He immediately healed her; and she began to serve them. When Jesus chose his twelve apostles, Peter was one of them. It would seem, observes Dr. Lardner, that when our Lord left Nazareth, and came and dwelt at Capernaum, (Matt. iv. 13.) he made Peter's house the place of his usual abode in those parts. We are told that when Jesus came out of the synagogue at Capernaum, 'he entered into Simon's house,' (Luke iv. 38. Mark i. 29.)

This is paraphrased by Dr. Clarke as follows: 'Now when Jesus came out of the synagogue, he went home to Peter's house;' where the people resorted to him in the evening. Another proof of this is in the history related by Matthew (xvii. 24—27.) of our Lord's paying, at Capernaum, the tribute-money for the use of the temple, and his directing Peter, when he had found a piece of money, in the manner prescribed, to pay it for them both. The text says, 'And when they were come to Capernaum, they that received the tribute-money came to Peter, and said, Doth not your master pay tribute? He saith, yes. And when he was come into the house, Jesus prevented him.' The beginning of this account is thus paraphrased by Dr. Clarke: 'Now when they were come home to Capernaum, where Jesus used to dwell, the officers appointed to gather the yearly offering for the service of the temple, came to Peter.'

One night when Jesus Christ walked on the waters of the lake of Gennesareth, Peter proposed to come and meet him. (Matt. xiv. 28, 29.) Jesus gave him leave; but he, seeing a great wave coming, was afraid, and began to sink. Jesus held him up, and said to him, 'O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?' Afterwards, some of his disciples being offended, left him; and Jesus asked his apostles if they would also leave him? Peter replied, To whom shall we go, Lord? for thou hast the words of eternal life. (John vi. 53, 54, &c.)

One day as our Saviour was near Cæsarea Philippi, he asked his apostles, Whom men took him to be? (Matt. xvi. 13, 14.) They answered, some said he was John the Baptist, some Elias, others Jeremiah, or one of the old prophets. But whom, asked he, do ye say that I am? Simon Peter answered, 'Thou art the Christ, the son of the living God.' Jesus said to him, 'Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my father which is in Heaven. And I say also unto thee, that thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven.' By the words, 'Upon this rock I will build my church,' &c. and 'I will give unto thee,' &c. most interpreters suppose, that our Lord promised to Peter that he should have the honour of first preaching the Gospel, after his resurrection, to Jews and Gentiles, and of receiving them into the church. But Dr. Lardner observes on the words 'whatsoever thou shalt bind,' &c. this must have been the privilege of all the apostles; for the same things are expressly said to them. (Luke xxii. 29, 30. John xx. 21, 22, 23.) Besides, all the apostles concurred with Peter, in the first preaching both to Jews and Gentiles. As he was president in the college of the apostles, it was proper that he should be primarily concerned in the first opening of the subject. The confession before us was made by him: but it was in answer to a question put to all; and he spoke the sense of all the apostles, and in their name.

When our Saviour was transfigured upon a mountain, he had with him Peter, James, and John, and showed them a glimpse of his glory. Peter being in an ecstasy, and seeing Moses and Elias with Jesus, exclaimed, 'Lord, it is good for us to be here: if thou wilt, let us make here three tabernacles; one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias.' (Matt. xvii. 1, 2, 3, &c. Luke ix. 28.)

One day, as Jesus was speaking concerning forgiveness of injuries, (Matt. xviii. 21, 22.) Peter asked him how oft they must forgive? Seven times? Jesus told him, Seventy times seven. On another occasion, (Matt. xix. 27, 28, 29.) as our Saviour was speaking of the danger of riches, Peter said to him, 'Behold, we have forsaken all, and followed thee; what shall we have therefore?' Jesus answered, An hundred-fold, even in this world, and in the other world eternal life.

In the account which St. John has given of our Saviour's washing the disciples' feet, Peter's modesty and fervour are conspicuous. (John xiii. 6—10.) During the same evening, our Lord said, Simon, Simon, behold, Satan hath desired to have you that he may sift you as wheat: but I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not: and when thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren. Peter replied, Lord, I am ready to go with thee both into prison, and to death. But Christ foretold to him, that he would abjure him three times that very night, before the cock should crow. When supper was ended, Jesus went to the garden of Gethsemane, taking Peter, James, and John apart, as witnesses of his agony. Peter, though he had lately shown so much resolution, yet fell asleep with the rest, which occasioned Jesus to say to him, Do you sleep Simon? Could you not watch with me one hour? (Mark xiv. 37. Matt. xxvi. 40, &c.)

Judas being come with the soldiers to seize Jesus, Peter drew his sword, and cut off the right ear of one Malchus, servant to the high-priest: but Jesus bid him put up his sword, adding, all who fight with the sword, should perish by the sword: at the same time he healed Malchus's ear. (John xviii. 10, &c.) Peter followed Jesus afar off, into the house of Caiaphas; where the soldiers and servants having a fire in the middle of the hall, Peter stood among them to warm himself; when a maid servant said, Surely this man was with Jesus of Nazareth.

Peter answered, I know not what you say; I do not so much as know the man. A little while after another maid said, This man was with Jesus of Nazareth. But Peter denied it with an oath. About an hour after, one of the company affirmed that Peter was a disciple of Jesus. Others insisted on the same thing, and said, that certainly he was one, for his very speech betrayed him to be a Galilean. One of them, a kinsman to Malchus, whose ear Peter had cut off, asked him, Did not I see you with him in the garden? Peter again denied it with an oath, protesting that he did not know the man. And now the cock crowed the second time. Jesus, being so placed that he could see Peter, turned and looked on him: Peter, remembering that Jesus had said to him, Before the cock crowed twice, he should deny him thrice, went out of Caiaphas's house, and wept bitterly. (Matt. xxvi. 73. 75. Mark xiv. 30. 72.) See Cock.

Very probably he remained in secret, and in tears, all the time of our Saviour's passion, but on Sunday morning, Jesus being risen, and Mary having been at the tomb, and not finding the body of Jesus, she ran into the city, to tell Peter and John that their Master was taken away. Peter and John ran to the sepulchre; John coming first, did not enter it; but Peter coming, stooped down, and saw the linen clothes in which the body had been wrapped. They returned to Jerusalem, not understanding what had come to pass. The same day our Saviour appeared to Peter, to comfort him. (John xx. 1, 2, 3, &c. Luke xxiv. 12, &c. Mark xvi. 7.)

Some days after, Peter being returned into Galilee, and going to fish in the sea of Galilee, (or lake of Gennesareth) with some others of the apostles, Jesus appeared to them on the shore. John said to Peter, It is the Lord. Peter immediately swimming to shore came to Jesus; and Jesus dined with them. After dinner Jesus said to Peter; Simon, son of Jona, do you love me more than these? He answered, Yea, Lord, you know that I love you. Jesus says to him, Then feed my sheep. He put the same question to him again; and, Peter making the same answer, our Lord said to him again, Feed my lambs. This he repeated a third time: at which Peter, being mortified, said, You know, Lord, that I love you. Jesus replied to him, Feed my sheep. I tell you for a truth, that when you were young, you girded yourself, and went where you pleased; but now you are old, another shall gird you, and lead you where you would not go. At the same time, Peter, seeing John the Evangelist following Jesus, said, Lord, what must become of him? Jesus answered, If I will have him continue, what does that concern you? Do you follow me. Thus, though he forewarned Peter, yet he refused to declare in what manner John should end his life.

After Jesus Christ had ascended into heaven, and the apostles had seen his ascension, they returned to Jerusalem, to wait for the Holy Ghost. During this interval, Peter proposed to fill up the place vacant by the treachery of Judas. The proposal was agreed to, and the lot was cast, which fell upon Matthias.

The Holy Ghost having descended on the apostles, and the faithful, and having filled them with supernatural gifts, and especially with the gift of tongues, there being then at Jerusalem Jews from all the East, they could not comprehend by what means these people, who were Galileans, should speak such variety of languages. Some said the apostles were full of wine: but Peter, in their defence, stated that this was not the effect of drunkenness, but the completion of the promise, (Joel ii. 28.) to send the Holy Spirit on all flesh, &c. See PENTECOST.

Some days after, Peter and John, going to the temple at the hour of prayers, found at the gate of the temple a man of more than forty years of age, who from his birth had been a cripple, and could not walk. Peter healed him, and on this occasion preached Jesus to the people.

While he was speaking, the priests and Sadducees laid hold on Peter and John, and put them in prison. The day following, the senate, the magistrates, and the chief priests, being assembled, they asked the two apostles, In whose name they had performed the miracle of healing the lame man? Peter answered them, In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom they had crucified, and whom God had raised again, &c. The council strictly charged them to teach no more in this name: but Peter and John told them, Judge yourselves which is most just, whether to obey you or to obey God.

Many of the faithful sold their estates, and brought the money, and laid it at the feet of the apostles. Of this number was a man called Ananias, with his wife Sapphira, who, by agreement between themselves, concealed part of the money for which they had sold their land, and brought the rest, as if it were the whole. Ananias came first, and Peter said to him, How could you suffer Satan to seduce you, to lie to the Holy Ghost, by concealing part of the price of your land? &c. Immediately Ananias fell down dead, and was carried out and buried. About three hours afterwards, his wife Sapphira came in, and Peter said to her the same he had said to her husband: immediately she also fell down, and gave up the ghost. This infused a great awe in all who heard of it. See ANANIAS.

The number of believers increased daily; the people even brought the sick into the streets, that the shadow of Peter might cover some of them. Then the high-priest and the Pharisees put the apostles into prison. But an angel brought them forth, and bid them go into the temple, and boldly declare the words of life. This they did: upon which the princes and priests apprehended them, and demanded why they had disobeyed their orders, by continuing to speak in the name of Jesus Christ? Peter and the apostles answered, that it was more necessary to obey God than man. This answer provoked them, and they were going to condemn them to death, when Gamaliel suspended their resolution, by representing, that if this matter was from God, it was in vain to oppose it; but if otherwise, it would soon vanish of itself. So they dismissed the apostles, after giving each of them thirty-nine stripes.

After the martyrdom of Stephen, the apostles alone continued at Jerusalem. Philip, the deacon, going to Samaria, the Samaritans received the word of the Lord, and several were baptized. Peter and John repaired thither also, to impart the Holy Ghost; which Philip had not power to do. Simon, the magician, was also baptized among others, and, admiring the power of the apostles, in conferring the Holy Ghost, he offered money for it to Peter. But Peter with indignation replied to him, Thy money and thyself perish together, who thinkest the gifts of God can be bought with money! (Acts viii.)

St. Peter, departing from Jerusalem, visited the disciples from city to city; and came to Lydda. Here he cured Æneas, who had been paralytic eight years. A certain holy woman, named Tabitha, happening to die at Joppa while Peter was at Lydda, the disciples sent for him. Peter came, and entering the chamber where Tabitha lay dead, he betook himself to prayers: then he said, Tabitha arise. She opened her eyes, and, seeing Peter, she sat up. Peter stayed at Joppa a good while, lodging with one Simon, a tanner. (Acts ix. 36, &c.)

At Cæsarea in Palestine resided a centurion called Cornelius, a man who feared God: he was directed by an angel to send to Joppa for Peter; and Cornelius immediately sent two of his servants. While they were on the road, Peter being on the terrace of his host Simon's house, in an ecstasy, saw, as it were, a great sheet of linen let down from heaven, full of animals clean and unclean. He heard a voice, saying, Arise, Peter, kill and eat. But Peter answered, Lord, I have never eaten anything unclean. The voice replied, Call not that unclean which God has purified. He had this vision three times, after which the sheet was again taken up into heaven. By this time, came in the men sent by Cornelius. The day following St. Peter went with them, and some of the brethren from Joppa.

(Acts x.) He found Cornelius with his kindred and friends waiting for him. When Cornelius first saw him, he fell at his feet: but Peter, lifting him up, said, I am only a man, as well as you. Cornelius related to him what had happened; and Peter, giving thanks to God, began to preach Jesus Christ. While he was speaking, the Holy Ghost descended upon all that heard him. Then Peter said, Can any one refuse baptism to those who have already received the Holy Ghost as well as ourselves?

When St. Peter was returned to Jerusalem, the faithful of the circumcision said to him, Why have you gone unto those that are not circumcised? But when Peter had related to them all that had passed, they glorified God. Peter being at Jerusalem, at the passover, A.D. 44, Herod Agrippa began a persecution against the church. (Acts xii. 1, 2, 3, &c.) He slew James the Great, brother of John, and caused Peter to be apprehended, designing to put him to death after the passover. But, the very night before Herod thought of executing him, as Peter, loaded with chains, was sleeping between two soldiers, the angel of the Lord awakened him, opened the prison, and brought him the length of a street. He came to the house of Mary, the mother of John, where the faithful were assembled at prayers.

He left Jerusalem, but we are not told what became of him, till the council at Jerusalem, A.D. 49. Peter was at the council of Jerusalem, in which, after a strict examination, the council came to this conclusion, which Peter promoted, That no new obligation should be imposed on the Gentiles, but only abstinence from fornication, from the use of blood, and from meats offered to idols.

Some time after, Peter coming to Antioch, he ate and drank with the Gentiles, without regarding the Mosaic distinction of meats. But, when some converted Jews from Jerusalem came to Antioch, Peter, being unwilling to offend them, separated himself from the converted Gentiles. Paul, fearing that what Peter did might be interpreted as if he meant to revoke and annul what he had determined in the council of Jerusalem, withstood him to his face, and expostulated with him; to which Peter submitted. (Gal. ii. 11.)

The particulars of St. Peter's life are little known after the council of Jerusalem, A.D. 49. The only authentic account which we have of the remaining part of his life, is from Origen, as quoted by Eusebius, who says in general terms, that Peter is supposed to have preached to the Jews of the dispersion in Pontus, Galatia, Bithynia, Cappadocia, and Asia; and that at length, coming to Rome, he was crucified with his head downwards, himself having desired that it might be in that manner. That St. Peter should die by crucifixion had been foretold by Christ (John xxi. 18.); and St. Peter himself alluded to that prediction. (2 Pet. i. 14.) All ancient writers concur in asserting, that St. Peter suffered martyrdom at Rome, in the first persecution of the Christians, in the reign of Nero, probably in the year 65; but at what time he went thither, and whether this was his first visit to that city, is not certainly known. As he is not mentioned in any of St. Paul's Epistles written from Rome, it has been concluded, that he was not there during St. Paul's first imprisonment in that city; and upon the whole it seems probable, as Lardner thinks, that St. Peter did not go to Rome till the year 63 or 64.

As St. Peter, says Bishop Tomline, had been the first apostle that preached to the Jews immediately after the descent of the Holy Ghost, so, about eight years afterwards, he was also the first that preached to the Gentiles in the house of Cornelius at Cæsarea. By these means he may be said to have founded the universal church of Christ; and this is supposed to have been the meaning of our Lord's words, 'Upon this rock will I build my church; and I will give thee the keys of heaven:' for, by being the first person that explained the Gospel both to Jews and Gentiles, after the ascension of our Saviour, he, as it were, opened the doors of heaven to all mankind. He seems to have performed more miracles than any other of the apostles, for the people 'brought their sick, for the purpose of having his shadow pass over them.' (Acts v. 15.) When he was imprisoned by Herod Agrippa, prayer was made for him without ceasing by the church, and he was miraculously delivered out of prison by an angel, though Herod had been permitted to put James the Great to death. (Acts xii. 1, &c.) The speech of Peter, at the council of Jerusalem, so often mentioned, is recorded, but of no other person except of James the Less, bishop of Jerusalem (Acts xv. 6, &c.); and St. Paul tells us, that to St. Peter was committed the Gospel of the circumcision, (Gal. ii. 7.) whence he is called the apostle of the Jews, as St. Paul is called the apostle of the Gentiles. And, lastly, in all the catalogues of the apostles, and whenever he is mentioned in conjunction with others, in the Gospels or Acts, the name of Peter stands first. Though these facts may lead us to consider Peter as the chief, or the most distinguished, of the twelve apostles; yet they by no means prove that he had any superior dignity or jurisdiction over the rest; 'One is your master, even Christ; but all ye are brethren.' (Matt. xxiii. 8.)

viour's affection, so Peter seems to have been considered by him as the apostle whose disposition would lead him to be the most active and instrumental in propagating his religion; and that this was really the case, the Acts of the Apostles sufficiently prove. Confidence and zeal form a conspicuous part of his character; but he was sometimes deficient in firmness and resolution. He had the faith to walk upon the water to his divine Master; but when the sea grew boisterous, his faith deserted him, and he became afraid. (Matt. xiv. 28, &c.) He was forward to acknowledge Jesus to be the Messiah, (Matt. xvi. 16. Mark viii. 29. Luke ix. 20. John vi. 68, 69.) and declared himself ready to die in that profession (Matt. xxvi. 35.); and yet, soon after, he thrice denied, and with oaths, that he knew any thing of Jesus. (Matt. xxvi. 69, &c.) The warmth of his temper led him to cut off the ear of the high-priest's servant, (John xviii. 10.) and, by his timidity and dissimulation respecting the Gentile converts at Antioch, he incurred the censure of the eager and resolute St. Paul. (Gal. ii. 11.) But while we lament this occasional want of steadiness and consistency in St. Peter, we should remember, that his good qualities seem not to have been mixed with any other infirmity; and his voluntary acknowledgment to Christ of his being a sinful man, the bitter remorse which he felt upon the denial of his Master, and his submission to the reproof of St. Paul, justify us in concluding, that to his zeal he added humility, which are virtues rarely united in the same person.

The First General Epistle of St. Peter is addressed 'to the strangers scattered through Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia.' Great doubts have arisen, whether by 'strangers' were meant Jewish or Gentile Christians, or Christians of both denominations. As there is nothing in the Epistle itself to lead us to think that the apostle intended it for any particular description of Christians, it may be considered as addressed to the Christians in general of the above countries of Asia Minor, most of whom, it is probable, had been converted from heathenism. The apostle wrote this Epistle from a place which he calls Babylon: 'The church that is at Babylon saluteth you;' but it is very doubtful what place is meant by that name. It may, however, be best to accede to the general opinion, that Babylon is here used figuratively for Rome; and more especially since Eusebius, the oldest author extant, mentioning this subject, says, that in his time it was thought that this Epistle was written from Rome. If this Epistle was written from Rome, we may place its date about the year 64; since there is no reason to believe that Peter went to Rome till after Paul's release from imprisonment in that city, in the year 63. This Epistle is very generally admired as a composition. Erasmus says, that it is worthy of the prince of the apostles, and full of apostolical dignity and majesty: and Ostervald calls it one of the finest works of the New Testament. Whoever compares this Epistle with those of St. Paul, will find so exact a conformity between the sentiments and precepts contained in them, that he will be convinced, as Estius observes, that the doctrine of both proceeded from one and the same Spirit of God.

The Second General Epistle of St. Peter is addressed to the same persons as the former, and the design of it was to encourage them to adhere to the genuine faith and practice of the Gospel. It was written when the apostle foresaw that his death was at no great distance, and he might hope that advice and instruction given under such circumstances would have the greater weight. As he is supposed to have suffered martyrdom in the year 65, we may place the date of this Epistle in the beginning of that year. It was probably written from Rome. Clement of Rome, and Hermas, refer to this Epistle; it is mentioned by Origen and Eusebius, and has been universally received since the fourth century, except by the Syriac Christians. Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. i. pp. 479—489; Watson's Theological Tracts, vol. ii. p. 403, &c.

PE/THOR, פֶּתוֹרָה, signifies interpretation of dreams. It was a city of Mesopotamia, of which Balaam was a native. The Hebrews call this city Pethura; Ptolemy calls it Pachora; and Eusebius, Phathura. He places it in the Upper Mesopotamia. Calmet takes it to be situated towards Thapsacus, beyond the Euphrates. Jerome, in his translation of the Book of Numbers, (xxii. 5.) has omitted this name. He has only 'To Balaam, who dwelt upon the river of the Ammonites.' The Septuagint have, 'To Balaam, son of Beor Pathura, who dwells on the river of the country of his people.' Our English translators have rendered it, 'Unto Balaam, the son of Beor, to Pethor, which is by the river of the land of the children of his people.' Certain it is, that Balaam was of Mesopotamia. (Deut. xxiii. 4.)

PETROBRUSSIANS, a denomination which was formed about the year 1110 in Languedoc and Provence, by Peter de Bruys, who taught the following doctrines: 1. That no persons were to be baptized before they came to the full use of their reason. 2. That it was an idle superstition to build churches for the service of God, who will accept of a sincere worship wherever it is offered; and that therefore such churches as had already been erected were to be pulled down and destroyed. 3. That the crucifixes deserved the same fate. 4. That the real body and blood of Christ were not exhibited in the eucharist, but were only represented in that holy ordinance by their figures and symbols. 5. That the oblations, prayers, and good works of the living, could be in no respect advantageous to the dead. The founder of this sect, after a laborious ministry of twenty years, was burnt in the year 1130 by an enraged populace, excited by the clergy, whose traffic was in danger from the enterprising spirit of this reformer. Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, vol. iii. p. 116.

PHAL'TI, פלתי, signifies deliverance, or flight. Phalti, or Phaltiel, son of Laish, married Michal, Saul's daughter, after Saul had taken her from David; but David afterwards took her from Phalti. (1 Sam. xxv. 44. 2 Sam. iii. 15.) See MICHAL.

PHA'RAOH, פרעה, signifies that disperses, that spoils, that discovers; according to the Syriac, the revenger, the destroyer, the king, the crocodile. Pharaoh was a common name of the kings of Egypt. Josephus says, that all the kings of Egypt, from Minæus the founder of Memphis, who lived several ages before Abraham, had the name of Pharaoh, down to the time of Solomon, more than three thousand three hundred years. He adds, that in the Egyptian language, the word Pharaoh signifies a king, and that these princes did not assume this name till they ascended the throne, when they quitted their former name. Hence, says Josephus, Herodotus names none of the kings of Egypt after Minæus, the builder of Memphis, though he had three hundred and thirty kings for his successors, because they had all the name of Pharaoh; but he names an Egyptian queen, Nicaule, who succeeded them. I find, adds Josephus, from the ancient records of our nation, that, after the age of Solomon, no king of Egypt had the name of Pharaoh.

But Josephus is not very accurate in this passage. True it is, Herodotus says, that Mines, or Minæus, was the first king of Egypt, and founder of Memphis; that there were three hundred and thirty kings after him in Egypt; that after them was a queen called Nitocris (not Nicaule, as Josephus writes it): but it is not true that these kings had no other name than Pharaoh. Herodotus says expressly, that in the books of the Egyptian priests were registered the names of three hundred and thirty kings; that in this number eighteen were Ethiopians, and a woman, who was a foreigner, called Nitocris: and that the others were Egyptians. These princes, therefore, had each his right name in this catalogue. So we see in the fragments of Manetho, that each king of Egypt had a name peculiar to him; and we find the name Pharaoh only in Scripture.

As to what Josephus says, that since the time of Solomon, the kings of Egypt had no longer the name of Pharaoh, it is manifestly false, since we find this name under Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii. 21.); under Josiah (xxiii. 29, 30, &c.); where this name is joined to Necho, which was the proper name of this prince; under Jehoiakim (xxiii. 35.); and in the prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel; who are much later than Solomon. It is very probable that the Egyptians gave the name of Pharaoh to their kings, as long as the Egyptian language was in common use, and as long as their kings were of their own nation. But, after the conquest of Egypt by the Persians, and especially by Alexander the Great, and after the Grecians had introduced their language with their government, the name of Pharaoh ceased among them.

Mr. Bryant distinguishes between Pharaon, as the word is written by Josephus, and the Peirôm of Herodotus. The former term, he thinks, is compounded of Phi and ourah, implying 'the voice of Orus;' because 'it was no unusual thing, among the ancients, to call the words of their prince, the voice of God.' The observations of Herodotus and Josephus, however, so far coincide as to make it evident they meant the same title or denomination, though they may have both, perhaps, altered the original word, by expressing it in the characters of their respective languages. In a treatise 'On Providence,' written by Synesius, the celebrated bishop of Cyrene, is a passage which coincides with, and illustrates, the observations of Herodotus. He says, 'the father of Osiris and Typhon was, at the same time, a king, a priest, and a philosopher. The Egyptian histories, also, rank him among the gods; for the Egyptians are disposed to believe that many divinities reigned in succession, before their country was governed by men, and before their kings were reckoned in a genealogical series, by Peirôm after Peirôm.' It seems to be admitted, that Pharaoh is a title signifying dignity, honour, exaltation. May it not be analogous to the title of highness among ourselves? 'I conceive,' says a late writer, 'that the expression in Herodotus, pyromis after pyromis signifies a great man after a great man.' Assuming that highness may be the radical import of this Egyptian title, we may, perhaps, discover the true sense of the expression (Exod. ix. 16.): 'For this cause have I raised thee up.' This seems to be a turn of words perfectly agreeable to the Eastern modes of speech, and implies as much as 'I have raised your highness to your height, that, in spite of your height, in your very face, I might display my power.'

The following are the principal sovereigns of this name, who are mentioned in the Old Testament:—

1. The first Pharaoh known to us is he, in whose time Abraham went down into Egypt (Gen. xii. 10, &c.); in the year of the world 2084, whose officers brought Sarah into that prince's harem; from which she was not recovered without divine interference. The character of this prince seems to have been only indifferent.

2. The second Pharaoh, noticed in Scripture, reigned in Egypt in the time of Joseph, when he was sold thither by the Ishmaelitic merchants. This prince, or perhaps his successor, had the mysterious dream of the seven fat kine, and the seven full ears of corn, consumed by seven lean kine, and seven barren ears; and he promoted Joseph to be regent of the whole kingdom. (Gen. xlv. 8, 9.) This is the same Pharaoh who sent for and entertained the patriarch Jacob and his family in Egypt, and the sovereign alluded to by Stephen. (Acts vii. 10. 13.)

3. The third Pharaoh gave one of his daughters in marriage to Mered, a descendant of Judah. (1 Chron. iv. 18.) This remarkable alliance must have taken place while the Hebrews were the guests, and not the slaves of the Egyptians; and this prince must certainly have been one of the first successors of the king who honoured Joseph.

4. The fourth Pharaoh was the contemporary of Moses, and reigned at the period when Jacob's descendants had already become a great people. The genealogical lists of that period, which are extant, in harmony with the sacred historians, show how rapidly the race of Israel had multiplied. (1 Chron. iv. 1—27.) This prince adopted the false policy of oppressing the Hebrews, as related by Moses, (Exod. ii.) little thinking that his own daughter would save from the waters of the Nile the future avenger and deliverer of the Israelites. The recent discoveries which have thrown new light on Egyptian antiquities, and which harmonize more and more with the sacred history, enable us to recognise the Pharaohs, who are mentioned in the Bible, subsequently to the time of Moses. The Pharaoh, under whose reign Moses was born, can be no other than Rameses or Ramses IV. surnamed Mei-Amoun, the last sovereign but one of the eighteenth dynasty. The first oppression of the Israelites (Exod. i. 11. 14.) most probably commenced under Thoutmosis III., the Mæris of the Greeks, a predecessor of this prince; but the succeeding narrative of the proscription of all the male Hebrew children, and of the birth of Moses, relates only to this Rameses Mei-Amoun. This prince, the contemporary of Moses, must have swayed the Egyptian sceptre more than forty years, since the Hebrew legislator passed forty years at his court, and, a long time afterwards, it is said that the king of Egypt died. Now, it is certain, according to the recent discoveries, as shown by A. L. C. Coquerel (Biographie Sacrée, tom. iii. p. 361.) that this identical Rameses or Ramses Mei-Amoun reigned sixty-six years. Are not these unexpected agreements between sacred and profane history evident proofs of truth? Who then has falsified the ancient lists of Egyptian dynasties, the lists written on papyrus, and the ruins of Egypt, to make them agree so well with a few sentences uttered by a Christian named Stephen (Acts vii. 18, et seq.) and with a few lines written by a Jew named Moses?

5. The fifth Pharaoh, also the contemporary of Moses, had reigned about eighteen years, when Moses was commanded to return into Egypt, Ramses Mei-Amoun and his personal enemies being dead. (Exod. iv. 19.) His history is narrated by Moses. (Exod. vi.—xii.) He perished with his army in the Red Sea. (Exod. xiv. 5—31.) This Pharaoh is Amenophis or Ramses V., the last king of the eighteenth dynasty, and the father of Ramses VI. or Sesostris.

6. The sixth Pharaoh, the contemporary of David, received at his court, and honourably entertained Hadad, prince of Idumæa, (to whom he gave his wife's sister in marriage) after the conquest of that country by the Hebrews. (1 Kings xi. 17—19.) He was one of the last kings of the twenty-first or Tanite dynasty, and most probably was a different person from the Pharaoh who is next noticed, because it is difficult to conceive how the protector of Hadad could be the father-in-law of Solomon.

7. The seventh Pharaoh, the contemporary of Solomon, gave the Hebrew king his daughter in marriage, with the city of Gezer as a portion. (1 Kings ix. 16.) This prince, the last sovereign of the twenty-first or Tanite dynasty, was probably dethroned and put to death by Shishak, who was contemporary with Rehoboam. M. Coquerel thinks that Eccles. iv. 14. may allude to this event.

8. The eighth is Pharaoh-Necho, the contemporary of Josiah king of Judah. He took up arms against the new empire of the Chaldæans, which was rapidly advancing, and threatening Asia. He resolved to carry the war across the Euphrates, into the very centre of the Chaldæan empire; but being opposed in his passage by Josiah, an ally of the Chaldæan monarch, he totally discomfited the forces of the Jewish king near Megiddo. He then marched to Jerusalem, which city he entered either by force or capitulation; and deposing Jehoahaz, who had just succeeded his father on the throne, he gave the crown of Judah to his elder brother Jehoiakim, and levied a heavy military contribution on the kingdom of Judah. Encouraged by these successes, Necho proceeded on his Asiatic expedition, taking with him Jehoahaz, whom he left prisoner at Riblah. He made himself master of Carchemish on the Euphrates; where, after three years' warfare with various success, he was defeated by Nebuchadnezzar, and forced to return into Egypt with the wreck of his army. On his return, he took the captive Jehoahaz with him. (2 Kings xxiii. 29—34.; xxiv. 7.; 2 Chron. xxxv. 20—24.; xxxvi. 1—4.) The Scripture account of the war carried on by Pharaoh-Necho against the Jews and Babylonians is confirmed by an ancient monument discovered in Egypt by the late enterprising traveller Belzoni. In one of the numerous apartments in the tomb of Psammethis or Psammis, the son of Pharaoh-Necho, M. Belzoni discovered a sculptured group, describing the march of a military and triumphal procession with three different sets of prisoners, who are evidently Jews, Ethiopians, and Persians. Among the hieroglyphics contained in M. Belzoni's drawings of this tomb, Dr. Young succeeded in discovering the names of Nichao, (the Necho of Scripture and Necos of Herodotus) and of Psammethis. Pharaoh-Necho, the son of Psammetichus, and the sixth king of the twenty-sixth dynasty, that of the Saites, is celebrated in profane history, for his project of digging a canal, to join the Nile to the Red Sea, and by the voyage of discovery which his vessels, manned by Phœnician sailors, made round Africa.

9. The ninth is Pharaoh-Hophra, who is the Apries or Vaphres of profane historians, and was the son of Psammis, and grandson of Pharaoh-Necho. He was the eighth king of the twenty-sixth dynasty, and contemporary with Zedekiah king of Judah, with whom he formed an alliance against Nebuchadnezzar. During the last siege of Jerusalem, Hophra took arms, and advanced to succour his ally. This diversion was useful for a short time; but, agreeably to the predictions of Jeremiah, the Egyptians, notwithstanding their brilliant promises, withdrew without fighting, or at least without making any resistance. After the destruction of Jerusalem, when, deaf to the counsels of Jeremiah, Azariah and Johanan took refuge in Egypt, the prophets predicted to them the deplorable end of Hophra. (Ezek. xvii. 15. Jerem. xxxvii. 5.; xliii. 9.; xlv. 30.; xlv. 26.) The prophet Ezekiel (xxix.) reproaches Pharaoh with his base conduct towards the king of Judah, and foretels that Egypt should be reduced to a desert, and that the sword should cut off both man and beast. This prediction was afterwards accomplished, first in the person of Pharaoh-Hophra, who was deprived of his kingdom by Amasis, who usurped his throne, and subsequently by the conquest of Egypt by the Persians. Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. pp. 611, 612; Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary, No. lxxxiii. pp. 142, 143.

PHARISEES, a famous sect of the Jews. This sect was one of the most ancient and considerable among the Jews; but its origin is not very well known. It was, however, in great repute in the time of our Saviour; and its origin must have been contemporary with the traditions. They grew up together, till at length the tradition absorbed the written law; and the propagators of traditions were the bulk of the Jewish nation. Hence the distinguishing character of the Pharisees was their zeal for the traditions of the elders, which they derived from the same fountain as the written word itself: they pretended that both were delivered to Moses upon Mount Sinai, and were, therefore, of equal authority. It is probable, that the principles, by which the Pharisees were chiefly distinguished, existed some time before they were formed into a regular sect. Godwin thought that the Pharisees arose about three hundred years before Christ; but the earliest written account which we have of them in any ancient author is in Josephus, who tells us that they were a sect of considerable weight when John Hyrcanus was high-priest, a hundred and eight years before Christ.

The Pharisees derived their name from Pharas, a Hebrew word, which signifies separated, or set apart, because they affected an extraordinary degree of sanctity and piety. Their distinguishing dogma was a scrupulous and zealous adherence to the traditions of the elders, which they placed upon an equal footing with the written law. They were strict observers of external rites and ceremonies, beyond what the law required, and were superstitiously exact in paying tithe to the most trifling articles, while in general they neglected the essential duties of moral virtue. They were of opinion that good works might claim reward from God, and ascribed an extraordinary degree of merit to the observance of rules, which they had themselves established as works of supererogation. Of this sort were their frequent washings and fastings, their nice avoidance of reputed sinners, their rigorous observance of the sabbath, and the long prayers which they ostentatiously 'made in the synagogues and in the corners of the streets.' 'Trusting in themselves that they were righteous,' they not only despised the rest of mankind, but were entirely destitute of humility towards God, which is inseparable from true piety; yet the specious sanctity of their manners, and their hypocritical display of zeal for religion, gave them a vast influence over the common people, and consequently great power and authority in the Jewish state.

Dr. Lardner, in speaking of the Jewish sects, after quoting a passage from Josephus, in which he says, that 'the multitude was with the Pharisees,' very justly observes, that 'there is in this respect a complete agreement between the Evangelist and Josephus. The people, as clearly appears from the Gospels, very generally held the tenets, and observed the traditions, of the Pharisees, yet they are never dignified so far as to be called Pharisees; they were rather an appendage than a part of the sect, and always called, very plainly, the people, the multitude, and the like. The title of Pharisee seems to have been almost entirely appropriated to men of leisure and substance.' The Pharisees believed in the immortality of the soul, in the resurrection of the dead, and in the existence of angels and spirits; and it is supposed by many of the learned, that they believed also in the pre-existence of souls, a doctrine which seems to have been commonly held in the time of our Saviour. The question of the disciples of Christ, relative to the man that was born blind, 'who did sin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?' (John ix. 2.) and the doubts expressed by the people, whether Christ was John the Baptist, or Elias, or one of the ancient prophets, (Matt. xvi. 14.) are thought to have arisen from some opinion of this sort. Hence some commentators have formed an opinion, that the Pharisees believed in the Pythagorean doctrine of the transmigration of souls. This supposition, however, appears to be clearly contradicted both by Josephus and the sacred writers. Josephus, in his second book against Apion, says, with an allusion to the rewards given by the heathen nations for meritorious conduct, 'However, the reward for such as live exactly according to the laws is not silver or gold; it is not a garland of olive branches, or of smallage, nor any such public sign of commendation; but every good man has his own conscience bearing witness to himself; and by virtue of our legislator's prophetic spirit, and of the firm security God himself affords to such an one, he believes that God has made this grant to those that observe these laws, even though they be obliged readily to die for them, that they shall come into being again, and, at a certain revolution of things, shall receive a better life than they had enjoyed before.' In his Antiquities he also says, 'They believe that it hath pleased God to make a temperament, whereby what he wills is done, but so that the will of man can act virtuously or viciously. They also believe that souls have an immortal vigour in them, and that under the earth there will be rewards or punishments, according as they have lived virtuously or viciously in this life; and the latter are to be detained in an everlasting prison, but the former shall have power to revive and live again.' St. Luke expressly says, that the Pharisees believed in the resurrection of the dead; and we cannot suppose that he would call the metempsychosis by that name. When St. Paul professed himself a Pharisee, and declared, that of the 'hope and resurrection of the dead he was called in question,' (Acts xxiii. 6.) the Pharisees vindicated and supported him, acknowledging that he was preaching a doctrine conformable to the principles of their own sect. On the whole, therefore, it appears most reasonable to adopt the opinion of Reland, though in opposition to the sentiments of many other learned men, that the Pharisees held the doctrine of the resurrection in its proper sense, though their notions upon this important point were not correct and accurate.

To the same cause whence the Pharisees derived their other superstitions and corruptions, even their attachment to traditions, may be traced their most unreasonable and malicious opposition to our Saviour. Having learned to interpret the prophecies of the Messiah in a carnal sense, and being strongly tainted with the notion of a temporal prince and deliverer, no miracles could overcome their prejudices against the meanness of Christ's appearance, and persuade them that a person, who made no pretence to civil authority and military power, could be 'Messiah, the prince,' the 'Son of David, and the Saviour of Israel.' Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. i. pp. 251—255; Dr. Jennings's Jewish Antiquities, book i. chap. x.

PHAR/PAR, פַּרְפָּר, signifies reduced to minuteness, or fructification of fruit; otherwise bull of the bull. Pharpar, or Pharphar, is one of the rivers of Damascus, or rather an arm of the Barrady, or Chrysorrhoeas, which waters the city of Damascus, and the country about it. (2 Kings v. 12.) The river of Damascus has its fountain in the mountains of Libanus. Near the city it is divided into three streams, one of which passes through Damascus, the other two water the surrounding gardens; then reuniting, they lose themselves four or five leagues north of the city. Maundrell's Travels from Aleppo to Jerusalem.

PHE'BE, Φειβη, signifies shining, pure. Phebe was a deaconess of the port of Corinth, called Cenchrea. St. Paul had a particular esteem for this holy woman; and it is thought she carried to Rome the epistle he wrote to the Romans, in which she is commended. (Rom. xvi. 1, 2.)

PHENICE, Φαινίξ, signifies red or purple; otherwise, palm-tree. Phenice was a port of the island of Crete, to the west, where St. Paul anchored when he was carried to Rome, A.D. 60. (Acts xxvii. 12.)

PHENIC'IA, Φωνίκη, is a province of Syria, whose limits have not always been the same. Sometimes its extent has been defined from north to south, from Orthosia to Pelusium. At other times its southern limit has been Mount Carmel and Ptolemais. From the conquest of Palestine by the Hebrews, its limits were narrow, and excluded the country of the Philistines, which occupied the coast from Mount Carmel along the Mediterranean toward Egypt. It had also little extent on the land side, because the Israelites, who had Galilee, confined it to the coast of the Mediterranean Sea.

Thus when we speak of Phenicia we must have a right notion of the time. Before Joshua conquered Palestine, the country was possessed by Canaanites, the sons of Ham, who were divided into eleven families, of which the most powerful was that of Canaan, the founder of Sidon, and head of the Canaanites, properly so called, whom the Greeks named Phenicians. Only these preserved their independence under Joshua; also under David, Solomon, and the succeeding kings: but they were subdued by the kings of Assyria and Chaldæa. Afterwards they successively obeyed the Persians, Greeks, and Romans. At this day Phenicia is in subjection to the Ottomans, not having had any national or native kings, or any independent form of government, for more than two thousand years: for the kings that the Assyrians, Chaldæans, Persians, and Grecians, sometimes established, were tributary, and had but a precarious authority.

The chief cities of Phenicia were Sidon, Tyre, Ptolemais, Ecdippe, Sarepta, Beryth, Biblos, Tripoli, Orthosia, Simira, Aradus. The Phenicians also anciently possessed some cities in Libanus. Sometimes the Greek authors comprehend all Judea under the name of Phenicia.

Many fine inventions have been ascribed to the Phenicians; as particularly the art of writing. It is said also that they discovered the art of navigation, commerce, astronomy, and voyages in the open sea. Bochart, by incredible labour and industry, has shown, that they had sent out colonies, and had left traces of their language, in almost all the isles, and on all the coasts of the Mediterranean Sea. The most famous of their colonies was that of Carthage.

Herodotus says, 'The Phenicians were seated on the Red Sea, before they came to the Mediterranean, where they addicted themselves to navigation and commerce.' Justin also says, that 'the Tyrians were a people conducted by a chief named Phenix, who left their native land on account of the earthquakes to which it was subject. They first settled on the Assyrian lake, (sea of Tiberias); afterwards they settled on the shore of the Mediterranean, where they built a city, which, from the plenty of fish, they named Sidona.' Sacred Geography.

PHILADELPHIA, Φιλαδέλφια, signifies love of brothers, or fraternity. Philadelphia is a city of Lydia. When St. John wrote his Revelation, the angel or bishop of the church here was a very holy man. (Rev. iii. 7.) It received its name from Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamus. It is situated east of Sardis about twenty-eight miles, and became famous for its public games. It is now inhabited by the Turks, and by them called Alashakir, the Fair City, or, according to others, Allah-Shehr, the city of God, still retaining the form of a city, with something of trade to invite people to it, being the road of the Persian caravans; though the walls which encompass it are decayed in many places, and, according to the custom of the Turks, are wholly neglected. The situation of Philadelphia is on the rising of the mountain Tmolus, having a pleasant prospect on the plains beneath, well furnished with divers villages, and watered by the Pactolus.

Dr. Chandler says, 'the bishop of Philadelphia was absent, but the proto-papas, his substitute, whom we went to visit, received us at his palace, a title given to a very indifferent house, or rather a cottage of clay. We found him ignorant of the Greek tongue, and were forced to discourse with him, by an interpreter, in the Turkish language. He had no idea that Philadelphia existed before Christianity, but told us that it had become a city in consequence of the many religious foundations. The number of churches he reckoned at twenty-four, mostly in ruins, and mere masses of wall decorated with painted saints. Only six are in a better condition, and have their priests. The episcopal church is large, and ornamented with gilding, carving, and holy portraits. The Greeks are about three hundred families, and live in a friendly intercourse with the Turks, of whom they speak well. We were assured that the clergy and laity in general knew as little of Greek as the proto-papas; and yet the liturgies and offices of the church are read as elsewhere, and have undergone no alteration on that account.' Whatever may be lost of the spirit of Christianity, there is still the form of a Christian church in this city, which contains about a thousand Christians, chiefly Greeks, most of whom speak only the Turkish language. They have twenty-five places of public worship, five of which are large and regular churches, with a resident bishop and inferior clergy. Hartley's Visit to the Apocalyptic Churches, in Missionary Register, July 1827; Taylor's Sacred Geography; Wells's Geography of the Old and New Testament, vol. ii. p. 275.

PHILADELPHIA, the same as Rabbah, or Rabbath, the capital of the Ammonites. See RABBAH.

PHILADELPHIAN SOCIETY, a sect or society of the seventeenth century, so called from an English female, whose name was Jane Leadley. She embraced, it is said, the same views and the same kind of religion as Madam Bourignon. She was of opinion that all dissensions among Christians would cease, and the kingdom of the Redeemer become, even here below, a glorious scene of charity, concord, and felicity, if those who bear the name of Jesus, without regarding the forms of doctrine or discipline that distinguish particular communions, would all join in committing their souls to the care of the internal guide, to be instructed, governed, and formed, by his Divine impulse and suggestions. Nay, she went still farther, and declared in the name of the Lord, that this desirable event would actually come to pass, and that she had a Divine commission to proclaim the approach of this holy communion of saints, who were to be gathered together in one visible universal church, or kingdom, before the dissolution of this earthly globe. This prediction she delivered with a peculiar degree of confidence, from a notion that her Philadelphia Society was the true kingdom of Christ, in which alone the Divine Spirit resided and reigned. She believed, it is said, the doctrine of the final restoration of all intelligent beings to perfection and happiness. Mosheim's Eccles. History, vol. v. pp. 516, 517.

PHILE'MON, Φιλήμων, signifies that kisses, or is affectionate. Philemon was a rich citizen of Colosse in Phrygia. He was converted to the Christian faith, with Appia, his wife. Perhaps we should have known nothing of Philemon, had not it been on account of his slave Onesimus, who, having run away from him to Rome, there found St. Paul, and was very serviceable to him. St. Paul converted him, baptized him, and sent him back to his master Philemon, to whom he wrote a letter. Philemon had made a church of his house; and his domestics, as well as himself, were of the household of faith. His charity, liberality, and compassion, were a refuge to all in distress.

PHILE'TUS, Φιλητὸς, signifies amiable, or who is beloved. St. Paul writing to Timothy, (2 Tim. ii. 16, 17, 18.) a short time before his martyrdom, speaks of Hymenæus and Philetus, 'who concerning the truth have erred, saying that the resurrection is past already.'

PHILIP, Φίλιππος, signifies warlike, or a lover of horses. Philip, the apostle, was a native of Bethsaida, in Galilee. Jesus Christ invited him to follow him. (John i. 43, 44, &c.) Philip followed him; and soon after finding Nathanael, Philip said to him, 'We have found the Messiah.' Then he brought Nathanael to Jesus; and they were with him at the marriage of Cana in Galilee. Philip was called at the very beginning of our Saviour's mission, and about a year afterwards he was appointed an apostle. When our Saviour intended to feed five thousand men, he asked Philip, only to prove him, whence bread might be bought for such a multitude? Philip answered that two hundred pennyworth would not be sufficient for every one to take a little. (John vi. 5, 6, 7. Luke vi. 13. Matt. x. 2.) Some Gentiles, having a curiosity to see Jesus Christ, a little before his passion, addressed themselves to St. Philip, who mentioned it to St. Andrew, and these two together to Christ. (John xii. 20, 22.) At the last Supper, Philip asked our Saviour, that he would please to show them the Father, and that was all they desired. But Jesus answered them, that, seeing the Son, they saw the Father also. (John xiv. 8, 10.)

PHILIP, the second of the seven deacons, (Acts vi. 5.) was, they say, of Cæsarea in Palestine. It is certain his daughters lived in that city. (Acts xxi. 8, 9.) After the death of Stephen, all the Christians, except the apostles, having left Jerusalem, and being dispersed in several places, St. Philip went to preach at Sebaste, or Samaria, where he performed several miracles, and converted many persons. (Acts viii. 1, 2, 3, &c.) He baptized them; but informed the apostles at Jerusalem, that Samaria had received the word of God; that they might come and communicate the Holy Ghost to them. Peter and John came thither for that purpose. Philip was, probably, at Samaria, when an angel commanded him to go on the road that leads from Jerusalem to Old Gaza. Philip obeyed, and there met with an Ethiopian eunuch, belonging to Candace, queen of Ethiopia, whom he converted and baptized. (Acts viii. 26.) Being come out of the water, the Spirit of the Lord took away Philip, and the eunuch saw him no more.

PHILIPPI, Φίλιπποι, from Philip, was a city of Macedonia, and a Roman colony. (Acts xvi. 12, 13, &c.) St. Paul came to preach here, A.D. 51, and converted several people; among others Lydia, a seller of purple. He also cast out a pythonic spirit from a servant maid. Her master stirred up the whole city against Paul; and the magistrates caused him to be seized, whipped, and put in prison. But the day following they made excuses for their ill treatment.

The Philippians were always full of acknowledgment for the faith they had received from God, by the ministry of St. Paul. They assisted him on several occasions. (Philipp. iv. 16.) They sent him money while in Achaia; and being informed that he was a prisoner at Rome, they sent a deputation to him by Epaphroditus, their bishop, to be serviceable to him. (Philipp. iv. 12, 18.) Epaphroditus fell sick; and St. Paul, in order to deliver the Philippians from their concern, at the hearing of his sickness, sent Epaphroditus to them again, when he was recovered, and by him the epistle which we have remaining; in which he commends their liberality, and shows great acknowledgment for their readiness. 'It is a strong proof,' says Chrysostom, 'of the virtuous conduct of the Philippians, that they did not afford the apostle a single subject of complaint; for in the whole epistle, which he wrote to them, there is nothing but exhortation and encouragement, without the mixture of any censure whatever.' As the apostle tells the Philippians that he hoped to see them shortly, (Phil. ii. 24.) and there are plain intimations (Phil. i. 12.; ii. 26.) in the epistle of his having been some time at Rome, it is probable that it was written in the year 62, towards the end of his confinement. Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. i. pp. 411, 412.

PHILISTINES, פְּלִשְׁתִּים, Φυλιστιείμ, signifies scattered, as powder or dust; otherwise, opposite ruin, or double ruin, or the drink of ruin; or falling drinking. The Philistines were a people of Palestine, who came thither from the isle of Caphtor. See CAPHTOR.

The time of their coming to Palestine is unknown; but they had been long in Canaan, when Abraham came thither, in the year of the world 2083. The name Philistine is not Hebrew. The Septuagint generally translate it Ἀλλόφυλοι, strangers. The Pelethites and Cherethites were also Philistines; and the Septuagint sometimes translate Cherethim Κρήται, Cretes. The Philistines were a powerful people in Palestine, even in Abraham's time, since they had then kings, and considerable cities. They are not in the number of the nations devoted to extermination, and whose territory the Lord had abandoned to the Hebrews. They were not of the cursed seed of Canaan. However, Joshua did not forbear to give their land to the Hebrews, and to attack them by command from the Lord, because they possessed a country promised to Israel. But these conquests of Joshua must have been ill maintained, since, under the Judges, under Saul, and at the beginning of the reign of king David, the Philistines had their kings, and their lords, whom they called Sazanim; since their state was divided into five little kingdoms or satrapies, and since they oppressed the Israelites during the government of the high-priest Eli, and of Samuel, and during the reign of Saul, for about 120 years, from the year of the world 2848 to 2960. True it is, that Shamgar, Samson, Samuel, and Saul, opposed them, and killed some of their people, but did not reduce their power. They continued independent till David, who subdued them. (2 Sam. v. 17.; viii. 1, 2, &c.)

They continued in subjection to the kings of Judah down to the reign of Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat, about 246 years, from the year of the world 2960, when they were subdued by David, to the year of the world 3116, when they revolted from Jehoram. (2 Chron. xxi. 16.) Jehoram made war against them, and probably reduced them to his obedience again, because it is observed in Scripture, that they revolted again from Uzziah, who kept them to their duty during his whole reign. (2 Chron. xxvi. 6, 7.) Uzziah began to reign in 3194. During the unfortunate reign of Ahaz, the Philistines made great havoc in the territory of Judah; but his son and successor Hezekiah subdued them again. (2 Chron. xxviii. 18. 2 Kings xviii. 8.) Lastly, they regained their full liberty under the later kings of Judah; and we may see, by the menaces made against them by the prophets Isaiah, Amos, Zephaniah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, that they brought a thousand hardships and calamities on the children of Israel, for which God threatened to punish them with great misfortunes.

Esar-haddon, successor to Sennacherib, besieged Ashdod, or Azoth, and took it by the arms of his general Thasthan, or Tartan. Psammetichus, king of Egypt, took the same city after a siege of twenty-nine years, according to Herodotus. During the siege of Tyre, which held out thirteen years, Nebuchadnezzar used part of his army to subdue the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Egyptians, and other nations bordering on the Jews. There is great probability that the Philistines could not withstand him, but were reduced to his obedience, as well as the other people of Syria, Phenicia, and Palestine. Afterwards, they fell under the dominion of the Persians; then under that of Alexander the Great, who destroyed the city of Gaza, the only city of the Phenicians that dared to oppose him. After the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Asmoneans took by degrees several cities from the country of the Philistines, which they subjected. Tryphon, regent of the kingdom of Syria, gave to Jonathan, the Asmonean, the government of the whole coast of the Mediterranean, from Tyre to Egypt; consequently all the country of the Philistines.

PHINEHAS, פִּינְחָס, signifies aspect, or face of trust, or protection. Phinehas, or, as the Jews pronounce, Pinchas, was son of Eleazar, and grandson of Aaron. He was the third high-priest of the Jews, in the year of the world 2571, until towards the year of the world 2590. He is particularly commended in Scripture for zeal, in vindicating the glory of God when the Midianites had sent their daughters into the camp of Israel, to tempt the Hebrews to marry them, and commit idolatry. (Numb. xxv. 7.) Hence the Lord promised the priesthood to Phinehas by perpetual covenant, evidently including this tacit condition, that his children should continue faithful and obedient; for we know the priesthood passed out of the family of Eleazar and Phinehas, to that of Ithamar, and that it returned not to the posterity of Eleazar until after about one hundred and fifty years.

This dignity continued in the race of Phinehas, from Aaron down to the high-priest Eli, for about three hundred and thirty-five years. Aaron was appointed high-priest in the year of the world 2513. Eli was acknowledged high-priest and judge of Israel in 2848. The manner and causes of this change are unknown. It re-entered the family of Eleazar under the reign of Saul, who, having put to death Abimelech, and the other priests of Nob, gave the high-priesthood to Zadok, of the race of Phinehas. At the same time David had with him Abiathar, of the race of Eli, who performed the functions of high-priest. So that after the death of Saul, David continued the priesthood to Zadok and Abiathar conjunctly. But, towards the end of David's reign, Abiathar having espoused the interests of Adonijah to the prejudice of Solomon, he was disgraced, and Zadok only acknowledged as high-priest. The priesthood continued in his family until after the captivity of Babylon, and even to the destruction of the temple. From the beginning of Zadok's priesthood alone, and the exclusion of Abiathar, to the ruin of the temple, is 1084 years. Zadok was high-priest alone, and Abiathar disgraced, in the year of the world 2989. The temple was destroyed in the year of the world 4073.

We read also of another memorable and zealous action of Phinehas. (Josh. xxii. 30, 31.) When the Israelites beyond Jordan had raised upon the banks of the river a vast heap of earth, those on the other side fearing they were going to forsake the Lord, and to set up another religion, deputed Phinehas, and other chief men, to inform themselves of the reason for erecting this monument. When they found that it was only in commemoration of their union and common origin, Phinehas praised the Lord, saying, We now know that the Lord is with us, since you are not guilty of that prevarication of which we suspected you.

We do not exactly know the time of the death of Phinehas. But as he lived after Joshua, and before the servitude under Chushan-rishathaim, his death is placed in the year of the world 2590. Under his pontificate, the story of Micah happened (Judg. xvii.); also the conquest of Laish, by the tribe of Dan (Judg. xviii. 27.); and the enormity committed upon the wife of the Levite of Mount Ephraim. (Judg. xix.) Phinehas's successor was Abiezer, or Abihuah. (Judg. xx. 28.)

PHUT, פֹּחַד, signifies extension, augmentation of the family; the posterity of Phut, the son of Ham. (Gen. x. 6.) Calmet is of opinion, that Phut, the third son of Ham, peopled either the Canton of Ptemphu, Pthemphi, Ptembuti, of Pliny and Ptolemy, whose capital was Thara, in Lower Egypt, inclining towards Libya; or the Canton called Phthenotes, of which Buthas was the capital. The prophets often speak of Phut. In the time of Jeremiah, (Jerem. xlv. 9.) Phut was under the obedience of Necho, king of Egypt. Nahum (iii. 9.) reckons this people in the number of those who ought to come to the assistance of No-ammun, or Diospolis.

It is remarkable, that from Moses to the prophets in the days of Hezekiah, this people is not mentioned, except when describing the hired auxiliaries of the nations to whom their prophecies refer. It is absolutely incredible, says a late writer, that the Phut mentioned in Judith, as conquered by Holofernes, should have been situated in or near Mauritania. The Arabic versions, by Phut, understand a people in Southern Egypt, if not rather in Nubia. Sacred Geography.

PHYLACTERY, φυλακτήριον, signifies a preservative. This word is derived from the Greek, and properly denotes a preservative, such as the Pagans carried about them to preserve them from evils, diseases, or dangers: for example, they wore stones, or pieces of metal, engraved under certain aspects of the planets. The East is to this day filled with this superstition; and the men do not only wear phylacteries for themselves, but for their animals also. Jesus Christ in the Gospel says, The Scribes and Pharisees made broad their phylacteries, and enlarged the borders of their garments, (Matt. xxiii. 5.) as indicating their pretensions to a more studious and perfect observance of the law. These phylacteries consisted of four strips or scrolls of parchment, or the dressed skin of some clean animal, inscribed with four paragraphs of the law, taken from Exod. xiii. 1—10.; and xiii. 11—16. Deut. vi. 4—9.; and xi. 13—21. all inclusive; which the Pharisees, interpreting literally, (as do the modern Rabbins,) Deut. vi. 8. and other similar passages, tied to the fronts of their caps, and on their arms, and also inscribed on their door-posts. These phylacteries were regarded as amulets, or, at least, as efficacious in keeping off evil spirits; whence this Greek name φυλακτήρια, from φυλάττω, to guard or preserve. They founded this custom upon the following words (Exod. xiii. 9.): 'And it shall be for a sign upon thee upon thine hand, and for a memorial between thine eyes;' and (ibid. 16.) 'it shall be for a token upon thine hand, and for frontlets between thine eyes.'

This precept evidently refers to the whole law of Moses, and not to the particular sentences which they wrote in their phylacteries. The command of writing and binding this law as a sign upon the hands, and as frontlets betwixt the eyes, ought, doubtless, to be understood metaphorically, as a charge to remember it, to meditate upon it, to have it as it were continually before their eyes, and to conduct their lives by it; as when Solomon says, concerning the commandments of God, in general, 'Bind them about thy neck, write them upon the table of thine heart.' (Prov. iii. 1. 3.; vi. 21.) See FRONTLETS. Jennings's Jewish Antiquities, book i. chap. x.

PIETISTS, a religious sect that arose among the Protestants in Germany, in the latter end of the seventeenth century. Pietism was set on foot by the pious and learned Philip James Spener, who, by the private societies he formed at Frankfort, with a design to promote vital religion, roused the lukewarm from their indifference, and excited a spirit of vigour and resolution in those who had been satisfied to lament in silence the progress of impiety. The remarkable effect of these pious meetings was increased by a book which he published under the title of Pious Desires, in which he exhibited a striking view of the disorders of the church, and proposed the remedies that were proper to heal them. Many persons of good and upright intentions were highly pleased both with the proceedings and writings of Spener; and, indeed, the greatest part of those who had the cause of virtue and practical religion truly at heart, applauded the designs of this good man, though an apprehension of abuses restrained numbers from encouraging them openly. These abuses actually happened. The remedies proposed by Spener to heal the disorders of the church fell into unskilful hands, were administered without sagacity or prudence, and thus, in many cases, proved to be worse than the disease itself. Hence, complaints arose against these institutions of Pietism, as if, under a striking appearance of sanctity, they led the people into false notions of religion, and fomented, in those who were of a turbulent and violent character, the seeds and principles of mutiny and sedition.

These first complaints would have been undoubtedly hushed, and the tumults they occasioned would have gradually subsided, had not the contests that arose at Leipsic, in the year 1689, added fuel to the flame. Certain pious and learned professors of philosophy, and particularly Franckius, Schadius, and Paulus Antonius, the disciples of Spener, who at that time was ecclesiastical superintendent of the court of Saxony, began to consider with attention the defects that prevailed in the ordinary method of instructing the candidates for the ministry; and this review persuaded them of the necessity of using their best endeavours to supply what was deficient, and to correct what was amiss. For this purpose they undertook to explain in their colleges certain books of Scripture, in order to render these genuine sources of religious knowledge better understood, and to promote a spirit of practical piety and vital religion in the minds of their hearers. The novelty of this method drew attention, and rendered it singularly pleasing to many; accordingly, these lectures were much frequented, and their effects were visible in the lives and conversations of several persons, whom they seemed to inspire with a deep sense of the importance of religion and virtue. Whether these first effusions of religious fervour, which were in themselves most certainly laudable, were always kept within the strict bounds of reason and discretion, is a question not easily decided. If we are to believe the report of common fame, and the testimonies of several persons of great weight, this was by no means the case; and many things were both said and done in these Biblical Colleges (as they were called) which, though they might be looked upon by equitable and candid judges, as worthy of toleration and indulgence, were, nevertheless, contrary to custom, and far from being consistent with prudence. Hence, rumours were spread, tumults excited, animosities kindled, and the matter was at length brought to a public trial, in which the pious and learned men above mentioned were, indeed, declared free from the errors and heresies that had been laid to their charge, but were, at the same time, prohibited from carrying on the plan of religious instruction they had undertaken with such zeal. It was during these troubles and divisions, that the invidious denomination of Pietists was first invented; it may, at least, be affirmed, that it was not commonly known before this period. It was at first applied by some giddy and inconsiderate persons to those who frequented the Biblical Colleges, and lived in a manner suitable to the instructions and exhortations that were addressed to them in those seminaries of piety. It was afterwards used to characterize all who were either distinguished by the excessive austerity of their manners, or who, regardless of truth and opinion, were only intent upon practice, and turned the whole vigour of their efforts towards the attainment of religious feelings and habits. But as it is the fate of all those denominations by which peculiar sects are distinguished, to be variously and often very improperly applied, so the title of Pietist was frequently given, in common conversation, to persons of eminent wisdom and sanctity, who were equally remarkable for their adherence to truth, and their love of piety; and, not seldom, to persons whose motley characters exhibited an enormous mixture of profligacy and enthusiasm, and who deserved the title of delirious fanatics rather than any other denomination.

This contest was by no means confined to Leipsic, but diffused its contagion, with incredible celerity, through all the Lutheran churches in the different states and kingdoms of Europe. For, from this time, in all the cities, towns, and villages, where Lutheranism was professed, there suddenly started up persons of various ranks and professions, of both sexes, learned and illiterate, who declared that they were called by a divine impulse to pull up iniquity by the root, to restore to its primitive lustre, and propagate throughout the world, the declining cause of piety and virtue, to govern the church of Christ by wiser rules than those by which it was at present directed; and who, partly in their writings, and partly in their private and public discourses, pointed out the means and measures that were necessary to bring about this important revolution. All those, who were struck with this imaginary impulse, unanimously agreed, that nothing could have a more powerful tendency to propagate among the multitude solid knowledge, pious feelings, and holy habits, than the private meetings which had been first contrived by Spener, and were afterwards introduced into Leipsic. Several religious assemblies were accordingly formed in various places, which, though they differed in some circumstances, and were not all composed and conducted with equal wisdom, piety, and prudence, were yet intended to promote the same general purpose. In the mean time, these unusual, irregular, and tumultuous proceedings, filled with uneasy and alarming apprehensions both those who were entrusted with the government of the church, and those who sat at the helm of the state. These apprehensions were justified by this important consideration, that the pious and well-meaning persons who composed these assemblies had indiscreetly admitted into their community a number of extravagant and hot-headed fanatics, who foretold the approaching destruction of Babel (by which they meant the Lutheran church,) terrified the populace with fictitious visions, assumed the authority of prophets honoured with a divine commission, obscured the sublime truths of religion by a gloomy kind of jargon of their own invention, and revived doctrines that had long before been condemned by the church. These enthusiasts also asserted, that the millennium, or thousand years' reign of the saints on earth, mentioned by St. John, was near at hand. They endeavoured to overturn the wisest establishments, and to destroy the best institutions; and desired that the power of preaching, and administering public instruction, might be given promiscuously to all sorts of persons. Thus was the Lutheran church torn asunder in the most deplorable manner, while the votaries of Rome stood by, and beheld with a secret satisfaction these unhappy divisions. The most violent debates arose in all the Lutheran churches, and persons whose differences were occasioned rather by mere words, and questions of little consequence, than by any doctrines or institutions of considerable importance, attacked one another with the bitterest animosity; and, in many countries, severe laws were at length enacted against the Pietists.

These revivers of piety were of two kinds, who, by their different manner of proceeding, deserve to be placed in two distinct classes. One sect of these practical reformers proposed to carry on their plan without introducing any change into the doctrine, discipline, or form of government, established in the Lutheran church. The other maintained, on the contrary, that it was impossible to promote the progress of real piety among the Lutherans, without making considerable alterations in their doctrine, and changing the whole form of their ecclesiastical discipline and polity. The former had at their head the learned and pious Spener, who, in the year 1691, removed from Dresden to Berlin, and whose sentiments were adopted by the professors of the new University at Halle, and particularly by Franckius and Paulus Antonius, who had been invited thither from Leipsic, where they began to be suspected of Pietism. Though few pretended to treat either with indignation or contempt the intentions and purpose of these good men (which, indeed, no one could despise without affecting to appear the enemy of practical religion and virtue) yet many eminent divines, and more especially the professors and pastors of Wittenberg, were of opinion, that, in the execution of this laudable purpose, several maxims were adopted, and certain measures employed, that were prejudicial to the truth, and also detrimental to the interests of the church. Hence they thought themselves obliged to proceed publicly, first against Spener, in the year 1695, and afterwards against his disciples and adherents, as the inventors and promoters of erroneous and dangerous opinions. These debates are of recent date; so that those who are desirous of knowing more particularly how far the principles of equity, moderation, and candour, influenced the conduct, and directed the proceedings of the contending parties, may easily receive satisfactory information.

These debates turned upon a variety of points; and therefore the matter of them cannot be comprehended under any one general head. If we consider them, indeed, in relation to their origin, and the circumstances that gave rise to them, we shall be able to reduce them to some fixed principles. It is well known, that those who had the advancement of piety most zealously at heart, entertained a notion that no order of men contributed more to retard its progress than the clergy, whose peculiar vocation it was to inculcate and promote it.

While they considered this as the root of the evil, it was natural that their plans of reformation should begin here; and, accordingly, they laid it down as an essential principle, that none should be admitted into the ministry, except such as had received a proper education, were distinguished by their wisdom and sanctity of manners, and had hearts filled with divine love. Hence, they proposed, in the first place, a thorough reformation of the schools of divinity; and they explained clearly enough what they meant by this reformation, which consisted in the following points: That the systematical theology, which reigned in the colleges, and was composed of intricate and disputable doctrines, and obscure and unusual forms of expression, should be totally abolished; that polemical divinity, which comprehended the controversies subsisting between Christians of different communions, should be less eagerly studied, and less frequently treated, though not entirely neglected; that all mixture of philosophy and human learning with Divine wisdom was to be most carefully avoided; that, on the contrary, all those who were designed for the ministry should be accustomed, from their early youth, to the perusal and study of the holy Scriptures; that they should be instructed in a plain system of theology, drawn from these unerring sources of truth, and that the whole course of their education was to be so directed, as to render them useful in life, by the practical power of their doctrine, and the commanding influence of their example. As these maxims were propagated with the greatest industry and zeal, and were explained inadvertently by some, without those restrictions which prudence seemed to require; these professed patrons and revivers of piety were suspected of designs that could not but render them obnoxious to censure. They were supposed to despise philosophy and learning; to treat with indifference, and even to renounce, all inquiries into the nature and foundations of religious truth; to disapprove the zeal and labours of those who defended it against such as corrupted or opposed it; and to place the whole of their theology in certain vague and incoherent declamations concerning the duties of morality. Hence arose those famous disputes concerning the use of philosophy and the value of human learning considered in connexion with the interests of religion, the dignity and usefulness of systematic theology, the necessity of polemic divinity, the excellence of the mystic system, and also concerning the true method of instructing the people.

The second great object that employed the zeal and attention of the persons now under consideration, was, that the candidates for the ministry should not only, for the future, receive such an academical education as would tend rather to solid utility than to mere speculation, but also that they should dedicate themselves to God in a peculiar manner, and exhibit the most striking examples of piety and virtue. This maxim, which, when considered in itself, must be acknowledged to be highly laudable, not only gave occasion to several new regulations, calculated to restrain the passions of the studious youth, to inspire them with pious sentiments, and to excite in them holy resolutions; but also produced another maxim, which was a lasting source of controversy and debate, namely, 'that no person, who was not himself a model of piety and divine love, was qualified to be a public teacher of piety, or a guide to others in the way of salvation.' This opinion was considered by many as derogatory from the power and efficacy of the word of God, which cannot be deprived of its divine influence by the vices of its ministers; and as a sort of revival of the long-exploded errors of the Donatists; and what rendered it peculiarly liable to an interpretation of this nature was the imprudence of some Pietists, who inculcated it without those restrictions that were necessary to render it unexceptionable. Hence arose endless and intricate debates concerning the following questions: 'whether the religious knowledge acquired by a wicked man can be termed theology? whether a vicious person can, in effect, obtain true knowledge of religion?' 'how far the office and ministry of an impious ecclesiastic can be pronounced salutary and efficacious?'—'whether a licentious and ungodly man can be susceptible of illumination?' and other questions of a like nature.

These revivers of declining piety went yet farther. In order to render the ministry of their pastors as successful as possible, in rousing men from their indolence, and in stemming the torrent of corruption and immorality, they judged two things indispensably necessary. The first was to suppress entirely, in the course of public instruction, and more especially in that delivered from the pulpit, certain maxims and phrases which the corruption of men leads them frequently to interpret in a manner favourable to the indulgence of their passions. Such, in the judgment of the Pietists, were the following propositions: 'No man is able to attain that perfection which the divine law requires: good works are not necessary to salvation: in the act of justification, on the part of man, faith alone is concerned, without good works.' Many, however, were apprehensive, that, by the suppression of these propositions, truth itself must suffer deeply; and that the Christian religion, deprived thus of its peculiar doctrines, would be exposed, naked and defenceless, to the attacks of its adversaries. The second step they took, in order to give efficacy to their plans of reformation, was to form new rules of life and manners, much more rigorous and austere than those which had been formerly practised; and to place in the class of sinful and unlawful gratifications several kinds of pleasure and amusement, which had hitherto been looked upon as innocent in themselves, and which could only become good or evil, in consequence of the respective characters of those who used them with prudence, or abused them with intemperance. Thus, dancing, public sports, pantomimes, theatrical diversions, the reading of humorous and comical books, with several other kinds of pleasure and entertainment, were prohibited by the Pietists, as unlawful and unseemly, and, therefore, by no means of an indifferent nature. Many, however, thought this rule of moral discipline far too rigid and severe; and thus was revived the ancient contest of the schoolmen, concerning the famous question, whether any human actions are truly indifferent? that is, equally removed from moral good on the one hand, and from moral evil on the other; and whether, on the contrary, it be not true, that all actions whatever must be either considered as good or as evil? The discussion of this question was attended with a variety of debates upon the several points of the prohibition now mentioned; and these debates were often carried on with animosity and bitterness, and very rarely with that precision, temper, and judgment, which the nicety of the matters in dispute required. The third point, on which the Pietists insisted, was, that besides the stated meetings for public worship, private assemblies should be holden for prayer and other religious exercises. But many were of opinion, that the cause of true piety and virtue was rather endangered than promoted by these assemblies; and experience and observation seemed to confirm this opinion. It would be both endless and unnecessary to enumerate all the little disputes that arose from the appointment of these private assemblies, and, in general, from the notions entertained, and the measures pursued, by the Pietists. It is, nevertheless, proper to observe, that the lenity and indulgence shown by these people to persons whose opinions were erroneous, and whose errors were by no means of an indifferent nature, irritated their adversaries to a very high degree, and made many suspect that the Pietists laid a much greater stress upon practice than upon belief, and that, separating what ought ever to be inseparably joined, they held virtuous manners in higher esteem than religious truth. Amidst the prodigious numbers that appeared in these controversies, it was not at all surprising, if the variety of their characters, capacities, and views, be duly considered, that some were chargeable with imprudence, others with intemperate zeal, and that many, to avoid what they looked upon as unlawful, fell injudiciously into the opposite extreme.

The other class of Pietists already mentioned, whose reforming views extended so far, as to change the system of doctrine, and the form of ecclesiastical government, established in the Lutheran church, comprehended persons of various characters and different ways of thinking. Some of them were totally destitute of reason and judgment; their errors were the reveries of a disordered brain; and they were rather to be considered as lunatics than as heretics. Others were less extravagant, and tempered the singular notions, which they had derived from reading or meditation, with a certain mixture of the important truths and doctrines of religion. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. v. pp. 313—325, edit. 1811.

PIETY consists in a firm belief and in right conceptions of the being, perfections, and providence of God; with suitable affections to him; resemblance of his moral perfections, and a constant obedience to his will. In the opinion of men of the world, piety, or religion, is by no means necessary to form a good, a virtuous, or a worthy character. According to their sentiments, a man may possess every virtue that can adorn human nature, though wholly void of religion, and a total stranger to devotion, or the exercise of the pious affections. The importance of what are called the moral virtues they do not deny. These they allow to be essentially necessary to the peace, the comfort, and the happiness of society. They are sensible that if these were banished from the world, mankind would degenerate into savages, nay into fiends, and become absolutely odious and intolerable to each other. But they see no necessary connexion betwixt piety and the moral virtues. These, they think, may take place and flourish, where the other is wholly wanting.

But a very little consideration might convince them, that this notion is as false and absurd as it is irreligious. A very little consideration might convince them, that, if good principles be essentially necessary to form a truly virtuous character, a mind destitute of piety can no more possess true virtue and moral excellence, than thorns can produce figs, or thistles grapes. Religious principles alone can kill the seeds of vice in the heart, and produce the fruits of true goodness. A semblance of virtue and goodness there may be, and often is, where there is no piety, no sense of religion. A man's external conduct may, upon the whole, be unexceptionable, and often praiseworthy, whilst he is an utter stranger to every pious sentiment and affection. But all this is only an unprincipled kind of virtue, and, however it may be applauded among men, is, in the sight of God, lightly esteemed. A principle of true religion implanted in the heart by the Divine Spirit, is the only root from which genuine virtue and true unaffected goodness can spring. 'A good man,' that is, a man of good principles and unfeigned piety, 'out of the good treasure of his heart, bringeth forth that which is good; and an evil man, out of the evil treasure of his heart, bringeth forth that which is evil.'

The pious man who can look up to God as his Father in heaven, who orders his lot, appoints every affliction that befalls him, and overrules the most grievous dispensations of Providence for his good, has a prop to support him under the heavy pressure of calamity. He has a balm which can soothe the anguish of a wounded spirit. He has a cup of consolation which the world cannot give nor take away. Relying upon the unerring wisdom and infinite goodness of that Providence which overrules every thing concerning him, and without which not a hair of his head can fall to the ground; and looking forward to that happy termination of all his sorrows and sufferings, which the Gospel of Christ promises to the pious, he can be patient in tribulation. But is it thus with the man who is destitute of piety and religious principles? When the calamities of life overtake him, when ills past reckoning compass him around, can he possess his soul in patience? Alas! what is there to preserve the tranquillity of his mind? Having no trust in God, no dependence on his Providence, no hope of future happiness, what is there to give him rational comfort in the time of distress? Must he not either become a prey to sorrow, or endeavour to steel his mind by stoical principles? Suppose he acts the part of a Stoic. Is this stoical patience to be compared with the patience which I just now represented as the effect of genuine piety? Is it any thing else than an insensibility of mind, which, instead of being virtuous, destroys all the feelings which are essentially necessary to true virtue and real inward goodness?

When the man whose mind is under the full influence of religion is called to encounter danger, he knows that he is not left to himself; but, that either the providence of God will assist and protect him, or that if he should lose his life in the cause, he does not lose his all, as his chief happiness is secure, and the end of his mortal life upon earth will be the beginning of an eternal life in the kingdom of heaven. Animated by this well-grounded hope, he is collected, bold, and intrepid, in the midst of dangers. How many instances of the most heroic fortitude do we find in the history of the prophets, and apostles, and other eminent servants of God! With what firmness and constancy did they adhere to their duty, and to the cause of truth and righteousness, in the midst of perils, and in the views of torture and death! Upon perusing their history, well may we adopt the words of Solomon, 'The righteous are bold as a lion.'

The views which the pious Christian has of his relation to all mankind as his brethren, as children of the same heavenly Father, as disciples of the same Saviour, and as fellow-travellers to the same eternal world, cannot but tend to dilate his heart with sentiments of benevolence towards the whole human race. The very spirit of Christianity is a spirit of love. Justly did the apostle speak of faith (that is, of religious principles) as working by love; for it is impossible for a man who truly believes the Gospel, and feels the influence of its truths, not to be humane and charitable, tender-hearted and benevolent.

The views which the pious man has of his own unworthiness and of his need of forgiveness from heaven, and the representation which the Gospel gives of the willingness of the Father of mercies to pardon his numberless transgressions, make him ashamed to harbour sentiments of malice and revenge against those who have offended him. What! saith the pious Christian, is the Almighty willing to pardon my past offences which are past reckoning? Did the Saviour offer up himself a sacrifice without spot unto God, that he might take away the sin of the world? And shall I refuse to forgive any of my brethren who have offended me? God forbid! I will heartily forgive my bitterest enemies, and pray that God may forgive them. Such are the sentiments which pious principles do naturally infuse into the heart. But are these the sentiments of men destitute of piety? Can they forgive their enemies? Can they bless those who curse them? Can they do good to those who hate them? On the contrary, must they not be unforgiving, malicious, and revengeful? Is not this the general character of men void of pious principles?

Hence it appears, that to attempt to promote the interest of virtue in the world, and to gain the hearts of mankind to a love of true goodness, without endeavouring to impress their minds with a reverence for God and religion, is to labour in vain. A plan of morality unconnected with religion, will never succeed. It may appear plausible in theory; but it cannot be reduced to practice. To attempt to reform the minds and lives of men, and to give virtue a footing in the world, without the aid of religion and pious principles, is to attempt to rear a fabric in the air, or, as our Lord speaks, to build a house on the sand. This should be seriously considered by all teachers of religion. It likewise demands the serious consideration of all who are entrusted with the education of youth, and of all parents who wish to train their children to true virtue, and to form their minds to a love of goodness. If they wish to see their children confirmed in virtuous sentiments, let them be careful to teach them, in the days of their youth, to remember their Creator, and him who redeemed them. Pious principles will naturally produce virtuous sentiments and virtuous practice; whilst a contempt of religion shall assuredly be productive of base principles and immoral conduct. A good tree will yield good fruit; and a corrupt tree must yield corrupt fruit. Dr. Hood's Sermons, Sermon iv.

PI-HAHIR'OTH, פִּי-הִירוֹת, signifies the mouth, or the pass, of Hiroth, or, the opening of liberty; otherwise, mouth engraved. The Hebrews, departing from Succoth, came to Etham. (Exod. xiii. 20.) Then the Lord said to Moses, (Exod. xiv. 2.) 'Speak unto the children of Israel, that they turn and encamp before Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, over against Baal-zephon: before it shall ye encamp by the sea.' Pi-hahiroth may be explained by the pass of Hiroth, or the mouth of Hiroth. Moses (Numb. xxxiii. 8.) calls it simply Hiroth in the Hebrew; and also Eusebius and Jerome. The Syriac version has it, over against the ditches. The Septuagint (Exod. xiv. 2.) translate it over against the village; others over against the pass of liberty, or the pass of drought. Calmet is of opinion, that Hiroth is the city Heroum, or Heroopolis, situated at the extremity, or point of the Red Sea; or else the city of Phagroriopopolis, placed by Strabo about the same place, and the capital of the canton of Phagroriopopolis. He thinks there is great probability, that Pi-hahiroth stands for the pass which was near Heroum. Beyond this pass the Hebrews went to encamp at the Red Sea.

A late writer observes, that the word hiroth has usually been taken as a proper name; yet Dr. Shaw very justly renders it 'the gullet,' though he did not perceive its direct application: Piis the mouth, he of, that is, the mouth of the gullet. 'Encamp in the face (in front) of the mouth of the gullet, between Migdol (the tower) and the sea.' He supposes Baal-zephon to be Suez; and the encamping from Baal-zephon to the sea, from Suez towards the west, along the head of the sea-shore. Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary of the Holy Bible, No. xxxix. pp. 68, 69.

PILATE, Πιλάτος, signifies armed with a dart. The family or country of Pilate, or Pontius Pilate, is not known; but it is believed he was of Rome, or at least of Italy. He was sent to govern Judea in the room of Gratus, A.D. 26 or 27. He governed this province ten years, from the twelfth or thirteenth year of Tiberius, to his twenty-second or twenty-third year. He was a man of impetuous and obstinate temper, who disturbed the repose of Judea, and gave occasion to the troubles and revolt that followed.

St. Luke (xii. 1, 2, &c.) acquaints us, that Pilate had mingled the blood of some Galileans with their sacrifices; and that the matter having been related to Jesus Christ, he said, Think you that these Galileans were greater sinners than other Galileans, because they suffered this calamity? No, I assure you. And if you do not repent, you shall all perish in like manner. It is unknown on what occasion Pilate caused these Galileans to be slain in the temple, while they were sacrificing; for this is the meaning of that expression, mingling their blood with their sacrifices. Some think they were disciples of Judas Gaulonites, who taught that the Jews ought not to pay tribute to foreign princes; and that Pilate had put some of them to death, even in the temple: but there is no proof of this. Others think, that these Galileans were Samaritans, whom Pilate cut to pieces in the village of Tirataba, as they were preparing to go up to Mount Gerizim, where a certain impostor had promised to discover treasures to them. But this event did not happen before A.D. 35, consequently two years after the death of Jesus Christ.

At the time of our Saviour's passion, Pilate made some endeavours to deliver him from the Jews. He knew they pursued his life only out of malice and envy. His wife also, who had been disturbed with dreams, sent and desired him not to meddle with the affair of that just person. He attempted to appease the Jews, and to give them some satisfaction, by whipping Jesus Christ. He tried to take him out of their hands, by proposing to deliver him or Barabbas, on the day of the festival of the passover. He wanted to discharge himself from pronouncing judgment against him, by sending him to Herod, king of Galilee. When he saw all this would not satisfy the Jews, and that they even threatened him, saying, he would be no friend to the emperor, if he let Jesus go; he caused water to be brought, washed his hands before all the people, and publicly declared himself innocent of the blood of that just person. Yet at the same time he delivered him up to his soldiers, that they might crucify him. This was enough to justify Jesus Christ, and to show that Pilate held him innocent; but it was not enough to vindicate the conscience and integrity of a judge, whose duty it was, as well to assert the cause of oppressed innocence, as to punish the guilty criminal. He ordered to be put over our Saviour's cross, as it were an abstract of his sentence, and the motive of his condemnation, 'Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews;' written in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. Some of the Jews remonstrated to Pilate, that he ought to have written, 'Jesus of Nazareth, who pretended to be King of the Jews.' But Pilate gave them a peremptory answer,

What he had written, he had written. Towards evening he was applied to, for leave to take down the bodies from the cross, that they might not continue there the following day, which was the passover and the Sabbath-day. This he allowed, and also granted the body of Jesus to Joseph of Arimathea, that he might pay his last duties to it. When the priests came to desire him to set a watch about the sepulchre, lest the disciples should steal Jesus away by night, he answered, They had a guard, and might place it there themselves. This is the substance of what the Gospels tell us concerning Pilate.

Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Eusebius, and after them several others, ancients and moderns, assure us, that it was the custom for Roman magistrates to send to the emperor copies of all verbal processes and judicial acts, which they passed in their several provinces. Pilate, in compliance with this custom, having written to Tiberius what had occurred relating to Jesus, the emperor wrote an account of it to the senate, in a manner which gave reason to judge, that he thought favourably of the person of Jesus, and that he was willing they should decree divine honours to him. But the senate was not of this opinion, and so the matter dropped. It appears by what Justin says of these acts, that the miracles of Jesus Christ were there mentioned, and even that the soldiers had divided his garments among them. Eusebius insinuates, that they spoke of his resurrection and ascension. Tertullian and Justin refer to these acts with so much confidence, as would make one believe they had had them in their hands. However, neither Eusebius nor Jerome, who were both inquisitive and understanding persons, nor any other author who wrote afterwards, seems to have seen them; at least not the true and original acts. For as to what we have now in great number, they are not authentic, being neither ancient nor uniform. See ACTS OF PILATE.

Pilate, having greatly disturbed the peace of Judea by his cruelty and rapine, was deposed by Vitellius, the proconsul of Syria, who ordered him to Rome, to give an account of his conduct to Tiberius. Pilate quitted the government of Judea, A.D. 36, in the twenty-third year of Tiberius. This emperor was dead before Pilate arrived at Rome. The particulars of what afterwards happened to this governor are unknown; but it is said, that he was banished by Caligula to Vienne in Dauphiné, where he was reduced to such extremity, that in despair he killed himself with his own sword.

PILGRIM, denotes one who is going forward to visit a holy place, with a design of paying his most solemn devotions there. If pilgrimages are as ancient as the days of Jacob, this gives a very expressive sense to the words of the good old man, who calls the years of his life 'the days of his pilgrimage;' and it is perfectly consistent with the apostle's observation, that the ancient patriarchs 'confessed they were strangers and pilgrims on earth.' (Heb. xi. 13.)

Pilgrimages began to be made about the middle ages of the church. They were, however, most in vogue after the end of the eleventh century, when every one was for visiting places of devotion, not excepting kings and princes; and even bishops made no difficulty of being absent from their churches on the same account. The places most visited were Jerusalem, Rome, Tours, and Compostella. The Mahometans place a great part of their religion in pilgrimage. Mecca is the grand place to which they go; and this pilgrimage is so necessary a point of practice, that, according to a tradition of Mahomet, he who dies without performing it may as well die a Jew or a Christian; and the same is expressly commanded in the Koran. To the Caaba, or sacred temple at Mecca, every Mahometan, who has health and means sufficient, ought once, at least, in his life-time to go on pilgrimage: nor are women excused from the performance of this duty; and all they who have performed it are confident that they are absolved from all sin, and sure of being rewarded with the joys of Paradise. The pilgrims 'set out from Constantinople in a caravan in the month of May, and repair to Damascus, where they join the other pilgrims from Natolia and Asia. Afterwards, they unite with those that come from Persia, and from Egypt, and other parts of the Ottoman empire. The whole number commonly amounts to 60,000,' who are obliged to be at Mecca by the beginning of the month Dhul-hajja, which is peculiarly set apart for the celebration of this solemnity. Hence devotion has established an annual fair at Mecca, which has long become a place of traffic, to which the pious Mussulman carries the merchandise of his country, and returns home with the richest goods of other places.

'Pilgrimage,' says Dr. Johnson, 'like many other acts of piety, may be reasonable or superstitious, according to the principles upon which it is performed. Long journeys in search of truth are not commanded: truth, such as is necessary to the regulation of life, is always found where it is honestly sought; change of place is no natural cause of the increase of piety, for it inevitably produces dissipation of mind. Yet, since men go every day to view the fields where great actions have been performed, and return with stronger impressions of the event, curiosity of the same kind may naturally dispose us to view that country whence our religion had its beginning. That the Supreme Being may be more easily propiti-ated in one place than in another, is the dream of idle superstition; but that some places may operate upon our minds in an uncommon manner, is an opinion which hourly experience will justify. He, who supposes that his vices may be more successfully combated in Palestine, will, perhaps, find himself mistaken; yet he may go thither without folly; he, who thinks they will be more freely pardoned, dishonours at once his reason and his religion.' Johnson's Rasselas; Sale's Koran, Prelim. Discourse; Additions to Calmet's Dictionary; Broughton's Histor. Dict. vol. ii. p. 250.

PILLAR. A pillar of cloud, a pillar of fire, a pillar of smoke, signifying a cloud, a fire, a smoke, which rises up toward heaven in the form of an irregular column. The pillars of heaven, (Job xxvi. 11.) the pillars of the earth, (Job ix. 6. Psal. lxxv. 3.) are metaphorical expressions, which suppose the heavens and the earth to be as an edifice, raised by the hand of God, and founded on its basis.

PINE, tidaher, a tree so called from the springiness or elasticity of its wood, says Parkhurst. This would lead us to consider the tidaher, as the yew. One of the kinds of oak, which is most famous for bearing the galls produced by means of the puncture of insects, has authorities in its favour. Luther thought it was the elm, which is a lofty and spreading tree. Scripture Illustrated, Expos. Index, p. 173.

PINNACLE OF THE TEMPLE. When the devil had tempted Jesus in the desert, (Matt. iv. 5.) 'he taketh him up into the holy city, and setteth him on a pinnacle of the temple; and saith unto him, If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down,' &c. There is no need, says a late writer, for attributing to the devil any power of conveying our Lord's body through the air; or by any other preternatural manner bringing him to the holy city. If we suppose that our Lord visited Jerusalem now, as he might have done at other times, we shall then find it advisable to inquire in what part of the temple he was placed on this occasion. To answer this, observe, that his station could not be on the roof of the temple, because that was full of spikes, and was not flat, but shelving; nor could it well be on the top of either wing, on each side of that sacred building. To understand this history, observe, that ἱερὸν rendered temple, signifies not only the holy house itself, but its courts, and the galleries round it; the whole structure: that the word πτερυγιον, signifies an appendage to a building, a wing. Parkhurst takes it for a portico, 'the king's portico,' which was built parallel to the south front of the temple. Scheuzer repeats three notions of this wing: 1. That of the roof of the holy house; this he discards. 2. That of a throne, or exalted edifice, for the king to sit in at worship. 3. A tribune of wood erected every seven years in the court of the women, from whence the king read the law to the people. This conjecture would be one of the most probable, if it could be proved that the time of the temptation of Jesus Christ coincided with one of these festivals.

Hence the word wing, unhappily rendered pinnacle, may be taken, perhaps, for a balcony, portico, or projection from one of the galleries which surrounded the temple court. It may be inferred, there was a projection in one of the galleries around the temple, whence a person could be well heard below; and that the leaping down from thence, to which the devil tempted Jesus, was not absolute suicide. Scripture Illustrated, Expos. Index, pp. 196, 197.

PIS/GAH, פיסגה, signifies the high hill; the name of a mountain beyond Jordan, in the country of Moab. The mountains Nebo, Pisgah, and Abarim, form only one chain, near Mount Peor, over-against Jericho, on the road from Livias to Heshbon.

In the Hebrew text, (Deut. xxxiv. 1—3.) the prospect enjoyed by Moses from Pisgah, reaches from Dan, north, to Zoar, south; but in the Samaritan Pentateuch it is much more extensive: 'all the land from the river of Egypt, to the river, the great river Euphrates, to the utmost sea.' This was the extent of Solomon's dominions, and the utmost bounds of the royal power of the kings of the Israelites. But there is another use which may be made of this passage, not without its importance. Could this whole district be seen from any other mountain than Pisgah? Was this the same extent as was shown by the tempter to our Lord, when rousing him to ambition? 'All this, the utmost bounds that ever were enjoyed by the ancient kings of thy nation, from whom thou art descended; all the whole kingdom and dominion of thine ancestors, will I give thee, if,' &c. This may account for the term used by St. Luke, rendered in our version, 'all the world.' Sacred Geography.

PISIDIA, Πισιδία, signifies pitch, pitchy. It was a province of Asia Minor, having Lycaonia north, Pamphylia south, Cilicia and Cappadocia east, and the province of Asia west. St. Paul preached at Antioch of Pisidia. (Acts xiii. 14.)

PISON, פישן, signifies change of mouth, or multitude, or extension. Pison, or Phison, was one of the four great rivers that watered Paradise. Calmet takes it to be the Phasis, a famous river of Colchis; Lakemacher, the Jordan; and some, a great river of India. See PARADISE.

PI'THOM, פתם, signifies their blowing; otherwise, consummation of the mouth; otherwise, their persuasion, or, dilatation, or, gift of the mouth. Pithom was one of the cities that the children of Israel built for Pharaoh in Egypt, during their servitude. (Exod. i.

11.) This is, probably, the same as Pithomos mentioned by Herodotus, which he places on the canal made by the kings Necho and Darius to join the Red Sea with the Nile. We find, also, in the ancient geographers, Strabo, Ptolemy, Pliny, &c., that there was an arm of the Nile called Pathmeticus, Phatmicus, Phatnicus, or Phatniticus. Bochart says, that Pithom and Ramesses are about five leagues above the division of the Nile, and beyond this river: but this assertion has no proof from antiquity. Marsham will have Pithom to be the same as Pelusium or Damietta.

PLATONICS, or PLATONISTS. The simple and majestic fabric reared by Christ and his apostles was, in some degree, undermined in its foundation by the prevalence of an opinion which was disseminated in the second century, that the whole duties of religion were not equally incumbent upon all, but that a sublimer degree of virtue was to be pursued and attained by those who in solitude and contemplation aspired to an intimate communion with the Supreme Being, whilst inferior attainments were sufficient for men who were engaged in the active employments of life. In consequence of this absurd opinion, the moral doctrines of Christianity were divided into precepts and counsels, the former of which distinguishes those laws which are of universal obligation, and the latter, those which relate to the conduct of Christians of superior merit and sanctity. These opinions were propagated with great reputation, towards the close of the second century, by Ammonius Saccas, who taught in the school at Alexandria, and was a professed follower of the Platonic philosophy. This philosophy took its rise, not from the doctrines of Plato, but from the belief of its professors, that the sentiments of Plato respecting the Deity and the invisible world were much more sublime and rational than those of the other philosophers. They professed to search after truth alone, and were disposed to adopt, from every system and sect, such tenets as they thought most conformable to it. Hence they were called Eclectics.

Ammonius maintained not merely with the primitive Eclectics, that truth and falsehood were blended in the opinions of every sect, but that the great principles of all truth, whether philosophical or religious, were equally discoverable in all sects; and that the only difference between them consisted in a different mode of expression, and in some points of little or no importance. By a proper interpretation of these sentiments, he contended that all sects, whether philosophical, or religious, might easily coalesce in this universal philosophy, which, however then perverted, was the great source of all the religious opinions that prevailed, in the world; but that, in order to this, the fables of the priests were to be removed from Paganism, and the comments and interpretations of the disciples of Jesus from Christianity. He asserted, that the errors of Paganism proceeded from the symbols and fictions under which, according to the Eastern manner, it had been inculcated by the ancients; that in time these were erroneously understood in a literal sense, whence the invisible beings who were placed by the Deity in different parts of the universe, as his ministers, were converted, by the suggestions of superstition, into gods, and worshipped as such, though in fact deserving only of an inferior kind of homage. Jesus Christ he considered as an excellent being, the friend of the Deity; but supposed that his design in descending upon earth was not to abolish the worship of dæmons, but to purify the ancient religion, and restore the true philosophy, the great path of truth, from which all had wandered, but that his disciples had manifestly corrupted the doctrines of their Divine Master.

Ammonius adopted the doctrines of the Egyptians, concerning the universe and the Deity, as constituting one great whole; the eternity of the world, the nature of souls, the empire of Providence, and the government of the world by dæmons. These sentiments he associated with the doctrines of Plato, by adulterating some of the opinions of that philosopher, and forcing his expressions from their obvious and literal sense; and, to complete his conciliatory scheme for the restoration of true philosophy and the union of its professors, he interpreted so artfully the doctrines of the other philosophical and religious sects, that they appeared closely to resemble the Egyptian and Platonic systems.

This philosophical system was soon embraced by those among the Alexandrian Christians, who were desirous to unite the profession of the Gospel with the dignity, the title, and the habit of philosophers. The school of Ammonius extended itself from Egypt over the whole Roman Empire; but its disciples were soon divided into various sects; a certain consequence of that fundamental law, which all who embraced it were obliged to keep perpetually in view, that truth was to be pursued with the utmost liberty, and to be collected from the different systems in which it lay dispersed. Hence the Athenian Christians rejected the opinions entertained by the philosophers of Alexandria. But all who aspired to rank with the new Platonics, agreed in their opinion of the existence of one God, the source of all, the eternity of the world, the dependence of matter upon the Supreme Being, the nature of souls, the plurality of Gods, and the method of interpreting the popular superstition. The rules prescribed by this sect were extremely austere; the people at large were, indeed, permitted to live conformably to the laws of their country, and the dictates of nature; but the wise were enjoined to extenuate by mortification the sluggish body which confined the activity of the immortal spirit, that in life they might enjoy communion with the Deity, and ascend after death alone and unincumbered to dwell in his presence for ever.

This philosophy, which involved the truth of the Gospel in subtlety and obscurity, and added to the doctrine of Christ the commandments of men, became in time extremely prejudicial to the Christian cause. It will be easily conceived that these opinions produced in time those voluntary seclusions from the world which confined or destroyed the utility of a considerable portion of mankind. But its tendency, however injurious, was still less pernicious than an opinion derived from those philosophical sects who affirmed, that it was not only lawful but laudable to deceive, in order to advance the interests of religion. This detestable sentiment, at first probably very cautiously propagated, and very sparingly used, opened wide the gates of falsehood, and, in succeeding ages, filled the whole system with absurd legends, pretended miracles, and that train of imposture, which, while it disgraced human nature, was dignified with the perfidious title of pious fraud. Gregory's History of the Christian Church, vol. i. pp. 71—76.

PLAY, to play. The Hebrew word zachak, which signifies to play, is commonly used for laughing, mocking, jeering, insulting. When Sarah saw Ishmael play with her son Isaac, she was offended at it; it was a play of mockery or insult, or, perhaps, of squabbling. So (2 Sam. ii. 14.) let the young people, (or soldiers) get up, and play before us; let them fight, as it were, by way of play: but the event shows that they fought in good earnest, since they were all killed. When the Israelites had set up the golden calf, they began to dance about it, and to divert themselves: 'The people sat down to eat and to drink, and rose up to play.' (Exod. xxxii. 6.)

POETRY OF THE HEBREWS. No point of criticism has been more canvassed among the learned, than that concerning the Hebrew poetry. The most skilful commentators, and the most able critics, have abundantly laboured this argument, and yet we cannot say the matter is exhausted, or the difficulty cleared. Since we cannot pretend to know, nor ever shall know, the true pronunciation of the Hebrew language; and consequently we cannot perceive either the harmony of the words, or the quantity of the syllables, which constitute the beauty of the verses. Nor have we in Hebrew, as we have in Greek and Latin, rules for ascertaining the quantity of the syllables, the number of feet, the cadence and construction of verses; and yet it is plain the Hebrews observed these things, at least in some measure, since in their poems we observe letters added to, or cut off from, the ends of the words, which show some submission to the rhythm, to the number, or measure of syllables. Nor have we now any notion of the tune and dance which generally accompanied Hebrew poetry; for we know that the poetry was sung, and made on purpose for singing: and the Scripture frequently speaks of choirs and dances in the ceremonies of religion.

From the manner in which Josephus, Origen, Eusebius, and Jerome, have spoken of the Hebrew poetry, it should seem that in their time the beauty and rules of it were well known. Josephus affirms in several places, that the songs composed by Moses are in heroic verse, and that David composed several sorts of verses and songs, odes and hymns, in honour of God; some of which were in trimeters, or verses of three feet, and others in pentameters, or verses of five feet.

Le Clerc composed a very ingenious dissertation, to show that the Hebrew poetry was in rhymes, pretty much like the French or English: and his opinion has been espoused by a good number of partisans. Others maintain, that in the old Hebrew verses there is neither measure nor feet. Scaliger even affirms, that this language, as well as that of the Assyrians, Arabians, and Abyssinians, is not capable of the restraint of feet or measures. Austin, of Eububium, says that the Hebrews have neither heroic verses, nor iambics, nor any other measure; but only something that resembles it. This opinion is supported by Lud. Capellus, Martin Martinus, Samuel Bohlius, Wasmurh, Aust. Pfeiffer, and others. Grotius also seems to have adopted the same sentiments.

Bishop Lowth has proved that Hebrew poetry has pretty regular rules. 'I should hope,' he says, 'that the method of distribution, here proposed, of sentences into stanzas and verses in the poetical books of Scripture, will appear to have some foundation, and even to carry with it a considerable degree of probability. Though no complete system of rules concerning this matter can perhaps be formed, which will hold good in every particular; yet this way of considering the subject may have its use, in furnishing a principle of interpretation of some consequence, in giving a general idea of the style and character of the Hebrew poetry, and in showing the close conformity of style and character between a great part of the prophetic writings and the other books of the Old Testament, universally acknowledged to be poetical.' It is, however, observable, that some have doubted the application of certain principles advanced by the bishop. Lowth's Isaiah, Prelim. Discourse, p. xxxiv.; De Sacra Poesi Hebræorum.

POLYGAMY, the state of having more wives than one at a time. The circumstances of the patriarchs living in polygamy, and their not being reproved for it, has given occasion to some modern writers to suppose that it is not unlawful. But it is answered, that the equality in the number of males and females born into the world, intimates the intention of God that one woman should be assigned to one man; for, if to one man be allowed an exclusive right to five or more women, four or more men must be deprived of the exclusive possession of any; which could never be the order intended. It seems also a significant indication of the Divine will, that he at first created only one woman to one man. Had God intended polygamy for the species, it is probable he would have begun with it; especially as by giving Adam more wives than one, the multiplication of the human race would have proceeded with a quicker progress.

Polygamy not only violates the constitution of nature and the apparent design of the Deity, but produces to the parties themselves, and to the public, the following bad effects: contests and jealousies amongst the wives of the same husband; distracted affections, or the loss of all affection, in the husband himself; a voluptuousness in the rich, which dissolves the vigour of their intellectual as well as active faculties, producing that indolence and imbecility, both of mind and body, which have long characterized the nations of the East; the abasement of one half of the human species, who, in countries where polygamy obtains, are degraded into mere instruments of physical pleasure to the other half; neglect of children; and the manifold, and sometimes unnatural mischiefs, which arise from a scarcity of women. To compensate for these evils, polygamy does not offer a single advantage. In the article of population, which it has been thought to promote, the community gain nothing (nothing, I mean, compared with a state in which marriage is nearly universal); for the question is not, whether one man will have more children by five or more wives than by one; but whether these five wives would not bear the same or a greater number of children to five separate husbands? And as to the care of children when produced, and the sending of them into the world, in situations in which they may be likely to form and bring up families of their own, upon which the increase and succession of the human species in a great degree depend, this is less provided for, and less practicable, where twenty or thirty children are to be supported by the attention and fortunes of one father, than if they were divided into five or six families, to each of which were assigned the industry and inheritance of two parents.

Whether simultaneous polygamy was permitted by the law of Moses, seems doubtful, (Deut. xvii. 17.; xxi. 15.); but, whether permitted or not, it was certainly practised by the Jewish patriarchs both before that law and under it. The permission, if there were any, might be, like that of divorce, 'for the hardness of their heart,' in condescension to their established indulgences, rather than from the general rectitude or propriety of the thing itself. The state of manners in Judea had probably undergone a reformation in this respect before the time of Christ; for in the New Testament we meet with no trace or mention of any such practice being tolerated. For this reason, and because it was likewise forbidden among the Greeks and Romans, we cannot expect to find any express law upon the subject in the Christian code. The words of Christ (Matt. xix. 9.) may be construed by an easy implication to prohibit polygamy; for if 'whoever putteth away his wife, and marieth another, committeth adultery;' he who marieth another without putting away the first, is no less guilty of adultery; because the adultery does not consist in the repudiation of the first wife (for, however unjust or cruel that may be, it is not adultery), but in entering into a second marriage during the legal existence and obligation of the first. The several passages in St. Paul's writings which speak of marriage, always suppose it to signify the union of one man with one woman. (Rom. vii. 2, 3. 1 Cor. vii. 12. 14. 16.)

The manners of different countries have varied in nothing more than in their domestic constitutions. Less polished and more luxurious nations have either not perceived the bad effects of polygamy, or if they did perceive them, they who in such countries possessed the power of reforming the laws, have been unwilling to resign their own gratifications. Polygamy is retained at this day among the Turks, and throughout every part of Asia in which Christianity is not professed. In Christian countries it is universally prohibited. In Sweden it is punished with death. In England, besides the nullity of the second marriage, it subjects the offender to transportation or imprisonment, and branding for the first offence, and to capital punishment for the second. And whatever may be said in behalf of polygamy, when it is authorized by the law of the land, the marriage of a second wife, during the life of the first, in countries where such a second marriage is void, must be ranked with the most dangerous and cruel of those frauds, by which a woman is cheated out of her fortune, her person, and her happiness. Paley's Moral and Political Philosophy, vol. i. pp. 313—319.

POLYGLOT, having many languages. For the more commodious comparison of different versions of the Scriptures, they have been sometimes joined together, and called Polyglot Bibles. The first modern Polyglot work was printed at Genoa, in 1516, by Peter Paul Porrus, who undertook to print the Pentaglot Psalter of Augustin Justinian, Bishop of Nebo. It was in Hebrew, Arabic, Chaldaic, and Greek, with the Latin versions, glosses, and scholia, which last made the eighth column, in folio. The Arabic was the first that ever was printed; and this was the first piece of the Bible that ever appeared in so many languages.

In 1518, John Potken published the Psalter, in Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and Æthiopic, or Chaldaic, as he with some others called it, at Cologne; but the name of the printer is not to be found in the book. It has no Preface, properly so called. But in an Address of Potken to the studious reader, which is printed on the last page of the Psalter, we are informed, that, while his earnest zeal for Christianity and for the Roman see made him extremely desirous of learning foreign languages, especially what he calls the Chaldaic, for which he was destitute of any proper master, some Æthiopian Friars happened to be at Rome (as he expresses it) peregrinationis causâ, to whom he eagerly applied; and that, from his intercourse with them, he had acquired such a knowledge of their language, as to make him believe he might undertake an edition of the Æthiopic Psalter; which was actually published at Rome nearly five years before the date of his Polyglot performance. At the end of the above-mentioned Address, he promised to perform something in the Arabic, if he should meet with sufficient encouragement.

The famous Bible of Cardinal Ximenes, commonly called the Complutensian, consists of six large folio volumes; having the Hebrew, Latin, and Greek, in three distinct columns, and the Chaldee paraphrase, with a Latin interpretation, at the bottom of the page, the margin being filled with the Hebrew and Chaldee radicals. It was begun in 1502, finished in 1517, but not published till 1522.

In 1546 appeared at Constantinople, 'Pentateuchus Hebræo-Chaldæo-Persico-Arabicus,' in three columns; the Hebrew text in the middle; on the right hand the Persic version of R. Jacob fil. Joseph; and on the left the Chaldee paraphrase of Onkelos; at the top is the Arabic paraphrase of Saadias, and at the bottom the commentary of Rasi. The whole is printed in Hebrew characters with points, the middle column on a larger size than the others. At the end of Genesis appears 'Absolutus est liber Geneseos in domo Eliezeris Berab Gerson Soncinatis.'

In 1547 was published from the same press, 'Pentateuchus, Hebraicus, Hispanicus, et Barbaro-Græcus.' This edition was also printed in three columns: the Hebrew text in the middle; the old Spanish version on the right hand; and, on the left, the modern Greek, as used by the Caraites at Constantinople, who do not understand Hebrew. The Spanish is designed for the refugee Spanish Jews. At the head and bottom of the pages are the Targum and the Commentary, as in the former editions.

The Royal or Spanish Polyglot was printed at Antwerp, by Christopher Plantinus, 1569—1572, by authority of Philip II. king of Spain, in Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and Chaldee, under the direction of Arias Montanus, in eight volumes, folio; containing, besides the whole of the Complutensian edition, a Chaldee paraphrase on part of the Old Testament, which Cardinal Ximenes had deposited in the theological library at Complutum, having particular reasons for not publishing it. The New Testament had the Syriac version, and the Latin translation of Santes Pagninus as reformed by Arias Montanus. This work was also enriched with various Grammars and Dictionaries of the several languages it consists of.

In 1586 a Polyglot Bible was published at Heidelberg, in two volumes, folio, printed in four columns, Hebrew, Greek, and two Latin versions, namely, Jerome's and those of Pagninus; with the notes of Vatablus; and in the margin are the idioms, and the radices of all the difficult words. Two other dates have been seen to this edition, namely, 1599 and 1616; but Le Long, after an attentive comparison, declares them to be only different copies of the same impression; but that some of them have the Greek Testament, with the addition of the Latin version of Arias Montanus.

In 1596, Jacobus Lucius printed an edition in Greek, Latin, and German, at Hamburgh, in four volumes, folio, 'Studio Davidis Walderi;' the Greek from the Venice edition of 1518; the Latin versions those of Jerome and Pagninus.

In 1599, Elias Hutterus published one at Nuremberg, in six languages; four of them, the Hebrew, Chaldee, Greek, and Latin, printed from the Antwerp edition; the fifth was the German version of Luther; and the sixth the Slavonic version of Wittenberg. The Bible was never completed, and goes no farther than the Book of Ruth.

The next work of this kind was, 'Biblia Sacra Polyglotta, studio Guy Michaelis Le Jay, Parisiis, apud Antonium Vitray, 1628, et ann. seqq. ad 1645,' in ten volumes, very large folio. This edition, which is extremely magnificent, contains all that is in those of Ximenes and Plantinus, with the addition of the Syriac and Arabic versions.

This was soon followed by 'Biblia Sacra Polyglotta, complectentia Textus originales Hebraic. Chaldaic. et Græc. Pentateuchum Samaritanum, et Versiones antiquas, cum Apparatu, Appendicibus et Annotationibus; studio et operâ Briani Walton. Londini 1657, et ann. seqq.' To this was added, 'Lexicon Heptaglotton, Hebraicum, Chaldaicum, Syriacum, Samaritanum, Æthiopicum, Arabicum, et Persicum, digestum et evulgatum ab Edmundo Castello, 1686,' in two volumes more. This may properly be called a new edition of Le Jay with improvements; no pains having been spared in making it as perfect as possible: the whole was revised with great care, and accurately corrected; and it is justly considered as the most useful of all the Polyglots, though Le Jay's is the handsomest. Nichols's Literary Anecdotes of the Eighteenth Century.

PONTUS, Πόντος, signifies the sea. The province of Pontus, in Asia Minor, has the Euxine Sea north, Cappadocia south, Paphlagonia and Galatia east, and the Lesser Armenia west. It is thought St. Peter preached in Pontus, because he addresses his first epistle to the faithful of this province, and of the neighbouring provinces.

POT'IPHAR, פוטיפר, פוֹטֶפֶר, signifies the bull of Africa, or, according to the Syriac and Hebrew, a fat bull; פוֹטֶפֶר, that scatters, or demolishes the fat. Potiphar is an Egyptian proper name, which has been explained by the Coptic ΠΙΩΤ ΦΡΡΟ, father, that is prime minister of PHARRO, or Pharaoh. Potiphar, or Putiphar, was an officer of the court of Pharaoh, king of Egypt; general of his troops, according to our translation, Le Clerc, and the Vulgate; chief of his butchers or cooks, according to the Hebrew and Septuagint. The Hebrew also calls him saris, an eunuch.

Potiphar, having bought Joseph, as a slave, from the Midianites, who had bought him of his brethren, seeing all things prosper in his hands, gave him the superintendence of his whole house. But, some years after, the wife of Potiphar, taking an unlawful liking to Joseph, and having even solicited him to the crime of adultery, Joseph repulsed her. Then, her love changed into rage; she accused him to her husband, and Potiphar put Joseph in bonds; where his delegate, who had, by office, the charge of the prisoners, laid this care upon Joseph.

But God had replenished Joseph with his own Spirit, and gave him an extraordinary talent of interpreting dreams, which, at length, made him known to Pharaoh, who appointed him ruler over all Egypt, and gave him in marriage Asenath, daughter of Potiphar, or Potipherah, priest of Heliopolis, or On, according to the Hebrew.

Some expositors have made a distinction between the master of Joseph and the keeper of the prison into which he was thrown. Others have conjectured, with more probability, that Potiphar, after having punished Joseph in a transport of wrath and jealousy, acknowledged his innocence; but that, in order to avoid disgracing his wife, instead of restoring Joseph to his former office, he confided to him the command of the state prison.

Opinions have been divided, whether Potipherah, whose daughter Joseph married, is the same as Joseph's master? That the Potiphar who purchased Joseph, and the Potipherah, priest of Heliopolis, or On, were two distinct persons, appears from the following reasons: 1. the Scripture gives no intimation that they were one and the same person. 2. Potipherah had children, and Potiphar was an eunuch; for though eunuchs often kept women, there is no proof that they had any issue by them. In the Hebrew, the word saris, (Gen. xxxvii. 36.) which is translated officer in the English Bible, properly signifies eunuch. Dr. A. Clarke's Comment on Genesis.

POVERTY is that state or situation opposed to riches, in which we are deprived of the conveniences of life. Poverty seems one of those evils which we regard with the greatest dread, and take most pains to avoid. Yet, if we consider that there is hardly any state of poverty so desperate, in which a moderate share of industry will not procure food sufficient for our need, we shall find, that on a sober calculation, the evils of poverty, when they do not include a privation of those things which are of the first necessity, are usually more than balanced by the concomitant advantages. Poverty, indeed, does not admit of any superfluities at our table; it, perhaps, obliges us to satisfy our hunger with one species of food, and that of the coarsest quality; it excludes all splendour of retinue, all parade of wealth. The poor man has no servants to attend his nod, no sycophants to watch his look, to repeat his jests, or admire his wisdom; he can engage in no costly undertakings, no fashionable diversions; his clothing is of the most homely stuff, and only sufficient to keep him from the cold; in the furniture of his humble dwelling he is always obliged to study utility more than show. But the labour, which is necessitated by his circumstances, tends to give cheerfulness to his mind, and vigour to his body; it stimulates his appetite, and communicates the sweetest relish to his hard-earned morsel; and most propitious is it to slumbers, which are not liable to be broken by hideous and distempered dreams, the effects of a feverish fancy, of intemperance, or indigestion. The sleep of a labouring man is proverbially sweet; and the rich and the powerful are often lying in restless vexation, or torturing inquietude, on their bed of down, while the poor cottager is enjoying, in the most delicious tranquillity, a bland oblivion of all his cares and all his woes. Poverty has many negative, and some positive advantages. It is an exemption from many solicitudes, much treachery, numerous snares, various crosses, many swelling hopes, and mortifying disappointments, to which those in the higher spheres of life are perpetually exposed; while it favours the possession of health, and the growth of various virtues, which are often choked by weeds in a more luxuriant soil. It leaves the heart open to the genial flow of the domestic affections; it precludes not the endearments of wife and child; and, above all, it often renders the soul more awake to religious truth, more susceptible of religious impressions and consolations. To the poor the Gospel is preached; they were its first and earliest converts; and its blessed Founder, while he continued in this world, preferred poverty to wealth.

There is scarcely any condition in life so miserable as not to furnish something like its own antidote to its own woe; or in which is not found something capable, in a great degree, of balancing its inconveniences; and thus of raising it almost to a level with those states which are esteemed more fortunate, and below which it seems sunk in a gulf of wretchedness, beyond the power of alleviation. Poverty is one of the conditions which men shun with the most eagerness, and regard with the most unqualified aversion. But, has poverty no appendages of comfort; no associated balm to assuage its discontent, no incidental benefits, without which affluence verges on misery? Are there not enjoyments, to the production of which poverty is more favourable, or with which it is more commonly associated, than riches? Is not the exertion which it causes, conducive to health, and is not the largest fortune only a sorry compensation for languor and disease? Does not indigence remove the temptation to excess; and is it not thus favourable to temperance? Is not temperance propitious to the strength of the body and the mind? Does not luxury enervate and corrupt? And may not those circumstances often be accounted the most fortunate, which secure us from the insidious wiles of an enemy so fatal to our integrity and our peace? Is not poverty very compatible with a clear conscience? And, without a clear conscience, the largest possessions are no substitute for so invaluable a gift. Does not poverty, when it is found united with integrity and diligence, naturally excite the admiration and the sympathy of every beholder? For nothing more forcibly engages the affections than virtue in distress; and what can be a more heartfelt satisfaction than the consciousness of possessing the love of our fellow-creatures? Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. ii. pp. 448, 449, &c.

PRAYER has been defined a request or petition for mercies; or an offering of our desires to God, for things agreeable to his will, in the name of Christ, by the help of his Spirit, with confession of our sins, and thankful acknowledgment of his mercies. A principal cause of the efficacy of prayer is the benignity of the Divine nature, which we call the goodness of God, and of which the whole earth is full. Whatever is needful, or convenient; comfortable, or desirable; whatever we either want, enjoy, or expect; is always plentifully flowing from that inexhaustible source. To this Fountain we more especially owe all those blessings which we receive in answer to our prayers; as is sufficiently evident from the illustrations which our Saviour uses on the occasion. 'For what man is there of you,' says he, 'whom if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone? or if he ask a fish, will he give him a serpent?' That is, will he give him what is useless and hurtful, instead of what is necessary, fit, and proper? 'If ye, then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father, which is in heaven, give good things to them that ask him?' If a parent's affection strongly inclines him to supply the necessities of his children, and provide for their welfare, much more will the infinite goodness and liberality of God extend itself to those who make their supplications to him. For he bears to us the relation of a Father, and has a tender care for us, infinitely beyond that of the most indulgent earthly Parent. He is ever ready to hear our prayers, and will liberally give whatever he knows to be really good and fit for us; and, unless we render ourselves incapable of it, he will not withhold from us the best of his gifts; for he will give the aid and comfort of his Holy Spirit to them that ask him. As the efficacy of prayer is chiefly founded on God's goodness and beneficence, so it depends upon his wisdom, veracity, and power. The wisdom of Divine Providence appoints prayer, as the necessary means of obtaining what we want; the truth of his sacred promises assures us that those means will be effectual; and by his power it is accomplished. O God, 'the eyes of all wait upon thee, and thou givest them their meat in due season. Thou openest thy hand, and satisfiest the desire of every living thing.' This dependence on God is both reasonable and necessary, to preserve in our minds that submission, duty, and gratitude, which we owe to the bountiful Creator, for the use and enjoyment of his manifold gifts. And, for our encouragement, the word of truth declares, on God's part, the acceptance of this our homage and service; and his power assures us of a return answerable to our prayers. 'The Lord is nigh unto all them that call upon him, to all that call upon him in truth: he will fulfil the desire of them that fear him: he also will hear their cry, and will save them.' So that God's veracity is expressly engaged to perform, what his providence has wisely ordered, and his power is able to effect. If we ask, we shall obtain.

But what adds much to the force and efficacy of prayer, is the merit and mediation of Jesus Christ. Though the goodness of God inclines him to be gracious to us, yet he will not hear sinners; their prayers are an abomination to him. His wrath must first be appeased, and his justice satisfied for sin, before his mercy will show favour to the sinner. Therefore did Christ 'appear once in the flesh, to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. And since God has delivered up his own Son for us all, how shall he not with him freely give us all things? For he is able to save us to the utmost, if we come unto God by him, since he ever liveth to make intercession for us.' The power with which Christ is invested shall never cease, and the merit upon which he pleads can never be exhausted. On this we may raise and fix our hopes, that whatsoever we ask the Father, in the Son's name, he will give it us. For all the promises of God in Christ, are sure to be performed; which is the great confirmation of our faith, and a pledge of security, that our prayers shall be heard and answered. So that when we pray for pardon, grace, and salvation, we have the earnest of the Spirit already in our hearts, which obtains for us all that is necessary to complete our happiness. The same blessed Spirit, that is the Author of those gifts and graces, the first fruits of which Christians partake, is the Helper of our weakness, the Sanctifier and Furtherer of our prayers, and a secret, but powerful Intercessor for us. 'The Spirit helpeth our infirmities, and maketh intercession for us with groanings that cannot be uttered.' Though the delegation of the power of prayer, by our Saviour to his disciples, extended to natural impossibilities, and was perhaps accompanied with miracles, and a divine faith; yet the faith which we now exercise in prayer is, I apprehend, the same in kind, though not in degree, with that of those who were extraordinarily gifted and enabled to work miracles. At least the common measure which is now dealt to all, by the operation of the same Spirit, must be sufficient to procure all ordinary blessings necessary to our real happiness and everlasting salvation; and even capable of farther increase, as the greater glory of God, and the good of his church, may require. It appears, therefore, that the efficacy of prayer is universal and unlimited, and all things with God are possible by prayer; but there are some necessary conditions required, upon which the success of it is suspended, and without which prayer cannot be effectual.

Attention and fervency are principally requisite to render our prayers acceptable to God, and beneficial to ourselves. If we draw near to him with our lips only, whilst our heart is far from him; if we attend the duties of his worship with a languid, absent, and inattentive mind, in compliance only with form and custom, without due impressions of the sacredness of the service in which we are engaged, can we expect that such superficial, unmeaning homage can recommend us to his favour, or that he will accept the bare semblance or mock representation of prayer? It is not the service of the lips, it is the homage of the mind, which God regards. He sees and approves even the silent devotions of the heart, which need not be formed into vocal prayers to inform him of our necessities, but only to aid our own weakness, and to keep the mind more steady and attentive to the duty we are paying to our Creator. When we approach the throne of grace, and address the Sovereign Lord of heaven and earth, then surely, if ever, there is the highest occasion to bring with us a serious and collected frame of mind, to awaken all our attention, to call upon all that is within us, and to summon and assemble all the powers and faculties of the soul.—Perseverance is another condition upon which depends the success of our prayers. In the parable of the unjust judge, we are informed, that he who neither feared God nor regarded man, who was insensible to all considerations of religion or humanity, was yet prevailed on to grant relief to a necessitous supplicant, merely by the continued importunity of her petitions. And our Saviour has instructed us to conclude, that perseverance in prayer to Heaven will have the same effect; for he spoke the parable to this end, that men ought always to pray, and not to faint. Though God may, for wise reasons, delay to answer our first petitions, yet ought we not to despair of the acceptance of our repeated prayers. We ought to pray without ceasing, that is, not with a weak superstition or enthusiastic pride, to devote our whole time to prayers; but, by frequent periodical performances of this duty, to recommend ourselves and our concerns to the care of heaven.—Humility, and submission to the divine will, are also necessary conditions of our prayers. When we come into the presence of the Sovereign of the Universe, we ought to consider the infinite superiority of his nature to ours, and impress our hearts with the most awful veneration of him, and offer our supplications with the most humble reverence, suited to his greatness and majesty, and our own meanness and unworthiness to approach him. And as we ought with the most reverential awe to come before the Lord, and bow ourselves before the Most High God, and with the deepest humility of heart to sue for mercies we have no right to, and for blessings we deserve not; so likewise ought we to resign all our requests, inclinations, and desires, to the determination of his all-wise providence.

We are improper judges of our own condition, and know not what to pray for as we ought. If we ask what in the opinion of the world are reputed blessings,—wealth, honour, and distinctions, success, and the like,—these may, in their immediate or remote consequences, be attended with a train of unknown evils. Though in themselves good, we may be disposed to make an improper use of them, and to us they may become evil; or though they favour our present, they may be fatal to our future interests.—Our prayers to God ought to be accompanied with a trust and confidence in his goodness; a confidence that composes our fears, and sets us above all despondency. When, indeed, we reflect upon the infinite holiness and majesty of God, and our own impurity and meanness; when we consider the immense distance between his nature and ours, rendered still more immense, if that were possible, by our unworthiness; it might seem presumption enough to present ourselves and our addresses before the throne of God, without adding a confidence that those addresses will be regarded by him. As those addresses are made in obedience to his commands, and our hopes encouraged by his sure promises, we may and ought to approach him with a confidence that we shall either be indulged in the particular subject of our requests, or that he will do in that and every other case that we recommend to his providence, whatever to his wisdom appears best and fittest for us. The last requisite I shall mention, necessary to recommend our prayers to the Divine acceptance, is, that the state of the person who prays should be that of a righteous man, for it is the ‘effectual fervent prayer of the righteous man only that availeth with God.’ By a righteous man we are not to understand one who is without sin, and perfectly innocent; for there is not a ‘just man upon earth, that doeth good and sinneth not.’ But such as comply with the terms of the Gospel. All such persons will be graciously accepted and esteemed as righteous in the sight of God. This evangelical righteousness implies a well-grounded faith in the merits and mediation of Christ, an unfeigned repentance for our past sins, and a stedfast purpose of amendment; without which no man ought to present himself before God, for he heareth not sinners; but those who believe in him and our Saviour, and endeavour to do his will with sincerity of heart.

Let us then, as often as we go to the house of prayer, carry with us a mind serious, devout, and disengaged; neither ruffled with cares, nor dissipated by pleasure; that we may serve God with an undivided attention, and with a heart devoted solely to the right discharge of the duty which we profess to perform. Let no inadvertent behaviour betray our absence from

God, and the indisposition of our heart to pay him that homage which with our lips we acknowledge to be due to him. Let no suspension of his blessings discourage our perseverance; for though he favours not our first, he may our repeated petitions. Let them be accompanied with humility of heart; with an absolute, unreserved submission to the sovereign will of him whose goodness to us is expressed sometimes by gratifying, sometimes by disappointing, our hopes; and with a firm dependence on his providence, and a trust that he will order all things for our good. To the first, the greatest, and best of Beings, be it our care to pay our daily homage. We are every day dependent on God; and every day should begin, and close, with pious acknowledgments of our dependence. Every morning, we should look up to him for a renewal of his mercies; and every evening, ask forgiveness for the errors of the preceding day. When we rise, we should implore his guidance; and when we lie down, we should supplicate his protection. Often should we lift up our souls in occasional supplications to the great Preserver of our being, and recommend ourselves and our concerns to his providence. Warner's System of Divinity and Morality, vol. ii. pp. 263, 264, &c.; Carr's Sermons, vol. i. PREDESTINATION, the design which some suppose God to have formed, from all eternity, of bringing by his grace certain persons to faith and salvation, whilst he leaves others to their infidelity. This is with reason considered as one of the most abstruse doctrines of theology. Some have greatly perplexed themselves with certain expressions of St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Romans (ix.) concerning God's electing the children yet unborn, who had done neither good nor evil; concerning ‘his loving Jacob, and hating Esau; his hardening Pharaoh; and showing mercy on whom he will have mercy; and having compassion on whom he will have compassion;’ and of his having the same power over mankind as the potter has over the clay, to make one vessel to honour, and another to dishonour. Yet it is clearly evident, that the apostle's design is not to speak concerning any decree of God, with respect to the final and eternal state of particular persons; but only to declare both the sovereign power and justice of God, in distributing to different nations, in different ages, what particular advantages he pleases; and in revealing his will to them when, and in what manner, he thinks fit. The apostle expressly declares, that he does not mean, by the vessels of mercy, prepared of God unto glory, any particular persons, chosen unconditionally to eternal salvation; but the whole body of Christians, even us whom he has called, and who obeyed that call by believing in Christ; not from among the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles. They were called to receive that grace and mercy, and to embrace those advantages of the Gospel, which the Jews rejected, who therefore became vessels of wrath, fitted for destruction. Though we are at present the vessels of mercy, yet, if we live unworthy of the Gospel, we can have no reason to expect, since God spared not the Jews, the natural branches, that he will spare us, who were engrafted after their fall. The apostle had before shown, that the Gentiles, by acting contrary to the law of nature, and the Jews, by disobeying the law given them from Heaven, became both equally liable to the wrath of God. For God being no respecter of persons, 'as many as sinned without law, shall perish without law; and as many as have sinned in the law, shall be judged by the law.'

The apostle proceeds to answer a strong objection, which he knew would be raised by the unbelieving Jews against what he had said. For if this doctrine were true, then whosoever of the Jews rejected the Gospel, though they were descended from the patriarchs, to whom the promises were made, and were God's peculiar people; though to them were committed the prophecies and oracles of God, and to them pertained the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises; yet, notwithstanding all this, it would follow, that they were still out of the way of salvation, though zealous observers of the ceremonial law, unless they believed in Christ, and obeyed the Gospel, which is the righteousness of faith. The Jews thought this doctrine impossible, and contrary to the promises of God made to their fathers, and therefore imputed it to the apostle's zeal and prejudice against them, since his being converted to Christianity. To this objection Paul replies, by showing that there was no injustice in God, no breach of promise, no change of his will, in rejecting the unbelieving Jews, and receiving the Gentiles; since the promise was not originally made to all the children of Abraham, but to Isaac only, and, of his sons, only to Jacob; and all were not Israel, which were of Israel; for a remnant only was to be saved. During the whole period of the law, God had mercy on whom he would have mercy, and compassion on whom he would have compassion; that is, not on the whole people, but on whom he pleased, who was the alone competent and infallible Judge, to distinguish such as were stedfast in their faith and fidelity to him. When he would he hardened; that is, he chose out of obstinate and incorrigible offenders, whom he pleased, to make examples of his wrath and vengeance. Since this, saith the apostle, was the method of God's proceeding from the beginning, much more might God justly reject unbelievers, at the coming of the Messiah, who was the end of the law, and reckon only those the true children of Abraham, who imitated his faith and obedience, making known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy, which he had before prepared unto glory, even us whom he has called, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles. Hence it would appear, that the Scripture doctrine on this subject is, that those, who God foresaw would perform the conditions of the Gospel covenant, are said to be predestinated to life; 'for whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate.' This, indeed, seems to be the only sense in which predestination is reconcilable with the attributes of God, and the free agency of man.

But it has been observed, that, when God proposes an end, he also proposes the means; when he appoints an effect, he also appoints the causes. Now, where is the essential difference, if we say, God foresaw the elect would be holy, and therefore chose them, or say, God chose the elect, to make them holy? Because, since their holiness is not from themselves, but from him, he must determine to bestow on them that which they have not of themselves. The difference, therefore, is in the order only; that is, whether God determined to elect a person, purposing his holiness, or determined to make him holy, purposing his election. For it is to be observed, that God's determination to render him holy is, in fact, an election of him; an election which implies salvation: and since this principle places an election of the party previous to its effects, it seems to be much more convenient to admit of a full and entire election, than of a partial and incomplete election. Especially if we consider that all things are known to God from the beginning to the end, so that he has no need to stay till a certain event has taken place before he can adjust the following event, but, in his vast, and extensive, and intimate foreknowledge of things, that which is to follow is no more concealed from him, than that which is to precede. If we, perhaps, see one single link in the chain of the divine government, considered as compounded of cause and effect, what proportion does this bear to that infinitely prolonged concatenation, of which the Divine mind only is capable of surveying at once both the extremes, and together with the extremes every connecting link, every acting cause, and every produced effect; from the most trivial, as we call it, to the most considerable, in our estimation!

The prescience of God, as extending to every instance of human conduct, from the creation of man to the final consummation of all things, is undoubtedly a proper object of our belief. But we are utterly incapable of comprehending how this prescience consists with the other attributes of the Deity, and with the free agency of man; nor can we conceive how those future contingencies, which depend upon the determination of the human will, should be certain and infallible; and yet, that they are so, is fully proved by the accurate accomplishment of prophecies. At the same time the unwarranted idea of God's absolute and unconditional predestination is apt to drive the presumptuous and the wicked, who resist the influence of the Spirit of Christ, either into a state of gloomy despondency on the one hand, or into a course of unbridled licentiousness on the other. 'If a man thinks that he is under an inevitable decree, as he will have little remorse for all the evil he does, while he imputes it to that inevitable force that constrains him, so he will naturally conclude that it is to no purpose for him to struggle with impossibilities; and men being inclined both to throw all blame off from themselves, and to indulge themselves in laziness and sloth, these practices are too natural to mankind to be encouraged by opinions that favour them. All virtue and religion, all discipline and industry, must arise from this, as their first principle, that there is a power in us to govern our own thoughts and actions, and to raise and improve our faculties. If this is denied, all endeavours, all education, all pains, either on ourselves or others, are vain and fruitless things. Nor is it possible to make a man believe other than this; for he does so plainly perceive that he is a free agent; he feels himself balance matters in his thoughts, and deliberate about them so evidently, that he certainly knows he is a free being. Though he feels himself often hurried on so impetuously, that he may seem to have lost his freedom in some turns, and upon some occasions, yet he feels that he might have restrained that heat in its first beginning; he feels he can divert his thoughts, and master himself in most things, when he sets himself to do it; he finds that knowledge and reflection, that good company and good exercises, do tame and soften him, and that bad ones make him wild, loose, and irregular. From all this they conclude that man is free, and not under inevitable fate, or irresistible motions either to good or evil. All this they confirm from the whole current of the Scripture, which is full of persuasions, exhortations, reproofs, expostulations, encouragements, and terrors, which are all vain and theatrical things, if there are no free powers in us to which they are addressed: to what purpose is it to speak to dead men, to persuade the blind to see, or the lame to run? If we are under an impotence till the irresistible grace comes, and if, when it comes, nothing can withstand it, then what occasion is there for all those solemn discourses, if they can have no effect on us? They cannot render us inexcusable, unless it were in our power to be bettered by them: and to imagine that God gives light and blessings to those, whom he before intended to damn, only to make them inexcusable when they could do them no good, and they will serve only to aggravate their condemnation, gives so strange an idea of that infinite Goodness, that it is not fit to express it by those terms which do naturally rise upon it.' Warner's System of Divinity and Morality, vol. iii. pp. 358—362. Additions to Calmet's Dictionary of the Holy Bible; Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. ii. pp. 302—307; Burnet's Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles, pp. 208, 209.

PRESBYTERIANS. The term Presbyterian comes from the Greek word Πρεσβύτερος, which signifies senior or elder; and the Presbyterians are so denominated from their maintaining that the government of the church appointed in the New Testament was by presbyteries, that is, by associations of ministers and ruling elders, all possessed of equal powers, without any superiority among them, either in office, or in order.

Though the Presbyterians in general insist that the church was originally constituted according to their principles, yet their opponents as firmly believe that it is in vain to look for the origin of their scheme of church government till after the reformation. Even Dr. Hill, who traces the origin of Presbyterianism to the practice of the apostles, and affirms that there are no traces of episcopacy in Scripture, or in the writings of the apostolical fathers, admits that this last form prevailed almost universally in the second century, and also that, from that time to the era of the reformation, the order of bishops, as distinct from, and superior to presbyters, continued to exist almost in all parts of the Christian world, and was regarded with respect and submission, both by the clergy and the laity. Dr. Campbell also admits, that, about the middle of the second century, a kind of episcopacy had grown out of the original institution of perpetual moderators. Dr. Hill observes, that 'the first reformers, who believed that the distinction between bishops and presbyters has no foundation in Scripture, and who wished to apply an effectual remedy to the abuses which appeared to them to have arisen in the progress of human ambition, from the practice of investing bishops with powers superior to presbyters, did not consider the antiquity or universality of that practice as any reason for its being continued. Recurring to what they accounted the primitive Scripture model, they laid the foundation of Presbyterian Church-government in this principle, that all ministers are equal in rank and power; and they did not admit any official preference, but that which is constituted by voluntary agreement for the sake of order.' The reformers here alluded to were chiefly Calvin, (who may be said to be the founder of Presbytery, having first established that form at Geneva, about 1541,) and Messrs. John Knox, and Andrew Melvil, who soon after introduced it into Scotland; where, from the first dawn of the Reformation till the Revolution, there was a perpetual struggle of contending parties, whether their Church should be modelled according to the Episcopal or the Presbyterian form of Church-government. These men, together with Beza and some others, were violent reformers, and seem to have laid it down as a principle, that, in new modelling their respective churches, they could not recede too far from the Church of Rome; and hence, they condemned episcopacy as having no foundation in the word of God.

From Geneva Presbyterianism was introduced among the reformed in France, into Holland, and also into England and Scotland, in which last country it became the established form of Church-government at the Revolution in 1688. The first Presbytery in England was set up at Wandsworth, in Surrey, in 1572, some years before a Presbytery was heard of in Scotland. This first establishment was called the Order of Wandsworth, by Field, their minister: and under Cromwell, who was alike averse to Episcopacy and Presbyterianism, though he found it expedient to show favour to the latter, the Church of England was delivered to the management of a set of commissioners, consisting partly of Presbyterians and partly of Independents. But upon the restoration of Charles II., the Church resumed its ancient form of Episcopal government; and upwards of 2000 of the clergy, attached to Presbyterian discipline, relinquished their cures in consequence of the Act of Uniformity, which took place on St. Bartholomew's day 1662, 'by which,' says Dr. Maclaine, 'the validity of Presbyterian ordination was renounced, and the ministrations of the foreign Churches disowned.' During the troubles of the seventeenth century, many English Presbyterians emigrated, together with multitudes of other denominations, to America, where they have been increasing to the present day, where the Presbyterians make a great proportion of the inhabitants of the United States.

The members of Presbyteral communities hold the divine authority of the priesthood equally with Episcopalians, but they differ from them in their mode of ecclesiastical government, and in their manner of conferring the powers of the ministry. They believe that the authority of their ministers to preach the Gospel, to administer the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, and to feed the flock of Christ, is derived from the Holy Ghost by the imposition of the hands of the Presbytery; and they oppose the independent scheme of the common rights of Christians, by the same arguments which are used for that purpose by the Episcopalians. They affirm, however, that there is no order in the Church as established by Christ and his Apostles, superior to that of Presbyters; that all ministers, being ambassadors of Christ, are equal by their commission; that presbyter and bishop, though different words, are of the same import; and that Episcopacy was gradually established on the primitive practice of making the moderator or speaker of the Presbytery a permanent officer. These positions they endeavour to maintain against the Episcopalians, by arguments deduced from Scripture.

There have been, and still are, warm advocates for the divine right of Presbytery, as well as for that of Episcopacy: and those, or most of those, who hold the former, contend that the Presbyterian form of government is delineated and prescribed in Scripture, as a rule to which all the members of the Church of Christ are bound to submit till the end of the world, and, consequently, that every other form is unlawful. It was a conviction of this doctrine that produced, during the commotions of the seventeenth century, the 'Solemn League and Covenant,' which was subscribed by many of all ranks in England and Scotland, who swore, with their hands lifted up to the Most High God, that they would endeavour the extirpation of prelacy, that is, of Church-government by archbishops, bishops, and all other ecclesiastical officers depending on that hierarchy: and when the Presbyterians attained supreme power, they are said to have fulfilled this oath by many unjust and violent deeds.

On the other hand, many Presbyterians as well as some Episcopalians, vindicate their own mode of Church-government, as a good human device, upon the principle that the particular form has been left by Christ to be particularly moulded by the rulers of the Church and State, agreeably to the prejudices, prepossessions, and customs, of different countries.

The established Church of Scotland exhibits the best model of Presbyterian Church-government now existing. In some of the Churches on the continent, where a number of Presbyters have the charge of a city or district, there are superintendents, præpositi, or inspectores, who are appointed for life to preside in the council of Presbyters, but who, having no other superiority than that which is implied in the office of president, and no powers or privileges essentially different from those which belong to Presbyters, are only accounted primi inter pares:—a form of government which seems to extend also to the German Lutherans. But in the greater part of Presbyterian Churches, from a jealousy, lest, under the form of superintendency, some kind of prelacy might be introduced, the parity of ministers is guarded by the frequent election of a new president or moderator, who, when his term is expired, returns to an equality with his brethren. A body of Presbyters, having a moderator, who conducts the proceedings, and executes the sentences, is considered as competent to perform all the acts which, in Episcopal government, belong exclusively to the bishop. It tries the qualifications of candidates for the office of the ministry; it confers orders by the imposition of hands; to those who are nominated by persons having right of nomination, it grants the investiture of the sacred office, or induction into the charge of a particular office; and it exercises inspection and jurisdiction over the pastors of all the parishes within its bounds.

Almost all Presbyterians are Calvinists, the Arminians in Holland, &c. excepted. At least, their public standards of faith are Calvinistical. Yet very few of the Presbyterians in England are said to be Calvinists at present; and many of those also in the Church of Scotland are supposed to have departed from the peculiar doctrines of their standards. It may also be remarked here, that though many Unitarians are nominally Presbyterians in regard to Church-government, yet none of them are Calvinists, nor do they admit the Presbyterian standards of faith.

The Presbyterians, Independents, and others who embrace those standards, as well as the Roman Catholics, profess to believe that there is no salvation out of the Church of Christ. 'Out of the visible Church, which is the kingdom of the Lord Jesus Christ, the house and family of God, there is no ordinary possibility of salvation.' Again, 'They who, never having heard the Gospel, know not Jesus Christ, and believe not in him, cannot be saved, be they never so diligent to frame their lives according to the light of nature, or the law of that religion which they profess.'

Calvin himself was no enemy to Liturgies, but 'highly approved of them, and composed certain forms of prayer, to be used by the ministers in Geneva, in the public worship, on Sundays and other holidays, and at the administration of the sacraments;' but almost all Presbyterians, at least in Britain, Ireland, and America, have now laid them aside, and use extemporary prayer in the worship of God. They also differ from Episcopalians in this, that while the latter kneel in time of prayer, the former stand, and in singing the praises of God they sit, while all Episcopalians stand; and what will perhaps seem more remarkable, the Dutch Presbyterians are said to remain covered during public worship. These last have not, however, declared war against instrumental music in houses of public worship, like their brethren in Great Britain and Ireland. Moesheim tells us, that Calvin laid a scheme for sending forth, from his little republic of Geneva, 'the succours and ministers that were to promote and propagate the Protestant cause through the most distant nations, and aimed at nothing less than rendering the government, discipline, and doctrine of Geneva, the model and rule of imitation to the reformed Churches throughout the world.' So strict was the discipline that he established at Geneva, that it gave general offence; yet this may be said to be the groundwork of that of Presbyterian Churches in general. For his discharge of all the duties of the pastoral office, a minister is accountable only to the Presbytery, from whom he received the charge of the parish. 'But in every thing which concerns what is called discipline, the exercise of that jurisdiction over the people with which the office-bearers of the Church are conceived to be invested, a Presbyterian minister is assisted by lay-elders. They are laymen in this respect, that they have no right to teach, or to dispense the sacraments; and on this account they form an office in the Presbyterian Church inferior in rank and power to that of pastors. They generally discharge the office which originally belonged to the deacons, of attending to the interests of the poor. But their peculiar business is expressed by the name ruling elders; for, in every question of jurisdiction within the parish, they are the spiritual court, of which the minister is officially moderator; and in the Presbytery, of which the pastors of all parishes within its bounds are officially members, lay-elders sit as the representatives of the several sessions or consistories.'

Calvin admitted lay-elders into Church courts on what he conceived to be the sanction of primitive practice, and 'as an effectual method of preventing the return of inordinate power in a superior order of clergy.' With some variation in name or in privileges, the office of lay-elders is found in all the Presbyterian Churches upon the continent, and it forms an essential part of the constitution of the Church of Scotland.

The established religion in Scotland is the Presbyterian; the two parties of Seceders, and the Society of Relief, are also strict Presbyterians; and in England one branch of the Protestant Dissenters are still called Presbyterians, though improperly. The Presbyterians have long been numerous in Ireland, especially in the north; and on the continent Presbyterianism still prevails, in Switzerland and in Holland. Presbyterians are also numerous in most parts of North America. Presbyterianism is the prevailing religion throughout Connecticut, where it is said to reign 'in all its rigour, despotism, and intolerance.' Though the letter of the law has established freedom of religious sentiments in Connecticut, yet such freedom is far from being known there. Its ministers, the zeal of its followers, and the appropriation of the places in the college to Presbyterians, exclusively afford very great advantages, to prevent it from being supplanted by any other form of religion. The Presbyterians are also the most numerous sect in North Carolina, especially in the western parts, which are inhabited by emigrants from Pennsylvania. In 1788, there were in America about 618 Presbyterian congregations, and 226 ministers; and their General Assembly usually meets at Philadelphia, in the month of May.

Among the chief luminaries of the foreign Presbyterian Churches may be reckoned Calvin, Martyr, Beza, Bullinger, Zanchius, Blondel, Salmasius, Dalaëus, Claude, &c.: and at home none perhaps have been more eminent than Knox, Henry, Macknight, Robertson, Campbell, and Blair.

In almost all Presbyterian Churches the sacrament of the Lord's Supper is never administered in private houses to any person, under any circumstances whatever. But it does not appear, that the Presbyterians have adopted this principle from Calvin, who thus expresses himself on the subject: 'Why the Lord's Supper should not be denied to the sick, many and great reasons prevail with me, &c. &c. My judgment for the administration of private baptism, and giving the Lord's Supper to malefactors that desire it, and appear qualified for it, is the same.' He also required sponsors in baptism, besides or together with the father. But at present almost all Presbyterians, both at home and abroad, who practise infant baptism, require no sponsors, except the father, and in some cases the mother, and they seldom administer baptism in private houses. It appears, likewise, that, in various other particulars, the sentiments of Calvin corresponded more with those of the Episcopalians, than of the modern Presbyterians. Adam's Religious World Displayed, vol. ii. pp. 289—305.

PRESBYTERIANS IN ENGLAND. 'Those,' says Dr. Doddridge, 'who hold every pastor to be so a bishop or overseer of his own congregation, as that no other person or body of men have, by divine institution, a power to exercise any superior or pastoral office in it, may, properly speaking, be called (so far at least) congregational; and it is by a vulgar mistake that any such are called Presbyterians; for the Presbyterian discipline is exercised by synods and assemblies, subordinate to each other, and all of them subject to the authority of what is commonly called a general assembly. The appellation Presbyterian is, in England, appropriated to a large denomination of dissenters, who have no attachment to the Scotch mode of Church-government any more than to Episcopacy; and therefore to this body of Christians, the term Presbyterian, in its original sense, is improperly applied. How this misapplication came to pass, cannot be easily determined, but it has occasioned many wrong notions, and should, therefore, be rectified. English Presbyterians, as they are called, adopt the same mode of Church-government with the Independents, from whom they differ chiefly in that they are less attached to Calvinism, and consequently admit a greater latitude of religious sentiment.'

The first Presbytery in England was erected at Wandsworth, in Surrey, November 20, 1572, which first establishment, as already observed, was called the 'Order of Wandsworth,' by Field, their minister. Many of the English who had fled to Geneva, Frankfort, &c. during the persecution under Queen Mary, returned to England, in the reign of Elizabeth, with strong prepossessions in favour of Calvinistic doctrines and forms; and being dissatisfied with the Established Church, because, in their opinion, it was not formed after a pure model, produced a sect of non-conformists, then denominated Puritans. They were restless; the age was intolerant; the queen hostile, and despotic in the use of prerogative; hence they were treated, perhaps, with harshness and injustice. From James, though a warm friend to Episcopacy, they experienced greater humanity and mildness. In the reign of Charles I., they met with opposition and vexation from Archbishop Laud, who regarded them with no favourable eye. Yet their party gradually derived strength from the public measures of the day, and other concurring circumstances, and had a leading share in precipitating the kingdom into civil war. In the course of the conflict they were depressed and supplanted by the more recent sect of Independents; and both Puritans or Presbyterians, and Independents, harassed, in every possible way, the National Church, and ultimately succeeded in abolishing Episcopacy, and ejecting the episcopal clergy. Under Cromwell, who was alike averse to Episcopacy and Presbyterianism, though he found it expedient to show favour to the latter, the Church was delivered to the management of a set of commissioners, consisting partly of Presbyterians and partly of Independents. They were to examine and approve all those who were to be admitted to benefices; and they disposed of all the livings which had been in the gift of the crown, of the bishops, and of cathedral churches. For a time the profession of Episcopacy was not even tolerated by the Presbyterians; but, upon the restoration of Charles II., an event which they profess to have themselves chiefly brought about, the Church of England resumed its ancient form and government; and, by the Act of Uniformity, upwards of two thousand of the clergy, attached to Presbyterian discipline, relinquished their cures in one day.

The modern Presbyterians, so called in England, different from their ancestors, whose turbulence and intolerance they profess to condemn, are perhaps as loyal subjects, and every way as upright and inoffensive in their conduct, as any of their neighbours. We are told, that they, and even the Protestant dissenters in general, 'are now friends to universal liberty in religion;' and that 'no denomination among them wishes to have its own way of worship established as the national religion.' Because they disclaim all human authority in matters of religion, some have inferred that they also disclaim all human authority in civil matters, and have contracted a fondness for equality and republican maxims in the State. But this inference bespeaks neither sound logic nor Christian charity; nor is it well grounded on fact and experience. On the contrary, the present race of dissenters are by no means enemies to the civil government, or to the constitution of this country in particular. They have, indeed, at all times been determined enemies to arbitrary power; but, happily, this has long ceased to be a distinction between British subjects; and since a well-defined freedom has limited the prerogative of the crown, the throne has not perhaps had more faithful supporters than have been found among dissenters from the Church of England. Adam's Religious World Displayed, vol. iii. pp. 44—48.

PRIDE is an inordinate and unreasonable self-esteem, attended with insolence, and rude treatment of others. In some persons there is a lust of distinction which cannot endure an equal, and burns with a vehement desire to level the pre-eminence of every superior. In whatever degree this disposition may prevail, and whatever direction it may take, and whether it be seen in the loftier soarings and grander projects, or only in the more petty longings and diminutive exertions of an ambitious spirit, it is combined with a desire to eclipse the worth, or to deduct from the excellence, of those above, or those on a level, of ability or merit with itself. Pride, which swells the imagination of our own worth, will not suffer us to see, or will make us anxious to obscure, the worth of others. Hence we discern one reason why our Saviour so repeatedly and so forcibly enjoined us to be lowly in heart, and to think humbly of ourselves; for this disposition, while it fosters the sensation of benevolence, is what alone can induce us to think less unworthily of our neighbour; to commend genius and virtue wherever they are seen; to render honour to whom honour, and praise to whom praise, is due. Every extravagant conceit of our own proficiency in any attainment, while it is utterly incompatible with that spirit of humility which is placed so high in the scale of Christian excellence, must excite a proportionate desire to decry, or propensity to underrate, the attainments of others. The more greedy we are of praise, the less willing we are to bestow it; and the more blind we are to our own defects, with the keener eye do we survey, and with the greater severity do we condemn, the defects of our neighbour.

Pride is one of the causes which greatly tend to increase the acrimony of our discontent; and, consequently, that which acts in an opposite direction, and gives a different tone to the sensations, must contribute to the production of a contented disposition. Pride, while it inflames the sense of injury, sharpens the feeling of suffering. In proportion to the exalted opinion which we have of ourselves, to the fond conceit which we entertain, or the extravagant estimate which we form of our own dignity or importance, will be our own resentment of wrong, and our impatience of affliction. Pride, which aggrandizes the sense of merit, renders us only the more sensible to every appearance of neglect: and who can wonder that the most bitter discontent should be occasioned by those calamities and pains which we think undeserved, or by the wanton infliction of injustice and of cruelty? But when we are lowly in heart, and think not of ourselves above what we ought to think, we are less apt to resent the wrongs of man, or to repine with angry impatience at the inflictions of God. Where pride rules, the sensations are easily ruffled by the most trivial causes; but humility generates that gentle composure of the feelings, and that benignity of the affections, which favour the production of content, and disposes us to submit with pious equanimity to the vicissitudes of life.

Pride renders men foolish and void of caution, negligent and improvident, obstinate and insolent. It involves them in strife and contention, which are inconsistent with true happiness. It disoblige our best friends, and affords our enemies an advantage over us. It makes men impatient of good advice and instruction, and incorrigible in their vices. It hinders them from examining impartially into the truth of religion, and renders them incapable of religious improvements; and it causes them to take offence at the plainness and simplicity of the Gospel. Pride is also extremely hateful to God, who declares by the prophet, that 'the lofty looks of man shall be humbled, and the haughtiness of men shall be bowed down.'

If our civil stations tempt us to a proud and haughty behaviour, we ought to consider, that God accepteth not the persons of princes, nor regardeth the rich more than the poor; for they are all the work of his hands. Let us also remember the vanity and uncertainty of those things in which we pride ourselves; that all flesh is grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass; the grass withereth, and the flower thereof fadeth away. Let the rich man rejoice, in that he is made low; because, as the flower of the grass, he shall pass away. Let us likewise consider, that if we are placed in high stations, we have a larger account to give to God; and that it will not be long before death and judgment will level all worldly distinctions; when the greatest wicked men will say, What hath pride profited us? or what hath riches with her vaunting brought us? All these things are passed away as a shadow, and as a post that hasteth by. If we are proud of our learning, or wisdom, it may humble us to consider, to what a small degree of these things we can attain. If it were possible to attain much more, yet there is something far more excellent: for knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth; and if any man think he knoweth any thing, he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know.

If any advantages in religious improvements tempt us to spiritual pride and vain-glory, to judge or despise our weaker brethren, let us consider, that all the members of Christ are useful in their several stations; that how great soever our abilities or advantages may be, yet that we are not even by the means of these 'sufficient of ourselves to think any thing as of ourselves, but our sufficiency is of God;' for what have we, that we did not receive from God's free bounty and goodness? Let us further consider, in order to abate our spiritual pride, and contempt of our weaker brethren, who differ from us in matters of opinion, that there is a day coming, which will distinguish men by their works of piety and true holiness only; when men's foolish pride and arrogance shall be entirely confounded, and those who with scorn beheld others as infinitely below them, shall be placed on an equality with those they despised. How great soever our improvements are, even in real virtue and goodness, yet we have continual reason to take heed lest we fall; and whilst we stand the most upright, we have nothing in which to glory before God. For can a man be justified with God? The greatest and most eminently pious men have been exemplarily humble in this respect. Holy Job refused to justify himself before God; Abraham styled himself dust and ashes; Jacob acknowledges that he is less than the least of God's mercies; and St. Paul calls himself the least of all saints, having been a persecutor of the church of God.

Pride was not made for man. He has so many defects in his character, so many infirmities to acknowledge, so many sins and follies to answer for, that it may seem strange how pride could ever steal into his heart, or even enter into his thoughts. If angels might be dazzled by the lustre of their own perfections, yet this is not the case with man. Can pride kindle in corruption? or a flame of ambition burst forth in sinful dust and ashes? We indeed aspire to great things, glory in our strength and worth, who are related to the very worms, and destined for their prey. But can so low, so humble a condition, be a proper soil for pride and vanity, arrogance and ambition? Since then the proud man violates the order of the creation, disturbs the harmony of the world, and resists the appointments of Heaven, it naturally follows, in truth and righteousness, that God will resist, and in time effectually humble him. Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. ii. pp. 360, 361, 492, 493; Warner's System of Divinity and Morality, vol. iii. pp. 166—172.

PRIEST, the general name for the minister of religion, in all ages and countries. In the Old Testament, the priesthood was not annexed to a certain family, till after the promulgation of the law of Moses. Before that time, the first-born of each family, the fathers, the princes, the kings, were born priests, in their own cities, and in their own houses. Cain and Abel, Noah, Abraham, and Job, Abimelech and Laban, Isaac and Jacob, offered, personally, their own sacrifices. In the solemnity of the covenant made by the Lord with his people, at the foot of Mount Sinai, Moses performed the office of mediator, and young men were chosen from among the children of Israel, to perform the office of priests. (Exod. xxiv. 5, 6.)

But after the Lord had chosen the tribe of Levi to serve him in his tabernacle, and the priesthood was annexed to the family of Aaron, then the right of offering sacrifices to God was reserved to the priests of this family. (Numb. xvi. 40.) The punishment of Uzziah, king of Judah (2 Chr. xxvi. 19.) is well known, who, having presumed to offer incense to the Lord, was suddenly smitten with a leprosy. However, it seems that on certain occasions the judges and kings of the Hebrews offered sacrifices to the Lord, especially before a constant place of worship was fixed at Jerusalem; and Samuel, (1 Sam. vii. 9.) who was no priest, offered a lamb for a burnt-sacrifice to the Lord. It is also said (1 Sam. ix. 13.) that Samuel was to bless the offering of the people; which should seem to be a function appropriated to the priests. Lastly (1 Sam. xvi. 5.), he goes to Bethlehem, where he offers a sacrifice at the anointing of David.

Saul himself offers a burnt-offering to the Lord, perhaps as being king of Israel. (1 Sam. xiii. 9, 10.) Elijah also offered a burnt-offering on Mount Carmel. (1 Kings xviii. 33.) David himself sacrificed—at least the text expresses it so—at the ceremony of bringing the ark to Jerusalem, (2 Sam. vi. 13.) and at the floor of Araunah. (2 Sam. xxiv. 25.) Solomon went up to the brazen altar at Gibeon, and there offered sacrifices. (2 Chron. i. 6.) These passages are commonly explained, by supposing that these princes offered these sacrifices by the hands of the priests; but the text by no means favours such explication; and it is very natural to imagine, that in the quality of kings and heads of the people, they had the privilege of performing some sacerdotal functions on certain extraordinary occasions. So we see David consulted the Lord, being clothed with the priestly ephod; and on another occasion he gave a solemn benediction to the people. His son Solomon also did the same. (1 Sam. xxiii. 9.; xxx. 7. 2 Sam. vi. 14. 18. 1 Kings viii. 55, 56.) See EPHOD.

The Lord having reserved to himself the first-born of Israel, because he had preserved them from the hand of the destroying angel in Egypt, by way of exchange and compensation, accepted the tribe of Levi for the service of his tabernacle. (Numb. iii. 41.) Thus the whole tribe of Levi was appointed to the sacred ministry; but not all in the same manner; for of the three sons of Levi, Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, the heads of the three great families, the Lord chose the family of Kohath, and out of this family the house of Aaron, to exercise the functions of the priesthood. All the rest of the family of Kohath, even the children of Moses, and their descendants, remained among the mere Levites. See LEVITES.

The high-priest was at the head of all religious affairs, and was the ordinary judge of all difficulties belonging to them, and even of the general justice and judgment of the Jewish nation. (Deut. xvii. 8, 9, 10, 11, 12.; xix. 17.; xxi. 5.; xxxiii. 9, 10. Ezek. xlv. 24.) The high-priest only had the privilege of entering into the sanctuary once a year, on the day of solemn expiation, to make atonement for the sins of the whole people. (Lev. xvi. 2, 3, 4, &c.) See EXP-AT-ION. He was to be born of one of his own tribe, whom his father had married a virgin; and was to be exempt from corporal defect. (Lev. xxi. 13.) In general, no priest that had any corporal defect could offer sacrifice, or enter the holy place, to present the shew-bread. He was to be maintained by the sacrifices offered at the tabernacle. (Lev. xxi. 21, 22, 23.)

God had appropriated to the person of the high-priest the oracle of his truth; so that when he was habited in the proper ornaments of his dignity, and with the urim and thummim, he answered questions proposed to him, and God discovered to him secret and future things. He was forbidden to mourn for the death of any of his relations, even for his father or mother; or to enter into any place where a dead body lay, that he might not contract uncleanness. He could not marry a widow, nor a woman who had been divorced, nor a harlot; but a virgin only of his own race. He was to observe a strict continence during the whole time of his service.

The ordinary priests served immediately at the altar, offered the sacrifices, killed and skinned them, and poured their blood at the foot of the altar. They kept up a perpetual fire on the altar of burnt-sacrifices, and in the lamps of the golden candlestick in the sanctuary; they kneaded the loaves of shew-bread, baked them, offered them on the golden altar in the sanctuary, and changed them every sabbath-day. Every day, night and morning, a priest, appointed by casting lots at the beginning of the week, brought into the sanctuary a smoking censer of incense, and set it on the golden table, otherwise called the altar of perfumes.

The priests were not suffered to offer incense to the Lord with strange fire, that is, with any fire but what was taken from the altar of burnt-sacrifices. (Lev. x. 1, 2.) God chastised Nadab and Abihu with severity for having failed in this. The priests and Levites waited by the week, and by the quarter, in the temple. They began their week on the sabbath, and ended it on the next sabbath. (2 Kings xi. 5. 7.) Those who dedicated themselves to perpetual service in the temple were well received, and maintained by the daily offerings. (Deut. xviii. 6.)

It is not certainly known at what age the priests entered upon and retired from their office. With respect to the Levites, it is evident, from the nature of the business they had to perform, the law particularly respected that age when man is in his prime and vigour. But why should the age of these men be specified, and no notice taken of the age at which the priests, the sons of Aaron, commenced or ceased from their ministry? (1.) Aaron had only four sons, two of whom had already fallen victims to divine wrath. There were then only two who remained, and assisted their father in the discharge of his office. Is it not probable, that the younger of these sons was now above thirty? and if so, there was no necessity of giving a law expressly to restrain these from the exercise of the priest's office till that period. (2.) Is it not probable, that, when the sons of Aaron had multiplied so prodigiously as they had in the time of David, the same law would be applied to them as was to the Levites? Their office was more important than that of the Levites, and required the steadiness, gravity, and wisdom of mature life, to discharge it with propriety. It is reasonable to suppose that David, when he divided the priests into twenty-four courses, paid some respect to the age in which they began to officiate. Since no express law exists on the subject, what forbids us to think that the law given to the Levites was applied to the priests? Grotius on Luke (iii. 23.) says: 'Following the example of the Hebrew law, and of his Lord, Justinian enacted, that he who should be eligible to the episcopal office, should have passed his thirtieth year. Formerly not even a presbyter was chosen before that age.' Did the high-priest, while living and able to officiate, give up his office to another? (2 Chron. xxiv. 15.) It is not, perhaps, improbable that the priests officiated as long as they lived.

The Lord had given no lands of inheritance to the tribe of Levi, in the Land of Promise. He intended that they should be supported by the tithes, the first-fruits, the offerings made in the temple, and by their share of the sin-offerings, and thanksgiving-offerings, sacrificed in the temple, of which certain parts were appropriated to the priests. In the peace-offerings the priests had the shoulder and the breast. (Levit. vii. 33, 34.) In the sin-offerings they burnt on the altar the fat that covers the bowels, the liver, and the kidneys: the rest belonged to the priest. (Levit. vii. 6—10.) The skin or fleece of every sacrifice also belonged to him; and this article alone was no mean allowance. When an Israelite killed any animal for his own use, he was to give the priest the shoulder, the stomach, and the jaws. (Deut. xviii. 3.) He had also a share in the wool when the sheep were shorn. (xviii. 4.) All the first-born, both of man and beast, belonged to the Lord, that is, to his priests. The men were redeemed for five shekels. (Numb. xviii. 15, 16.) The first-born of impure animals were redeemed or exchanged, but the clean animals were not redeemed. They were sacrificed to the Lord; their blood was sprinkled about the altar, and the rest belonged to the priest. The first-fruit of trees, that is, those of the fourth year, belonged also to the priests. (Numb. xviii. 13. Lev. xix. 23, 24.) See FIRST-BORN AND FIRST-FRUIT.

The people offered at the temple the first-fruits of the earth; the quantity was fixed by custom, to between the fortieth and the sixtieth part. They offered whatever any one had vowed to the Lord. They gave to the priests and Levites an allowance out of their kneaded dough. They also had the tithe of the fruits of the land, and of all animals which passed under the shepherd's crook. (Lev. xxvi. 31, 32.) When the Levites had collected all the tithes, and all the first-fruits, they set apart the tithe of this for the priests. (Numb. xviii. 26.) Thus, though the priests had no lands or inheritances, they lived in great plenty. God also provided them with houses and accommodations, by appointing forty-eight cities for their habitation. (Numb. xxxv. 1, 2, 3.) In the precincts of these cities they possessed a thousand cubits beyond the walls. Of these forty-eight cities, six were appointed as cities of refuge, for those who had committed casual and involuntary manslaughter. The priests had thirteen of these cities; the others belonged to the Levites. (Josh. xxi. 19, 20.)

A principal employment of the priests, next to attending on the sacrifices and the temple service, was instruction of the people, and deciding controversies, distinguishing the several sorts of leprosy, divorce-causes, the waters of jealousy, vows, causes relating to the law, and uncleanness: all these things were brought before the priests. (Mal. ii. 7.) They publicly blessed the people in the name of the Lord. In time of war their duty was to carry the ark of the covenant, to consult the Lord, to sound the holy trumpets, and to encourage the army. (Numb. x. 8, 9. Deut. xx. 2, 3, 4.)

The consecration of Aaron and of his sons was performed by Moses in the desert with great solemnity. (Exod. xl. 12. Lev. viii. 1, 2, &c.) In this ceremony Moses performed the office of consecrating the priests. It is doubtful, whether at every new consecration of a high-priest all these ceremonies were repeated. It is very probable they contented themselves with clothing the new high-priest in the habit of his predecessor, as at the death of Aaron. (Numb. xx. 25, 26.) Yet some think they gave him unction also, which, perhaps, might be, till the Babylonish captivity, though there is no proof of this fact. As to the ordinary priests, we do not see any particular ceremony used at their consecration; they were admitted to the exercise of their function by making them perform the offices of their order. But when the priests had fallen away from the Lord, or had been long without performing their office, as happened under some of the later kings of Judah, as Ahaz, Amon, and Manasseh, they thought it necessary to sanctify anew such priests, who had been absent from the holy place, and who, for a long time, had interrupted the exercise of their ministry, like those who had never exercised it.

The Christian priesthood is the substance and the truth, of which that of the Jews was only the shadow and the figure. Jesus Christ the everlasting priest, according to the order of Melchisedek, abides for ever, as St. Paul observes; whereas the priests, according to the order of Aaron, were mortal, and, therefore, could not continue long. (Heb. vii. 23, 24, &c.)

Continuation, collected from Ezra, Nehemiah, and Josephus.

29. Joachim, under the reign of Xerxes. Joseph. Ant. lib. xi. cap. 5.

30. Eliasib, Joasib, or Chasib, under Nehemiah, in 3550.

31. Joiada, or Juda. (Nehemiah xii. 10.)

32. Jonathan, or John.

33. Jeddoa, or Jaddus, who received Alexander the Great at Jerusalem in 3673, and died in 3682.

34. Onias I. made high-priest in 3681, governed 21 years, and died in 3702.

35. Simon I. called the Just, in 3702, or 3703, and died in 3711.

36. Eleazar, in 3712. Under this pontiff, they tell us, that the translation of the Septuagint was made, about the year 3727; he died in 3744.

37. Manasseh, in 3745, died in 3771.

38. Onias II. in 3771, died in 3785.

39. Simon II. in 3785, died in 3805.

40. Onias III. in 3805, deposed in 3829.

41. Jesus, or Jason, in 3830, deposed in 3831.

42. Onias IV. otherwise called Menelaus, in 3832, died in 3842.

43. Lysimachus, vice-gerent to Menelaus, killed in 3834.

44. Alcimus, or Jacimus, or Joachim, in 3842, died in 3844.

45. Onias V. He did not exercise his pontificate at Jerusalem, but retired into Egypt, where he built the temple Onion, in 3854.

46. Judas Maccabeus restored the altar and the sacrifices in 3840, died in 3843.

47. Jonathan the Asmonæan, brother to Judas Maccabeus, created high-priest in 3843, and died in 3860.

48. Simon Maccabeus, made in 3860, died in 3869.

49. John Hyrcanus, made in 3869, died in 3898.

50. Aristobulus, king and pontiff of the Jews, died in 3899.

51. Alexander Jannæus, also king and pontiff for 27 years, from 3899 to 3926.

52. Hyrcanus was high-priest for 32 years in all, from 3926 to 3958.

53. Aristobulus, brother of Hyrcanus, usurped the high-priesthood, three years and three months, from 3935 to 3940.

54. Antigonus his son also usurped the priesthood, in prejudice to the rights of Hyrcanus, and possessed it for three years and seven months, from 3964 to 3967, when he was taken by Sosius.

55. Ananeel of Babylon, made high-priest by Herod in 3968 till 3970.

56. Aristobulus, the last of the Asmonæans, did not enjoy the pontificate a whole year. He died in 3970. Ananeel was made high-priest a second time in 3971.

57. Jesus, the son of Phabis, deposed in 3981.

58. Simon, son of Boethus, made in 3981, deposed in 3999.

59. Matthias, son of Theophilus, made in 3999.

60. Joazar, son of Simon, son of Boethus, made high-priest in 4000, the year of the birth of Jesus Christ, four years before the beginning of the vulgar era.

61. Eleazar, brother to Joazar, made high-priest in 4004, A.D. 1.

62. Jesus, son of Siah, made high-priest, A.D. 6. Joazar was made a second time, A.D. 7, and deposed in 13.

63. Ananus, son of Seth, for eleven years, from 4016 to 4027, A.D. 24.

64. Ishmael, son of Phabi, A.D. 24.

65. Eleazar, son of Ananus, made, A.D. 24.

66. Simon, son of Camithus, made, A.D. 25.

67. Joseph, surnamed Caiaphas, made, A.D. 26, and continued till A.D. 35.

68. Jonathan, son of Ananus, made, A.D. 35, and continued till A.D. 37.

69. Theophilus, son of Jonathan, made, A.D. 37, and continued till A.D. 41.

70. Simon, surnamed Cantharus, and son of Simon Boethus, made, A.D. 41.

71. Matthias, son of Ananus, made, A.D. 42.

72. Elioneus made, A.D. 44, till A.D. 45. Simon, son of Cantharus, a second time made high-priest, A.D. 45, and deposed the same year.

73. Joseph, son of Caneus, made, A.D. 45, till A.D. 47.

74. Ananias, son of Nebedeus, made, A.D. 47, till A.D. 63.

75. Ishmael, son of Phabeus, made, A.D. 63.

76. Joseph, surnamed Cabeï, the same year, A.D. 63.

77. Ananus, son of Ananus, the same year, A.D. 63.

78. Jesus, son of Ananus, made, A.D. 64.

79. Jesus, Son of Gamaliel, the same year, A.D. 64.

80. Matthias, son of Theophilus, made, A.D. 70.

81. Phannias, son of Samuel, made, A.D. 70, the year of the destruction of the temple at Jerusalem by the Romans, and of the abolition of the Jewish priesthood.

PRIESTHOOD, Sacerdotium. We may distinguish four kinds of priesthood. 1. That of kings, princes, the head of a family, and the first-born. This may be called a natural priesthood, because nature and reason teach us that the honour of offering sacrifices to God should belong to the greatest in dignity.

2. The priesthood, according to the order of Melchisedek, which does not differ from that now mentioned, but in its dignity. The priesthood of Melchisedek combined in the same person the right of the kingly and of the priestly offices, with that of the first-born, to exercise the priesthood; or, he was at once king, priest, and prophet, that is, teacher.

3. The priesthood of Aaron and his family, which subsisted as long as the religion of the Jews. See AARON and PRIEST.

4. Lastly, the priesthood of Jesus Christ, and of the new law.

As to the priesthood of Jesus Christ, it is infinitely superior to all other, in its duration, its dignity, its prerogatives, its object, and its power. The priesthood of Aaron was to end, but that of Jesus Christ is everlasting. That of Aaron was limited to his own family, was exercised only in the temple, and among only one people; its object was bloody sacrifices and purifications, which were only external, and could not remit sins; but the priesthood of Jesus Christ extends to the whole Christian church, spread over the face of the whole earth, and among all nations of the world. The epistle of St. Paul to the Hebrews should be considered by those who would comprehend the excellence of the priesthood of the new law, above that of the law of Moses. (Heb. iv. 14, 15, &c.; v. vi. vii. viii. ix. ¹ Pet. ii. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9.)

PRISCILLA, Πρίσκιλλα, from Prisca. Priscilla or Prisca, (2 Tim. iv. 19.) a Christian woman, well known in the Acts, and in St. Paul's epistles; sometimes placed before her husband Aquila. From Ephesus they went to Rome, where they were when St. Paul wrote his epistle to the Romans, A.D. 58. He salutes them first of all, with great commendations. (Rom. xvi. 3, 4.) They returned into Asia some time afterwards, and St. Paul, writing to Timothy, desires him to salute them on his account, (2 Tim. iv. 19.) A.D. 65.

PRISCILLIANISTS, in the fourth century, derived their denomination from Priscillian, a man of rank and fortune in Spain, who was afterwards Bishop of Abila. A considerable mixture of Gnosticism and Unitarianism appears to have been united in this sect, with the tenets of both which, however, they were but imperfectly acquainted. They thought that the devil was not made by God, but arose from chaos and darkness; said that the bodies of men were made by the devil; condemned marriage, and denied the resurrection of the body; asserted that the soul was of a Divine substance, which, having offended in heaven, was sent into the body as a place of punishment; that men are subject to necessity, to sin, and to the power of the stars; and our bodies compounded according to the order of the twelve signs of the Zodiac. They agreed that the Son is inferior to the Father, and that there was a time when the Son was not. The rule of manners prescribed by this sect was remarkably austere. Priscillian, their leader, was accused by the other Spanish bishops, in consequence of the increase of his followers; and he was banished by the emperor Gratian from Spain. He was again, however, permitted to return; but he was once more accused by his implacable enemies, and put to death at Treves, in the year 384, by the perfidious Maximus, at the instigation of Ithacius, Bishop of Sossoba; who, whatever might be the professed purity of his faith, was deficient in every amiable quality of the human heart. The opinions of the Priscillianists did not end with the death of their erroneous and unfortunate leader, but extended their influence, and continued during several succeeding centuries. Gregory's Hist. of the Christian Church, vol. i. pp. 209, 210.

PROCESSION, a ceremony in the Romish church, consisting of a formal march of the clergy and people, putting up prayers, &c., and in this manner visiting some church, &c. They have processions of the host, or sacrament; of our Saviour to Mount Calvary; of the Rosary, &c.

Processions are said to be of Pagan origin. The Romans, when the empire was distressed, or after some victory, used constantly to order processions, for several days together, to be made to the temples, to beg the assistance of the gods, or to return them thanks.

The first processions, mentioned in ecclesiastical history, are those begun at Constantinople by St. Chrysostom. The Arians of that city, being forced to hold their meetings without the town, went thither night and morning, singing anthems. Chrysostom, to prevent their perverting the Catholics, set up counter-processions, in which the clergy and people marched by night, singing prayers and hymns, and carrying crosses and flambeaus. From this period the custom of processions was introduced among the Greeks, and afterwards among the Latins; but they have subsisted longer, and been more frequently used in the western than in the eastern church. Broughton's Dict. of all Religions, vol. ii. p. 283.

PROCESSION of the HOLY GHOST, a term used in reference to the Holy Ghost, as proceeding from the Father and the Son. The word procession is used only in naming the relation of the Spirit to the Father and the Son, in such a manner as may best correspond with the sense of the word Spirit; for it must be confessed we can have no explicit idea of this matter. We must therefore speak of it either in Scripture words, or in such as arise out of them, and have the same signification. Hence it is a vain attempt to give a reason why the second Person is said to be generated, and so is called Son, and the third to proceed, and so is called Spirit.

'Though it be not expressly spoken in the Scripture that the Holy Ghost proceedeth from the Son, yet the substance of the same truth is virtually contained there; because those very expressions which are spoken of the Holy Spirit in relation to the Father, for that reason, because he proceedeth from the Father, are also spoken of the same Spirit in relation to the Son; and therefore there must be the same reason presupposed in reference to the Son, which is expressed in reference to the Father. Because the Spirit proceedeth from the Father, therefore it is called the Spirit of God, and the Spirit of the Father. (Matt. x. 20. 1 Cor. ii. 11, 12.) Now the same Spirit is also called the Spirit of the Son. (Gal. iv. 6. Rom. viii. 9. 1 Pet. i. 11. Philip i. 19.) If, then, the Holy Ghost be called the Spirit of God and the Father, because he proceedeth from the Father, it followeth that, being called also the Spirit of the Son, he proceedeth also from the Son.

'Again, because the Holy Ghost proceedeth from the Father, he is therefore sent by the Father, (John xiv. 26.); as from him who hath by the original communication a right of mission; but the same Spirit which is sent by the Father is also sent by the Son, as he saith, When the Comforter is come whom I will send unto you. (John xv. 26.) Therefore the Son hath the same right of mission with the Father, and consequently must be acknowledged to have communicated the same essence. Both the Father and the Son send the Holy Ghost, because the divine nature common to both the Father and the Son was communicated by them both to the Holy Ghost. As therefore the Scriptures declare expressly, that the Spirit proceedeth from the Father; so do they also virtually teach, that he proceedeth from the Son.'

'That the procession of the Holy Ghost, both from the Father and the Son, was the doctrine of the whole primitive church is very clearly established by Bishop Pearson. He admits that the Greek fathers have not directly asserted that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Son, but he shows that the expressions which they have used have that meaning. And Dr. Nicholls has proved the same thing by many quotations both from the Latin and Greek ecclesiastical writers, and also by reference to the acts of several councils; and in particular it may be observed, that at the councils of Alexandria and Ephesus, which were held as early as the years 430 and 431, it was declared that the Holy Ghost proceeded from the Son as well as from the Father. This doctrine was also the subject of a warm and long controversy, and became the cause of the great schism between the eastern and western churches, the former maintaining that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father only, and the latter that he proceeds from the Father and the Son. This still continues to be one of the points of difference between the Greek church and that of Rome.' PROPHECY, the prediction of future events. Prophecy, in the scriptural idea of it, implies the divine agency; not merely in giving the faculty itself, but in directing all its operations. It is very clear in what manner common sense instructs us to prosecute all inquiries into the divine conduct. Wise men collect, from what they see done in the system of nature, so far as they are able to collect it, the intention of its Author. They will conclude in like manner, from what they find delivered in the system of revelation, what the views and purposes of the Revealer were.

Prophecy, which makes so considerable a part of that system, must, therefore, be its own interpreter. Setting aside all presumptuous imaginations of our own, we are to take our ideas of what prophecy should be, from what, in fact, we find it to have been. If it be true, as the apostle says, and as the thing itself speaks, that 'the things of God knoweth no man but the Spirit of God,' there cannot be any way of acquiring right notions of prophecy, except by attending to what the Spirit of prophecy hath revealed of itself. They, who admit the divine origin of those Scriptures, which attest the reality, and alone, as they suppose, contain the records of this extraordinary dispensation, are more than absurd, are impious, if they desert this principle; and they, who reject or controvert their claim to such origin, cannot, on any other principle, argue pertinently against that dispensation. To the Scriptures, therefore, we must have recourse for all the information we would have respecting the use and intent of prophecy.

It would be endless to enumerate all the prophecies of the Old Testament, which have been supposed to refer to Jesus ; and the controversy concerning the application of some prophecies to him may be thought difficult. But it is very certain that the Jews, before the coming of Christ, gave this construction to their Scriptures ; they even looked beyond the letter of their sacred books, and conceived the testimony of the Messiah to be the soul and end of the commandment. The spirit of prophecy was so firmly believed to intend that testimony, that the expectation was general of some such person as Jesus to appear among them, and at the very time in which he made his appearance. The whole tenor of the sacred writings implies this fact, that prophecy, in general, has its ultimate accomplishment in the history and dispensation of Jesus. If we look into the writings of the Old and New Testament, we find that prophecy is of a prodigious extent : that it commenced from the lapse of man, and reaches to the consummation of all things ; that, for many ages, it was delivered darkly to few persons, and with large intervals from the date of one prophecy to that of another ; but, at length, became more clear, more frequent, and was uniformly carried on in the line of one people separated from the rest of the world, among other reasons assigned, for this principally, to be the repository of the divine oracles ; that, with some intermission, the spirit of prophecy subsisted among that people, to the coming of Christ ; that he himself and his apostles exercised this power in the most conspicuous manner, and left behind them many predictions recorded in the books of the New Testament, which profess to respect very distant events, and even run out to the end of time, or, in St. John's expression, to that period, ' when the mystery of God shall be perfected.'

The argument from prophecy is not to be formed from the consideration of single prophecies, but from all the prophecies taken together, and considered as making one system ; in which, from the mutual dependence and connexion of its parts, preceding prophecies prepare and illustrate those which follow, and these, again, reflect light on the foregoing : just as, in any philosophical system, that which shows the solidity of it, is the harmony and correspondence of the whole, not the application of it, in particular instances. Hence, though the evidence be but small, from the completion of any one prophecy, taken separately, yet, that evidence being always something, the amount of the whole evidence, resulting from a great number of prophecies, all relative to the same design, may be considerable, like many scattered rays, which, though each be weak in itself, yet, concentrated into one point, shall form a strong light, and strike the sense very powerfully. This evidence is not simply a growing evidence, but is, indeed, multiplied upon us, from the number of reflected lights, which the several component parts of such a system reciprocally throw upon each ; till, at length, the conviction rises into a high degree of moral certainty.

'It cannot be supposed,' says Bishop Sherlock, 'that God delivered prophecies only to satisfy or employ the curiosity of the inquisitive, or that he gave his Spirit to men merely to enable them to give forth predictions for the amusement and entertainment of the world ; there must be some end worthy of the Author. Now, what end could this be but to keep alive in the minds of those to whom it was given, a sense of religion, and a hope of a future deliverance from the curse of the fall through Jesus Christ?' 'The uses of prophecy,' says Dr. Jortin, 'besides gradually opening and unfolding the things relating to the Messiah, and the blessings which by him should be conferred upon mankind, are many, great, and manifest. 1. It served to secure the belief of a God, and of a providence. As God is invisible and spiritual, there was cause to fear, that in the first and ruder ages of the world, when men were busier in cultivating the earth, than in cultivating arts and sciences, and in seeking the necessities of life, than in the study of morality, they might forget their Creator and Governor ; and, therefore, God maintained among them the great article of faith in him, by manifestations of himself, by sending angels to declare his will, by miracles, and by prophecies. 2. It was intended to give men the profoundest veneration for that amazing knowledge from which nothing was concealed, not even the future actions of creatures, and the things which as yet were not. How could a man hope to hide any counsel, any design, or thought, from such a Being ? 3. It contributed to keep up devotion and true religion, the religion of the heart, which consists partly in entertaining just and honourable notions of God, and of his perfections, and which is a more rational and a more acceptable service than rites and ceremonies. 4. It excited men to rely upon God, and to love him, who condescended to hold this mutual intercourse with his creatures, and to permit them to consult him as one friend asks advice of another. 5. It was intended to keep the people, to whom God revealed himself, from idolatry ; a sin to which the Jews would be inclined, both from the disposition to it, which they had acquired in Egypt, and from the contagion of bad example. The people of Israel were strictly forbidden to consult the diviners and the gods of other nations, and to use any enchantments and wicked arts ; and, that they might have no temptation to it, God permitted them to apply to him and to his prophets, even upon small occasions ; and he raised up among them a succession of prophets, to whom they might have resort for advice and direction. These prophets were revered abroad as well as at home, and consulted by foreign princes; and, in the times of the captivity, they were honoured by great kings, and advanced to high stations.'

'Certainly,' says Dr. Hurd, 'there is a Power which governs the world; which raises one family to the throne, and one nation to the supremacy; then, when this has answered the purposes for which it was exalted, transfers the sceptre of rule to a stranger, and produces, from obscurity into splendour and reputation, another person, or another people; maintains this also during its appointed time, and, when that time is expired, suffers it gradually to decay; or directs a new ambition to wrest from its enfeebled hand, and its palsied head, the ensigns of royalty, and the tokens of dignity. It is said, "kingdoms rise and fall by accident: if no superior Power interfered, would not their changes be just the same?" It is sufficient for us, without adverting to what might be, to answer by what is; and this subject deserves attention. We have lately seen infidel writers criticise books which they have not read, or which they had read many years before, and so criticise from memory; or which they had read so superficially, as scarcely amounts to a reading; and then retail unfounded observations, and dogmatical remarks, on what they should be entreated first to understand. Now, we suppose, that if we find certain events predicted, long before they happened; if they be so clearly described, that, when completed, the description determinately applies to the subject; if they be related by persons entirely unconcerned in the events, and expecting to be removed from the stage of life long before the event takes place; then we can demonstrate that some Power superior to humanity has been pleased to impart so much of its designs and counsels, as are referred to in such predictions. And where is the unfitness of this? May not a king, if he please, acquaint a person with his intention, that, after such an one has been governor of a province for so many years, he designs to send such another to be governor after him? or, that, after one person has held such an office during his appointed time, another shall succeed him? If this be nothing strange or uncommon in human concerns, may not this be applied to the divine government of the world?' Supplement. Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary; Buck's Theolog. Dictionary, vol. ii. pp. 329, 330; Hurd's Introduction to the Study of the Prophecies, pp. 3. 25—48, &c.

PROPHET, προφήτης, signifies that foretells events. The Hebrews originally called prophets seers, (1 Sam. ix. 9.); afterwards they called them nabi נביא, propheta, from the root nibba, to foretell, to divine. The Scripture often gives them the name of men of God or of angels, or messengers of the Lord. The verb nibba to prophesy, in the Hebrew, is of very great extent. Sometimes it signifies to foretell what is to come; at other times, to be inspired, to speak from God. God says to Moses, (Exod. vii. 1.) Aaron thy brother shall be thy prophet; he shall explain thy sentiments to the people. St. Paul in his Epistle to Titus (i. 12.) quoting a profane poet, calls him a prophet, because the Pagans thought that their poets were inspired. The Scripture often gives the name of prophet to impostors, who falsely boasted of inspiration.

As the true prophets, when transported by the energy of God's Spirit, were sometimes agitated in a violent manner, similar motions were called prophesying, when exhibited by persons who were filled with a good or evil spirit. Saul being moved by an evil spirit prophesied in his house. (1 Sam. xviii. 10.) To prophesy is also put for to sing, to dance, to play on instruments. 'Thou shalt meet a company of prophets,' says Samuel to Saul, "coming down from the high place, with a psaltery and a tabret, and a pipe, and a harp, before them, and they shall prophesy. And the Spirit of the Lord will come upon thee, and thou shalt prophesy with them, and shalt be turned into another man." (1 Sam. x. 5, 6.) We read (1 Chron. xxv. 1.) that the sons of Asaph were appointed to prophesy upon harps. This term is also used by St. Paul, (1 Cor. xi. 4, 5.; xiv. 1. 3, 4, &c.) for explaining Scripture, speaking to the Church in public; probably, because they who exercised these functions were regarded as replete with the Holy Ghost.

The most usual way by which God communicated himself to the prophets was inspiration, which consisted in illuminating the mind of the prophet, and exciting his will to proclaim what the Lord dictated to him. In this sense we acknowledge as prophets all the authors of the canonical books of Scripture, both of the Old and New Testament. God also communicated himself to the prophets by dreams and nocturnal visions. Joel (ii. 28.) promises to the people of the Lord, that their young men should see visions, and their old men should have prophetic dreams. St. Peter (Acts x. 11, 12.) fell into an ecstasy at noon-day, and had a revelation concerning the call of the Gentiles. The Lord appeared to Abraham, to Job, to Moses in a cloud, and discovered his will to them. He often made his voice to be heard articulately. Thus he spoke to Moses in the burning bush, and on Mount Sinai, and to Samuel in the night.

We have in the Old Testament the writings of sixteen prophets; that is, of four greater prophets, and twelve lesser prophets. The four greater prophets are Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel. The Jews do not properly place Daniel among the prophets, because (they say) he lived in the splendour of temporal dignities, and a kind of life different from other prophets. The twelve lesser prophets are, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Micah, Jonah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi.

The following is the chronological order in which the prophets may be ranged:—

1. Hosea, under Uziah, king of Judah, who began to reign in the year of the world 3194; and under Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and under Jeroboam II. king of Israel, and his successors, to the destruction of Samaria, in the year of the world 3283. Bishop Tomline says, that he began to prophesy about 800 years before Christ, and prophesied sixty years.

2. Amos, under Uziah, in the year of the world 3219, and about six years before the death of Jeroboam II., king of Israel, which happened in the year of the world 3220.

3. Isaiah, at the death of Uziah, and at the beginning of the reign of Jotham, king of Judah, in the year of the world 3246. It is probable that he continued to prophesy to the reign of Manasseh, in the year of the world 3306.

4. Jonah, under the kings Joash and Jeroboam II, in the kingdom of Israel, about the same time as Hosea, Isaiah, and Amos. Jeroboam II. died in the year of the world 3220. This is the opinion of Calmet. Bishop Tomline, however, says, that Jonah is generally considered as the most ancient of the prophets, and that he is supposed to have lived about 840 years before Christ.

5. Micah, under Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah. Jotham began to reign in the year of the world 3235, and Hezekiah died in 3306. Micah was contemporary with Isaiah, but began later to prophesy.

6. Nahum, under the reign of Hezekiah, and after the expedition of Sennacherib, that is, after the year of the world 3291.

7. Jeremiah, in the thirteenth year of Josiah, king of Judah, and in the year of the world 3375. Jeremiah continued to prophesy under Shallum, Jehoiakim, Jeconiah, and Zedekiah, to the taking of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, in the year of the world 3416. It is thought that he died two years after in Egypt, in 3418.

8. Zephaniah appeared at the beginning of the reign of Josiah, and before the twenty-eighth year of that prince, in the year of the world 3381; and even before the taking of Nineveh, in 3378.

9. Joel, under Josiah, about the same time as Jeremiah and Zephaniah; or it seems more probable, that he was contemporary with Hosea.

10. Daniel was taken into Chaldea, in the year of the world 3398, the fourth year of Jehoiakim, king of Judah. He prophesied at Babylon to the end of the captivity, in the year of the world 3468, and perhaps longer.

11. Ezekiel was carried captive to Babylon, with Jeconiah king of Judah, in the year of the world 3405. He began to prophesy in 3409. He continued about twenty-one years, or, as some think, till towards the end of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, who died in the year of the world 3442.

12. Habakkuk, in Judea, in the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim, about the year of the world 3394, and before the coming of Nebuchadnezzar in 3398.

13. Obadiah, in Judea, after the taking of Jerusalem, in the year of the world 3414, and before the desolation of Idumea, in 3410.

14. Haggai is supposed to have been born during the captivity. He returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem in consequence of the edict of Cyrus. He prophesied in the second year of Darius, son of Hystaspes, which was the year of the world 3484.

15. Zechariah prophesied in Judea at nearly the same time as Haggai, and appears to have continued after him.

16. Malachi has no date to his prophecies. If he was the same as Ezra, which is very probable, he may have prophesied under Nehemiah, who returned into Judea about the year of the world 3550. Dr. Kennicott says, that Malachi flourished about 420 years before Christ; and Bishop Tomline observes, that he prophesied about 400 years before Christ.

The following TABLE of BISHOP GRAY commodiously exhibits the Prophets in their supposed order of time, according to Archbishop Newcome and Blair, with a few variations.

| Names. | Before Christ. | Kings of Judah. | Kings of Israel. |
|--------|----------------------|---------------------|---|
| Jonah | Between 856 and 784. | | Jehu and Jehoahaz, according to Bishop Lloyd, but Jeroboam II. according to Blair. (2 Kings xiv. 25.) |
| Amos | Between 810 and 785. | Uzziah, chap. i. 1. | Jeroboam II. chap. i. 1. |

| Names. | Before Christ. | Kings of Judah. | Kings of Israel. |
|-----------|--------------------------------|--|--------------------------|
| Hosea | Between 810 and 725. | Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, the third year of Hezekiah. | Jeroboam II. chap. i. 1. |
| Isaiah | Between 810 and 698. | Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, chap. i. 1. and perhaps Manasseh. | |
| Joel | Between 810 and 660, or later. | Uzziah, or possibly Manasseh. | |
| Micah | Between 758 and 699. | Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, chap. i. 1. | Pekah and Hosea. |
| Nahum | Between 720 and 698. | Probably towards the close of Hezekiah's reign. | |
| Zephaniah | Between 640 and 609. | In the reign of Josiah, chap. i. 1. | |
| Jeremiah | Between 628 and 586. | In the thirteenth year of Josiah. | |
| Habakkuk | Between 612 and 598. | Probably in the reign of Jehoiakim. | |
| Daniel | Between 606 and 534. | During all the captivity. | |
| Obadiah | Between 588 and 583. | Between the taking of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, and the destruction of the Edomites by him. | |
| Ezekiel | Between 595 and 536. | During part of the captivity. | |
| Haggai | About 520 to 518. | After the return from Babylon. | |
| Zechariah | From 520 to 518, or longer. | | |
| Malachi | Between 436 and 420. | | |

According to this Table, the times when the prophets flourished may be referred to three periods:—1. Before the Babylonian Captivity;—2. Near to and during that event;—and 3. After the return of the Jews from Babylon.

A late writer, speaking of the prophets, observes, that 'to these messengers of Heaven frequent reference is made in the historical parts of holy writ. They had different offices, and enjoyed different portions of the divine communication; but the moderns are not agreed respecting their peculiar characteristics. We read of the schools of the prophets; by which it is not to be understood that the power of predicting future events was taught as a science. The term prophet is of a general signification. It was applied by heathens to all who were supposed to be conversant with divine things; and in the Scriptures many persons are considered as prophets who did not possess the gift of prophesying; as were Abraham and Aaron. The schools of the prophets appear to have been seminaries where religious truths, or the divine laws, were particularly taught; and as it is obvious, that the Supreme Being prefers the use of instruments to the utmost extent of their influence, thus we perceive that, generally speaking, those who were destined to higher offices, were selected from these schools. In the historical writings of the Old Testament these prophets are spoken of as holy men of God, as seers, and as prophets, in the most exalted sense of the term. The first denomination seems to have been sometimes applied to men of exemplary piety, who assiduously studied the divine law, as communicated by their legislator Moses; who firmly believed in the predictions of the good and the evil that should attend the Israelites, according to the tenor of their conduct; who were observant of the character of the times in which they lived; and who might be able to discern the natural and inevitable consequences of particular modes of conduct, without the necessity of immediate inspiration. These men of God, however, received peculiar communications upon certain emergencies. They were divinely appointed to execute some important commissions, and to predict certain events, which were not in the ordinary course of things, and far beyond the reach of human penetration. It was this which sometimes gave them the title of seers. The higher class of prophets were those who foretold important events which were to take place at distant periods; in which no human sagacity could avail; and which were most opposite to the natural conceptions or general expectations of mankind, as Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, and the minor prophets. These having predicted events, which were not to be immediately accomplished, and some of which respected future generations, their predictions were committed to writing, and carefully preserved, under a conviction that they contained important truths, to be hereafter more fully revealed; and which were to receive their accomplishment at the appointed periods.

‘Through the whole of the divine economy respecting the Jews, from their emigration out of Egypt to their return from the Babylonish captivity, embracing a period of nearly nine hundred years, a succession of holy men and prophets was thus appointed, who were endowed with qualifications precisely adapted to the exigencies of every stage. Notwithstanding the diversity of their gifts, the object was one. It was uniformly their aim to preserve or reinstate true religion; and to counteract the disposition to apostatize, that was so prevalent among this people. They were authorized to direct, to counsel, to punish, to predict punishment, to encourage or to reward, according to the exigencies of the case, or the tenor of conduct. Some of these prophets were enabled to penetrate deeply into futurity. They foresaw calamities in the midst of prosperity; destruction in the midst of security; and future deliverance through the gloom of present consternation and distress. Although many of their predictions were expressed in figurative and obscure terms, yet no obscurities concealed the judgments which were denounced against impiety, or the promises of felicity to the obedient. The style and manner of these prophets were perfectly adapted to the character of those ruder times, and to the capacities and conceptions of an ignorant and perverse people, while they possessed an elevation suited to the cause which animated their breasts, soaring far beyond compositions merely human.’ Dr. Cogan’s Theological Disquisitions, pp. 275—301. Horne’s Introduction, vol. iv. p. 161, 162.

PROSELYTE, προσήλυτος, signifies a stranger, a foreigner; the Hebrew word נָכְרִי necher, also denotes a stranger, one who comes from abroad, or from another place. In the language of the Jews, those are called by this name who come to dwell in their country, or who embrace their religion, being not Jews by birth. In the New Testament they are called sometimes pro- selytes, and sometimes Gentiles, fearing God, or godly. (Acts ii. 5.; x. 2. 22.; xiii. 16. 50.)

The Hebrews, says Calmet, distinguish two kinds of proselytes. The first, proselytes of the gate; the others, proselytes of justice or righteousness. The first dwelt in the land of Israel, or even out of that country, and, without obliging themselves to circumcision, or to any other ceremony of the law, feared and worshipped the true God, observing the rules imposed on Noah. These were, according to the rabbins, 1. to abstain from idolatry; 2. from blasphemy; 3. from murder; 4. from adultery; 5. from theft; 6. to appoint just and upright judges; 7. not to eat the flesh of any animal cut off while it was alive. Maimonides says, that the first six of these precepts were given to Adam, and the seventh to Noah. In the opinion of many, Naaman the Syrian, Nebuzaradan general of Nebuchadnezzar’s army, Cornelius the centurion, the eunuch of queen Candace, and some others mentioned in the Acts, were among the proselytes of the gate. The Jews say, that the proselytes of the gate have ceased in Israel, ever since the observance of the jubilee has been left off, and the tribes of Gad, of Reuben, and of Manasseh, on the other side of Jordan, were led captive by Tiglath-pileser. But these observations are not just, since we see many proselytes in the time of Jesus Christ, who reproaches the Pharisees with compassing sea and land to make a proselyte, and, after this, making him a greater sinner than he was before. (Matth. xxiii. 15.) And St. Luke (Acts ii. 11.) speaks of a great number of proselytes, and those who feared God, that were at Jerusalem when the Holy Ghost descended upon the apostles. It is very probable that the greater part of these were proselytes of justice; but it cannot be denied that some of them might be proselytes of the gate.

The privileges of proselytes of the gate were, first, that by the observance of the rules of natural justice, and by avoiding idolatry, blasphemy, incest, adultery, and murder, they might through a holy life hope for eternal life. Secondly, they might dwell in the land of Israel, and share in the outward prosperities of it. It is said they did not dwell in the cities, but only in the suburbs and the villages. But it is certain, that the Jews often admitted into their cities, not only proselytes of habitation, but also Gentiles and idolaters, as appears by the reproaches on this account, throughout the Scriptures. According to some, there were in Israel, in the time of Solomon, 153,600 of these proselytes, whom this prince compelled to hew wood, to draw water, to cut stones, and to carry burthens for the building of the temple. (2 Chron. ii. 17, 18.) These proselytes, say they, were Canaanites, who had continued in the country ever since Joshua's time. Moses forbade the Israelites to eat any animals that died of themselves, or were strangled, so that the blood remained in them; but allowed them to sell or give such animals to the strangers and proselytes. (Deut. xiv. 21.)

Proselytes of justice or of righteousness, are those converted to Judaism, who had engaged themselves to receive circumcision, and to observe the whole law of Moses. Thus were they admitted to all the prerogatives of the people of the Lord. The rabbins inform us, that, before circumcision was administered to them, and before they were admitted into the religion of the Hebrews, they were examined about the motives of their conversion; whether the change was voluntary, or whether it proceeded from interest, fear, ambition, &c. Maimonides assures us, that, under the happy reigns of David and Solomon, they received no proselyte of justice, because there was reason to fear that it was rather the prosperity of these princes, than any love to religion, that made them converts to Judaism. When the proselyte was well proved and instructed, they gave him circumcision; and when the wound of his circumcision healed, they gave him baptism, by plunging his whole body into a cistern of water, by only one immersion. Boys under twelve years of age, and girls under thirteen, could not become proselytes, till they had obtained the consent of their parents, or, in case of refusal, the concurrence of the officers of justice. Baptism in respect of girls, had the same effect as circumcision in respect of boys. Each of them, by means of this, received as it were a new birth, so that those who were their parents before, were no longer regarded as such after this ceremony, and those who before were slaves, now became free.

Many, however, are of opinion, that there appears to be no ground whatever in Scripture for this distinction of proselytes of the gate, and proselytes of righteousness. 'According to my idea,' says Bishop Tomline, 'proselytes were those, and those only, who took upon themselves the obligation of the whole Mosaic law, but retained that name till they were admitted into the congregation of the Lord, as adopted children. Gentiles were allowed to worship, and offer sacrifices to the God of Israel, in the outer court of the temple; and some of them, persuaded of the sole and universal sovereignty of the Lord Jehovah, might renounce idolatry without embracing the Mosaic law; but such persons appear to me never to be called proselytes in Scripture, or in any ancient Christian writer.' He also observes, that 'the term proselytes of the gate, is derived from an expression frequent in the Old Testament, namely, "the stranger that is within thy gates;" but I think it evident that "the strangers" were those Gentiles who were permitted to live among the Jews under certain restrictions, and whom the Jews were forbid "to vex or oppress," so long as they lived in a peaceable manner.' Dr. Lardner says, 'I do not believe that the notion of two sorts of Jewish proselytes can be found in any Christian writer before the fourteenth century or later.' Dr. Jennings also observes, that 'there does not appear to be sufficient evidence in the Scripture history of the existence of such proselytes of the gate, as the rabbins mention; nor indeed of any, who with propriety can be styled proselytes, except such as fully embraced the Jewish religion.' Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. i. pp. 266, 267, and note (q); Dr. Jennings's Jewish Antiquities, book i. chap. iii.

PROTESTANT. The emperor Charles V. called a diet at Spire, in 1529, to request aid from the German princes against the Turks, and to devise the most effectual means for allaying the religious disputes, which then raged in consequence of Luther's opposition to the established religion. In this diet it was decreed by Ferdinand, archduke of Austria, and other Popish princes, that, in the countries which had embraced the new religion, it should be lawful to continue in it till the meeting of a council; but that no Roman Catholic should be allowed to turn Lutheran, and that the reformers should deliver nothing in their sermons contrary to the received doctrine of the Church. Against this decree six Lutheran princes, namely, John and George, the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, Ernest and Francis, the two dukes of Lunenburg, the landgrave of Hesse, and the prince of Anhalt, with the deputies of thirteen imperial towns, namely, Strasburg, Ulm, Nuremberg, Constance, Rottingen, Windsheim, Memmingen, Nortlingen, Lindau, Kempten, Hailbron, Wissemburg, and St. Gall, formally and solemnly protested, and declared that they appealed to a general council; and hence the name of Protestants, by which the followers of Luther have ever since been known. Nor was it confined to them, for it soon after included the Calvinists, and has now for a long time been applied indiscriminately to all the sects, of whatever denomination, and in whatever country they may be found, which have separated from the see of Rome.

The active spirit of inquiry, natural to men who had just broken loose from the despotism of Popery, operated differently on different intellects and dispositions, almost necessarily produced a variety of sects; and, in some cases, gave birth to extreme wildness and extravagance of unscriptural doctrine and practice. One great source of contention respected Church government and ceremonies. Some Protestant Churches, regarding with abhorrence whatever had been an appendage of the Romish religion, renounced, together with ancient rites, the primeval institution of episcopacy. Others were of opinion, that it was more wise to preserve whatever was in itself innocent, and to be content with the removal of corruptions. Points of doctrine too caused divisions; and these controversies among the reformers, some of whom long retained a portion of the virulent spirit of Popery, were too often conducted, even when they related to matters of secondary importance, with the violence and acrimony by which, in opposing the Roman Catholics, a good cause had been disgraced. They afforded no small matter of triumph to the adherents of the Church of Rome, and impeded, in no small degree, the progress of the Reformation. We are not to expect, then, that Protestants are unanimous in all points of doctrine, discipline, worship, or Church government; on the contrary, while they agree only in receiving the Scriptures as the supreme rule of their faith and practice, and in rejecting the distinguishing doctrines of the Church of Rome, in many other respects they still differ not more widely from that Church than they do from one another.

All Protestants who are Trinitarians, and, I believe, most Protestant Churches, receive the Apostles', Nicene, and Athanasian Creeds, or the substance of the doctrine contained in them, together with the first four general councils, namely, the first assembled at Nice A.D. 325; the first of Constantinople, in 381; that of Ephesus, which met in 431; and that of Chalcedon, held in 451.

Mr. Chillingworth, addressing himself to a writer in favour of the Church of Rome, speaks of the religion of the Protestants in the following excellent terms: 'Know then, Sir, that when I say the religion of Protestants is, in prudence, to be preferred before yours; on the one side, I do not understand by your religion the doctrine of Bellarmine or Baronius, or any other private man amongst you, nor the doctrine of the Sorbonne, of the Jesuits, or of the Dominicans, or of any other particular company among you, but that wherein you all agree, or profess to agree, 'The doctrine of the Council of Trent:' so accordingly, on the other side, by the religion of Protestants, I do not understand the doctrine of Luther, or Calvin, or Malancthon, nor the confession of Augsburg, or Geneva, nor the Catechism of Heidelberg, nor the Articles of the Church of England, no, nor the harmony of Protestant confessions; but that in which they all agree, and to which they all subscribe with a greater harmony, as a perfect rule of faith and action, that is, the Bible. The Bible, I say, the Bible only, is the religion of Protestants. Whatsoever else they believe besides it, and the plain, irrefragable, indubitable consequences of it, well may they hold it as a matter of opinion; but as a matter of faith and religion, neither can they with coherence to their own grounds believe it themselves, nor require belief of it of others, without most high and most schismatical presumption. I, for my part, after a long and (as I verily believe and hope) impartial search of the true way to eternal happiness, do profess plainly, that I cannot find any rest for the sole of my foot, but upon this rock only. I see plainly, and with my own eyes, that there are popes against popes, and councils against councils; some fathers against other fathers, the same fathers against themselves; a consent of fathers of one age, against a consent of fathers of another age; traditive interpretations of Scripture are pretended, but there are few or none to be found: no tradition, but that of Scripture, can derive itself from the fountain, but may be plainly proved either to have been brought in, in such an age after Christ, or that in such an age it was not in. In a word, there is no sufficient certainty but of Scripture only, for any considering man to build upon. This, therefore, and this only, I have reason to believe. This I will profess: according to this, I will live; and for this, if there be occasion, I will not only willingly, but even gladly, lose my life, though I should be sorry that Christians should take it from me. Propose me any thing out of this Book, and require whether I believe or no, and, seem it never so incomprehensible to human reason, I will subscribe it with hand and heart, as knowing no demonstration can be stronger than this, God hath said so, therefore it is true. In other things, I will take no man's liberty of judging from him; neither shall any man take mine from me.'

Hence the Bible is the only sure foundation upon which all true Protestants build every article of the faith which they profess, and every point of doctrine which they teach; and all other foundations, whether they be the decisions of councils, the confessions of Churches, the prescripts of popes, or the expositions of private men, are considered by them as sandy and unsafe, or as in no wise to be ultimately relied on. Yet, on the other hand, they by no means fastidiously reject them as of no use; for whilst they admit the Bible, or the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, to be the only infallible rule by which we must measure the truth or falsehood of every religious opinion, they are sensible that all men are not equally fitted to apply this rule; and that the wisest men want, on many occasions, all the helps of human learning to enable them to understand its precise nature, and to define its certain extent. These helps are great and numerous, having been supplied in every age of the Church, by the united labours of learned men in every country, particularly in Protestant communions.

All Protestants profess to abhor idolatry; and the greater part of them worship the Trinity in unity, and use a Liturgy, or form of prayer. Some, however, use no form; and both the Arians and Socinians confine their worship to God the Father. It may also be observed, that two sects of Protestants, the Moravians and Swedenborgians, address all their prayers to Jesus Christ. With regard to Church-government, however widely they may differ in other respects, all Protestants agree in rejecting an universal visible supreme head of the Church, together with the infallibility of any church governors or councils whatsoever, from the days of the Apostles; and all their clergy are seculars. They all, I believe, likewise agree in adopting the principle of the independency of every church in its national character, as subject to no spiritual head but Christ; as conceding no superiority, and claiming no pre-eminence of jurisdiction; as authorized to frame its own laws, and to regulate its own government.

The number of Protestants may be estimated at 65,000,000; that of the Roman Catholics, at 80,000,000. On the continent of Europe, the Protestants are divided into two grand denominations; the Lutherans, who adhere to Luther's tenets, and the Reformed, who follow the doctrine and discipline of Geneva. Together with these, this vast class comprehends the Hugonots in France; the Refugees in Holland; the members of the establishments and the Protestant dissenters of all descriptions in Great Britain and Ireland; and a numerous body of Christians in North America, the West and East Indies, &c. Before the late revolution, the Protestants in France were supposed to amount to 2,000,000 or upwards, though they then had no legal toleration, and almost their only seminary was a private, and merely tolerated one at Lausanne, in Switzerland. But from some recent statements, it would appear, that Protestantism is now reviving in various parts of the French dominions. However, notwithstanding the toleration of Protestantism in the French dominions, and some other favourable signs of the times, considering the late great prevalence of infidelity, and the consequent diminution of true and vital religion on the continent of Europe, it may be questioned whether the Protestant Churches there be in a flourishing state, or in circumstances of discouragement and distress. Some persons of knowledge and discernment are much inclined to the latter opinion, and remark that to them it is a matter of doubt whether pure religion has ever been at a lower ebb, since the days of the Waldenses, than it is at present, with the exception of Great Britain, and perhaps of Sweden. This, however, will be considered by most people, as viewing the subject in too unfavourable a light.

'It is very remarkable that a Romanist may turn Protestant without adding any one article to his faith, but a Protestant cannot turn to Rome unless he embrace many new articles; for our doctrines are generally confessed by both sides to be true, but those of the Roman Church are rejected by our Reformers, as novel additions, and such as have no good foundation in Scripture, nor genuine antiquity; and therefore the Protestant doctrines are the surer and safer, as those in which both sides agree: for example, we and they both hold there are two states after this life, heaven and hell; but they add a third, which is purgatory, and this we deny: We and they both say, that sins are to be remitted by the merits of Christ's death; but they add the merits of the saints, and their own satisfactions, with the merit of their own good works, which we deny to be expiatory, or such as can merit remission for us: We hold there be two sacraments, Baptism and the Eucharist; these they confess are the chief, but add five more, to which we affirm the name of sacraments doth not properly belong: We say that God alone is to be worshipped: they confess he is chiefly to be worshipped; but then they say, the blessed Virgin Mary, angels, and saints, are to be worshipped also; which additions we deny: We say, Christ is our only Mediator and Advocate: they confess he is principally so, but add, that saints and angels are so in an inferior manner; which we utterly deny: We say Christ is really present in the sacrament of the altar; this they confess, but add, he is corporally there by the transubstantiation of the bread, &c., and this we deny: We say the Scriptures are the rule of faith, and they will not absolutely deny it, but add their own traditions which we reject: We say there are twenty-two books of the Old Testament canonical; and they confess these all to be so, but they add divers others, and call them canonical; which we affirm to be apocryphal. I could give more instances; but these may suffice to show that the Protestant doctrines look most like the ancientest, as being received by both parties; but the Roman opinions are novel enlargements added to the Old Catholic truths.' Adam's Religious World Displayed, vol. ii. pp. 81—98.

PROVERBS. The Hebrews give the name of proverbs, parables, or similitudes, to moral sentences, maxims, comparisons, or enigmas, expressed in a poetical, figurative, close, and sententious style. The Hebrews call this kind of proverbs משלי, mishle. Solomon says, that, in his time, maxims of this sort were the chief study of the learned. (Prov. i. 6.) The queen of Sheba came to see Solomon, to prove him, and to propose dark riddles to him. (1 Kings x. 1.) Hiram, king of Tyre, (they say) kept up a correspondence, by letters, with Solomon, and proposed enigmatical questions to him, and explained those that were proposed to him by Solomon.

The PROVERBS of Solomon are, without doubt, the most valuable part of his works. We are informed at the beginning, and in other parts of the book, that they were the production of Solomon, the son of David, a man, as the sacred writings assure us, peculiarly endued with divine wisdom. The book of Proverbs, that of Ecclesiastes, and that of the Song of Solomon, are all that remain of him who is related to have spoken 3000 proverbs, whose songs are 1005, and who spake of trees, from the cedar that is in Lebanon even to the hyssop that springeth out of the wall; who spake also of beasts, and of fowls, and of creeping things, and of fishes. If, however, many valuable writings of Solomon have perished, we have reason to be grateful for what still remains. Of his proverbs and songs the most excellent have been preserved; and, as we possess his doctrinal and moral works, we have no right to murmur at the loss of his physical and philosophical productions. The book of Proverbs may be considered as divided into five parts; the first consists of the first nine chapters, which are a kind of preface, and contain general cautions and exhortations from a teacher to his pupil. The second part extends from the beginning of the tenth chapter, to the 17th verse of the 22d chapter, and contains what may strictly and properly be called Proverbs, given in short, unconnected sentences, and adapted to the instruction of youth. In the third part, which reaches from the 17th verse of the 22d chapter, to the end of the 24th chapter, the pupil is addressed in the second person as being present; and the precepts are delivered in a less sententious and more connected style. The fourth part extends from the beginning of the 25th to the end of the 29th chapter, and consists of 'Proverbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah, king of Judah, copied out,' that is, selected from a much greater number. Who 'these men of Hezekiah' were, we are not told; but they were probably the 'prophets whom he employed to restore the service and writings of the Church, as Eliakim, and Joab, and Shebna, and probably Hosea, Micah, and even Isaiah, who all flourished in the reign of that monarch, and doubtless co-operated with his endeavours to re-establish true religion among the Jews. These proverbs, indeed, appear to have been selected by some collectors after the time of Solomon, as they repeat some which he had previously introduced in the former part of the book. The fifth part consists of the 30th and 31st chapters, the former of which contains 'the words of Agur the son of Jakeh,' and the latter 'the words of king Lemuel, that his mother taught him;' but we are not informed either here, or in any other part of Scripture, when or where Agur or Lemuel lived. Indeed many of the ancient fathers considered these chapters also as the work of Solomon, and were of opinion, that he intended to describe himself under the names of Agur and Lemuel; but this is a point which must be left in uncertainty. There are in this book many beautiful descriptions and personifications; the diction is highly polished; and there is a concise and energetic turn of expression, which is peculiar to this species of writing. Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. i. pp. 100—103.

PROVIDENCE, the superintendence and care which God exercises over creation. As certain as there is a God who created all things, so certain is it that he acts as sovereign of the universe; that his supreme providence ruleth over all things, and has the care and superintendence of his creation. For were we to suppose it otherwise, and that the world is not under the care and government of its Creator; no other reason could be assigned, than that he is either wanting in power or inclination, unable or unwilling to govern it. But neither of these suppositions can be admitted. He, who was able to create the world, cannot want ability to superintend and govern it. All the powers of nature must be dependent on him who gave them their being. All things must obey that voice which spoke the word, and they were made; were made from nothing; and, with regard to any resistance they can make to that voice, are as nothing still. The whole world is, in his hands, justly represented only as a drop of the morning-dew, or as the dust of the balance, which he may dissipate with the least breath of his power. To him it is infinitely easy to preside over all events, to direct all the influences of natural causes, to govern all contingencies, to provide for the interests of communities and kingdoms, and for the security and happiness of every individual in them. As, then, the Supreme Being cannot be supposed to be defective in power to govern the world, so neither can he be wanting in inclination. For is it reasonable to think, that God takes no care of the world, which, with so much care and wisdom, he created? Is it reasonable to suppose, that he who introduced us into being, and by that act contracted the relation of a parent to us, with all the obligation of affectionate care and paternal regard resulting from it; is it reasonable, is it possible, to suppose that he would give up all regard and attention to his creatures, his children, his family upon earth? He who gave us being must be concerned for our well-being too. He, who is perfect wisdom and goodness, will, in every instance, take such care of us as perfect goodness and wisdom require.

What can afford more rational grounds of the sublimest joy, than the consideration that God governs the earth? What can administer more comfort, than the assurance, that we live not in a forsaken and fatherless world, are not deserted by the great Parent of nature, nor abandoned to the power of chance or fate; but are always under the protection of an infinitely wise and good Sovereign, in whose presence and under whose eye we live, whose great and constant object is the security and felicity of his creatures and subjects, and without whose permission no power can injure, and no evil can approach us? Let us consider the state and condition of human nature, and we shall find the justest ground to rejoice in the government and protection of this Almighty Sovereign. Insufficient to our own happiness; uncertain of what we hope for; insecure even of what we possess; often encompassed with difficulties which we cannot surmount; surrounded often with dangers which we have neither sagacity to foresee, nor ability to oppose, nor skill to elude; full of wants and frailties in ourselves; exposed to injuries and violence from others; thus beset on all sides, liable to disorders within, and to disasters without; what security could we have against dangers, or what consolation under them, were we capable of conceiving that there is no Power above who can either divert the evils that threaten us, or support us under them; no superior Being to whom we might appeal, and on whose goodness we might repose in confidence? To the eye of reason, what a dreadful wilderness would life appear; how gloomy would be the prospect, how uncomfortable our pilgrimage through it, did we not believe, that there is an all-powerful and all-gracious hand that invisibly guides our steps, conducts us through the various accidents that beset us, and through all the thousand dangers that are planted in our way!

The doctrine not only of a general Providence, by which all things are so regulated as to be preserved in due order, is inculcated; but that of a particular Providence may be proved from almost every page of the Bible. The children of Israel were led by the especial guidance of the Almighty to the Promised Land; their whole history is miraculous, and displays the stretched-out arm of Jehovah to succour and preserve them. What is the whole train of prophecies, reaching from the first intimation of the Messiah of the Jews, the Redeemer of mankind, given to console our first parents after the fall, to their full consummation in the person, actions, and sufferings of our blessed Saviour? And what were the revelations of the divine will made upon extraordinary occasions to the illustrious favourites of heaven, such as Abraham, Moses David, Daniel, Hezekiah, Job, Ruth, Esther, and the Virgin Mary, but manifest proofs of the same truth?

This doctrine derives great support from one plain argument of reason. An all-powerful Being, such as we believe the Deity to be, cannot possibly be excluded from any place. He is, therefore, every where present; and it is inconceivable to suppose, that he is an inactive spectator, and does not exercise his supreme wisdom, as far as is consistent with the free will of his rational creatures: 'the eye of the Lord is in every place, beholding the evil and the good.' This is a brief, but very strong and explicit declaration, and proves that the Almighty extends his regard to all things, and that nothing passes, or indeed can pass, without his observation.

It must be clear to every one who examines the history of mankind, that great events have often been effected by trifling means; that the consequences of actions have been often much more extensive, more happy or calamitous, than were originally intended by the agents themselves; that the designs of Providence have been sometimes effected by the caprice of human tempers, or the impetuosity of human passions; and that fraud, cruelty, oppression, and violence, have met with just, though sometimes delayed punishment. The result of actions has been, in many cases, widely different from the end proposed by those who planned them, and even great revolutions have been effected contrary to the intentions of the persons who were the chief instruments of them.

For the most striking proofs of the superintendence of divine Providence, we may appeal to the course of our own experience. Have we ever been afflicted by sickness? how often has hope renovated our exhausted spirits, and spoken peace to our troubled souls! Ask those who have been in poverty and want; have they never received relief at a time when they gave themselves up for lost? has not some kind friend succoured them like a guardian angel? Has there not been in the life of every one some extraordinary coincidence of circumstances equally out of the reach of his power to produce? The unthinking may talk of chance, or fortune, but these are only sounds without sense; plausible names which mean nothing, when applied to the important concerns of our lives. Be assured that the whole scheme of our existence has been planned by a wise and benevolent Power; that nothing happens without his knowledge and permission; and that as there is nothing which with respect to his prescience is unforeseen, so there is nothing which with respect to his providence is casual.

Indeed, no other principle than this, embraced with a steady faith, and attended with a suitable practice, can ever be able to give repose and tranquillity to the mind; to animate our hopes, or extinguish our fears; to give us any true satisfaction in the enjoyments of life, or to minister consolation under its adversities. If we are persuaded that God governs the world, that he has the superintendence and direction of all events, and that we are the objects of his providential care; whatever may be our distress or our danger, we can never want consolation; we may always have a fund of hope, always a prospect of relief. But, take away this hope and this prospect, take away the belief of God and of a superintending providence, and man would be of all creatures the most miserable; destitute of every comfort, every support, under present sufferings, and of every security against future dangers. Sermons by George Carr, Sermon i.; Mr. Kett's Emily, a Moral Tale, vol. i. pp. 225—229, third edition.

PSALMS, THE BOOK OF, in Hebrew Sepher Tehillim, The Book of Hymns. 'The Book of Psalms is a collection of hymns or sacred songs in praise of God, and consists of poems of various kinds. They are the productions of different persons, but are generally called the Psalms of David, because a great part of them was composed by him, and David himself is distinguished by the name of the Psalmist. We cannot now ascertain all the Psalms written by David, but their number probably exceeds seventy; and much less are we able to discover the authors of the other Psalms, or the occasions upon which they were composed; a few of them were written after the return from the Babylonian captivity. The titles prefixed to them are of very questionable authority; and in many cases they are not intended to denote the writer, but refer only to the person who was appointed to set them to music. David first introduced the practice of singing sacred hymns in the public service of God; and it was restored by Ezra, who is supposed to have selected these psalms from a much greater number, and to have placed them in their present order. It is to be presumed, that those which he rejected were either not inspired, or not calculated for general use.'

'The authority of those, however, which we now possess, is established not only by their rank among the sacred writings, and by the unvaried testimony of every age, but likewise by many intrinsic proofs of inspiration. Not only do they breathe through every part a divine spirit of eloquence, but they contain numberless illustrious prophecies, that were remarkably accomplished, and that are frequently appealed to by the evangelical writers. The sacred character of the whole book is established by the testimony of our Saviour and his apostles, who, in various parts of the New Testament, appropriate the predictions of the Psalms as obviously apposite to the circumstances of their lives, and as intentionally preconcerted to describe them.'

'The veneration for the Psalms has in all ages of the Church been considerable. The fathers assure us that in the earlier times the whole book of Psalms was generally learnt by heart; and that the ministers of every gradation were expected to be able to repeat them from memory.' These invaluable Scriptures are daily repeated without weariness, though their beauties are often overlooked in familiar and habitual perusal. As hymns immediately addressed to the Deity, they reduce righteousness to practice; and while we acquire the sentiments, we perform the offices of piety; as while we supplicate for blessings, we celebrate the memorial of former mercies; and, while in the exercise of devotion, faith is enlivened by the display of prophecy.'

'Josephus asserts, and most of the ancient writers maintain, that the Psalms were composed in metre. They have undoubtedly a peculiar conformation of sentences, and a measured distribution of parts. Many of them are elegiac, and most of David's are of the lyric kind. There is no sufficient reason, however, to believe, as some writers have imagined, that they were written in rhyme, or in any of the Grecian measures. Some of them are acrostic; and, though the regulations of the Hebrew measure are now lost, there can be no doubt, from their harmonious modulation, that they were written with some kind of metrical order; and they must have been composed in accommodation to the measure to which they were set. The Masoretic writers have marked them in a manner different from the other sacred writings. The Hebrew copies and the Septuagint version of this book contain the same number of psalms; only the Septuagint translators have, for some reason which does not appear, thrown the ninth and tenth into one, as also the 114th and 115th; and have divided the 116th and 117th each into two.'

Several of the Psalms are immediately and solely applicable to the divine economy of the Christian dispensation in its grand outline. Besides these are many others that contain minuter traits of the divine and human character of the Messiah. This shows how extensively 'the word of knowledge,' or the gift of prophecy, was communicated to David, and will naturally account for the veneration in which the book of Psalms, of which he was the principal composer, has always been held in the Jewish, as well as in the Christian Church. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. p. 373; Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. i. pp. 97—100.

PUBLICAN, in Greek τελώνης, an officer of the revenue, employed in collecting taxes. Among the Romans were two sorts of tax-receivers. Some were general receivers, who in each province had deputies, that collected the revenues of the empire, and accounted to the emperor. These principals were men of great consideration in the government; and among these were the flower of the Roman knights, the ornament of the city, and the strength of the commonwealth. But the deputies, the under-farmers, the commissioners, the publicans of the lower order, were considered as so many thieves and pickpockets.

Among the Jews, the name and profession of a publican was excessively odious. They could not, without the utmost reluctance, see publicans rigorously exacting tributes and impositions laid on them by the Romans. 'Several things occurred to make the publicans particularly odious to the Jews. Considering themselves as a free people, under the immediate government of God, they bore with impatience the taxes imposed by the Romans, and even questioned whether it were lawful to pay tribute to Cæsar.' The publicans were generally Jews, who, farming the customs of the Romans, were too often led by motives of avarice to be extortioners also; and the people could ill endure these rigorous exactions from their brethren, who thus appeared to join with the Romans in endeavouring to entail perpetual subjection upon their nation, or at least in making the yoke more galling and oppressive; besides, the necessary dealings and connexion of the publicans with the Gentiles, which the Jews held to be unlawful, cast a peculiar odium upon the whole body; and thus we find our Saviour was reproached for being 'a friend of publicans and sinners.' Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. i. pp. 261, 262.

PUL, פול, signifies bean; otherwise destruction. Pul, or Phul, king of Assyria, (2 Kings xv. 19.) came into the land of Israel in the time of Menahem, to assist him, and confirm him in the kingdom. (Hos. v. 13.) The king of Israel gave him a thousand talents of silver, and Pul continued in the country till it was paid.

Some are of opinion, that Pul was the same as Belesis, governor of Babylon, who, with Arbaces the Mede, slew Sardanapalus, the last of the Assyrian monarchs, and transferred the empire to the Chaldeans. Of this bishop Patrick seems to be confident. But according to Dr. Prideaux, Belesis was one generation later, and therefore it is supposed that this Pul was the father of Sardanapalus, who was called Sardan, with his father's name Pul annexed; in like manner as Merodach, king of Babylon, was called Merodach-Baladan, because he was the son of Baladan. This Pul, therefore, was the same king of Assyria, who, when Jonah preached against Nineveh, gave great tokens of his humiliation and repentance.

The only difficulty is, that he seems to have marched his army from Babylon, and not from Nineveh. But then it is suggested, that, as the kings of Assyria resided sometimes at Babylon, and sometimes at Nineveh, it is not improbable that Pul, to avoid the judgment which Jonah threatened against the latter, might remove to Babylon, where he resided the remaining part of his reign; and this rendered it convenient for him to attack the Israelites on the other side Jordan.

Usher, Rollin, and Calmet, think that Pul was the father of Sardanapalus, who added the name of Pul to that of Sardan; and if this conjecture be true, Pul in that case must be the same as Anacindaraxes, or Anabaxares, the name which profane authors give to the father of Sardanapalus. On the other hand, the system of some modern writers, particularly of Sir Isaac Newton, and the authors of the 'Universal History,' is as follows. This Pul was, by his name, a pure Assyrian, and not a Chaldean or Babylonian, as he is mistaken to have been by some, who suppose him to be the Belesis of Ctesias, than which no position can be more false. That he was the first king of Assyria, appears by his name, which is simple, and not compounded like the rest. The Assyrian names are for the most part compounded of the simple names of their gods; and the name of this prince we find a primitive, as we may call it, compounded in the names of the other princes in these parts, as Tiglath-Pul-Assur, Nebo-Pul-Assur, and the like. From this circumstance, and the affinity of the name itself, he is, with apparent certainty, said to have been the Assyrian, Syrian, or Tyrian Belus. Newton's Chronology of Ancient Kingdoms; Universal History, book i. chap. viii. ix.; Prideaux's Connection; Bedford's Scripture Chronology.

PUNISHMENTS of the Hebrews. There were several sorts of punishments used among the Jews, which are mentioned in Scripture. As, 1. the punishment of the cross; 2. hanging, or the punishment of the rope; 3. stoning; 4. fire or burning; 5. the tympanum, or whipping; 6. imprisonment; 7. the sword, or beheading; 8. the precipice, or throwing down a rock; 9. rending to pieces by thorns, or treading under the feet of animals; 10. the saw; 11. stifling, by being thrown down into a place full of ashes; 12. cutting off the hair; 13. blinding the eyes; 14. being stretched on the wooden horse. There are others mentioned in the Maccabees.

The Jews gave to criminals, at their execution, wine mingled with incense, myrrh, and other strong drugs, proper to stupify the senses, and to abate the severity of pain. Solomon advises (Prov. xxxi. 6.) to give wine to such as are overwhelmed with pain. And we see an instance of this, in what was offered to Jesus Christ at his passion; wine mixed with myrrh, before his crucifixion; and vinegar when he was upon the cross. (Matt. xxvii. 34. 48.) These observations are general, and belong to all that were executed.

Hanging, or the punishment of the rope. The Jews maintain, that none but idolaters and blasphemers underwent this punishment. Haman and his sons were hung upon a high gallows. (Esth. vii. 10.) Pharaoh's chief baker was first beheaded, and afterwards hung upon a gibbet. We read in the Scriptures, that sometimes they hung up men alive, and sometimes they hung up their carcases after they were dead. (Josh. viii. 29. 2 Sam. xxi. 12, 13.)

Stoning, or putting to death by casting stones, was very much used among the Hebrews. See STONING.

Fire, or burning, was a very common punishment among the Hebrews. When Judah was informed that his daughter-in-law Tamar was with child, he would have had her burnt as an adulteress. (Genesis xxxviii. 24.) The law of Moses inflicts this punishment on the daughters of the priests, guilty of fornication. (Lev. xxi. 9.) Nebuchadnezzar caused Daniel and his companions to be thrown into a burning fiery furnace. (Dan. iii. 6.) Moses ordered him to be burnt alive, who should marry the mother and her daughter. (Lev. xx. 14.)

The punishment of the rack, or tympanum, is met with in the Greek of St. Paul to the Hebrews, (xi. 35.) Interpreters are divided about the sense of the word ἐν τρυπανισμῷ. Some have explained it of the Tressel, or Chivalet, a punishment very frequent among the ancients, but scarcely known at this day. Others think that the apostle alludes to the death of John the Baptist, and to that of St. James, who were both beheaded. Some think it signifies to flay alive. Some take it, in a general sense, for all kinds of capital punishments and violent deaths; but most interpreters are of opinion that the apostle here means the bastinado, or the punishment of the stick; and that he makes an allusion to the cruelties exercised upon old Eleazar. The second book of the Maccabees, (vi. 19.) speaking of the martyrdom of Eleazar, says, that he came to the tympanum. See BASTINADO.

Imprisonment was not considered as a punishment, but to secure the accused. So Joseph detained his brother Simeon in prison. (Gen. xlii. 19.) The blasphemer that was brought to Moses, (Lev. xxiv. 12.) and the man that was found gathering sticks on the Sabbath-day, (Numb. xv. 34.) were put in ward till the Lord declared what kind of punishment they should suffer. Jeremiah and John the Baptist were shut up in prison, to prevent their remonstrances to the people. But, often, imprisonment was made a punishment by severities. Joseph was put into prison, and loaded with fetters. (Gen. xxxix. 20.) Samson, taken by the Philistines, was cast into a dungeon, and forced to grind at the mill. (Judg. xvi. 21.) Hoshea, king of Israel, Jehoahaz and Manasseh, kings of Judah, were shut up in prison by their conquerors, the kings of Assyria and Chaldaea. Zedekiah underwent the same hardships; to which was added the punishment of losing his eyes. Ahab, king of Israel, gave orders (1 Kings xxii. 27.) that the prophet Micaiah should be shut up in prison; that he should be fed with the bread of affliction, and the water of distress, till his return from Ramoth-gilead. Bonds, fetters, shackles, manacles, chains, which usually attended imprisonment, must be considered as punishments.

To throw headlong into the sea from a precipice, with a stone tied about the neck, was not a common punishment: if it has been sometimes used among the Hebrews, it was in extraordinary cases. Amaziah, king of Judah, forced ten thousand Idumeans, whom he had taken prisoners of war, to leap from the top of a high rock. (2 Chron. xxv. 12.) The Jews intended to precipitate Jesus Christ from the top of a mountain. (Luke iv. 29.)

In Scripture we meet with several instances of decapitation. Pharaoh's chief baker had his head cut off; after which his body was hung on a gibbet. (Gen. xl. 19.) Abimelech, son of Gideon, cut off the heads of seventy sons of Gideon, his brethren, on one stone. (Judg. ix. 5.) The people of Samaria cut off the heads of seventy sons of Ahab, and sent them in baskets to king Jehu. (2 Kings x. 7.) John the Baptist was beheaded in prison, by the order of Herod. (Matt. xiv. 8. 11.)

Trampling to death under thorns, under harrows, under the feet of elephants, is not known among us; but we find some instances in Scripture. When Gideon returned from pursuing the Midianites, he tore with thorns and brambles of the desert, the chief men of the city of Succoth, who had insulted him. (Judg. viii. 16.) It is thought David did something like this to the Moabites, (2 Sam. viii. 2.) 'And he smote Moab, and measured them with a line, casting them down to the ground; even with two lines measured he to put to death, and with one full line to keep alive.' What is said of casting them down to the ground favours this explication. He made the Ammonites undergo a punishment that was still more cruel (2 Sam. xii. 31.); he put them under saws and harrows of iron, and under axes of iron, and made them pass through the brick-kiln. The harrows, or sledges, of iron here mentioned, were machines proper for threshing of corn; of which there were several kinds. He made them pass under axes of iron, and through the places for making of bricks. Whether by these last words we are to understand furnaces in which bricks are burnt, or the place where the earth is beat and macerated, in which these miserable wretches were executed; these punishments were very horrible, but were tolerated among those people, who allowed themselves the liberty of putting all to death that they took in war.

The punishment of the saw was not unknown to the Hebrews. Some are of opinion, that it was originally from the Persians or Chaldeans. It is certain that it is still in use among the Switzers; at least, they practised it some time ago on one of their countrymen guilty of a great crime. They put him in a kind of coffin, and sawed him at length, beginning at the head, as a piece of wood is sawn. The apostle Paul in his epistle to the Hebrews, (xi. 37.) speaking of the calamities suffered by saints of the Old Testament, says, that they were sawn asunder. Several of the ancients have explained this passage concerning the death of Isaiah, who is said to have been put to death by king Manasseh, with a wooden saw.

Cutting off the hair of the guilty person seems to be a punishment rather shameful than painful; and yet it is thought that pain was likewise added to the disgrace, and that they were not contented to shave or cut the hair, but tore it off with violence, as if they were plucking a bird alive. This at least is the signification of the Hebrew and Greek in Nehemiah. 'I contended with them, and smote certain of them, and plucked off their hair.' Sometimes they put hot ashes on the skin, after they had torn off the hair, to make the pain the more exquisite. It was thus they served adulterers at Athens, as is observed by the scholiast on Aristophanes.

To make blind and to pluck out the eyes, are punishments not common; and though Moses appointed that an eye should be given for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth, (Exodus xxi. 24. Deut. xix. 18, 19, 20. Levit. xxiv. 20.) yet it is the opinion of commentators, that this was seldom practised, but that the offender was generally punished by a pecuniary penalty, paid to the injured party. When the Philistines had seized Samson, they put him in prison, and bored out his eyes. (Judg. xvi. 21.) When Nabash king of the Ammonites made war with Jabesh-gilead, he threatened to put out the right eyes of the people. Nebuchadnezzar took king Zedekiah, slew his children in his presence, then caused his eyes to be put out, and afterwards had him carried to Jerusalem in chains. (2 Kings xxv. 7.)

To cut off the extremities of the feet and hands, was a cruelty exercised by Adonibezek, on seventy kings conquered by him, who ate like dogs under his table. (Judg. i. 6, 7.) But God thought fit to have him tortured in the same manner. David punished the murderers of Ishbosheth by the same means. (2 Sam. iv. 12.)

To be exposed to wild beasts, and to fight with beasts, was a punishment very common among the Romans. St. Paul says (1 Cor. xv. 32.) that he fought with beasts at Ephesus; but this probably regards his being assaulted by the fury of brutal men.

Other kinds of punishment are mentioned in the first, second, and fourth books of the Maccabees: as that of the burning-pan; tearing off the skin by the hairs of the head; burning the sides and bowels with lighted torches; tearing with combs of iron; stretching upon the wheel; and several other sorts of torture.

Sometimes they demolished the houses of offenders, and reduced them to a common place for filth and dung. (2 Kings x. 27. Dan. ii. 5; iii. 29. Ezra vi. 11.) However, some interpreters explain these passages as implying only confiscations to the king's use.

PUNON, פִּנּוֹן, signifies a gem, or well-looking; otherwise, mouth of eternity, or mouth of the son: from the Hebrew and Syriac, mouth of the fish. Punon, or Phunon, was a station of the Hebrews in the wilderness. (Numb. xxxiii. 42, 43.) It was a place where copper mines were found; and it was called Phæno, Phaino, and Metallo-phænon, because of its mines of metals. Eusebius says, it was between Petra and Segon; and elsewhere he places it four miles from Dedan. It is thought to be at Punon that Moses erected the brazen serpent, for the cure of the murmuring Israelites, who had been bitten by the fiery serpents. Others believe this happened at the encampment of Zalmonah. (Numb. xxi. 7.)

PUR, פִּיר, κλήρος, signifies lot. Pur, Phur, or Purim, was a solemn feast of the Jews, instituted in memory of the lots cast by Haman, the enemy of the Jews. (Esther iii. 7.) These lots were cast in the first month of the year, and gave the twelfth month of the same year, for the execution of Haman's design, to destroy all the Jews of Persia. Thus the superstition of Haman, in crediting these lots, caused his own ruin, and the preservation of the Jews; who had time to avert this blow, by means of Esther. In memory of this deliverance, the Jews instituted a feast, which they named Pur or Purim. See HAMAN, ESTHER, and MORDECAI.

The feast of lots was celebrated among the Jews in Shushan on the 14th, and in other parts of the Persian empire on the 15th of Adar, which answers to our February. (Esther ix. 18, 19. 21. 2 Macc. xv. 39.) The Jews have exactly kept this feast down to our times; and these are the ceremonies they observe in it:—On the eve of the feast, if it be a day on which they may fast, they keep a strict fast, in memory of that kept by Esther and Mordecai. If the day be a sabbath, or the eve of a sabbath, on which they never fast, they anticipate the fast; that is, instead of fasting on the 13th of Adar, they fast on the 11th.

On the eve of the feast they give alms liberally to the poor, that these also may enjoy the feast of lots: and on the feast day they send a share of what they have at table to those who have need. On the evening of Adar 13, when the feast begins, they assemble in the synagogue, and light the lamps; and as soon as the stars appear, they begin to read the book of Esther. They continue reading it throughout. There are five places in the text, at which the reader raises his voice with all his might, and makes such a dreadful howling, as to frighten the women and children. When he comes to the place which mentions the names of the ten sons of Haman, he repeats them very quick without taking breath, to show that these ten persons were destroyed in a moment. Every time the name of Haman is pronounced, the children with great fury strike the benches of the synagogues with mallets or stones, and make lamentable cries. It is said that heretofore they used to bring into the synagogue a great stone, with the name of Haman written on it, and all the while the book of Esther was reading, they struck it with other stones, till they had beaten it to pieces.

After the reading was finished, they returned into their houses, where they made a meal rather of milk-meats than of flesh. The day following, early in the morning, they returned to the synagogue, where after they had read that passage of Exodus, in which is mentioned the war of Amalek, they again read the book of Esther with the same ceremonies as before. After this they return home, and make as good cheer as they can, and pass the rest of the day in sports and dissolute mirth, the men dressing themselves in women's clothes, and women in the men's, contrary to an express prohibition of the law. (Deut. xxii. 5.) And their doctors have decided on this point, that on this day they may drink wine until they cannot distinguish between, Cursed be Haman, and cursed be Mordecai. Heretofore they used to erect a gibbet, and upon it to burn a man made of straw, which they called Haman. But it was thought they had an intention of insulting the Christians on the death of Christ, and therefore the emperors forbade them this practice, on penalty of forfeiting all their privileges.

They allow themselves the drinking of wine to excess, because, they say, it was by making king Ahasuerus drunk, that Esther procured the deliverance of the Jews.

They compel every one to be present at the synagogue, man, woman, child, and servant; because all shared in the deliverance, as all were exposed to the danger. On this day scholars make presents to their masters, heads of families to their domestics, the great to those of mean condition. In a word, the whole day is spent in joyfulness and feasting, as it is said in the book of Esther, 'That they should make them days of feasting and joy, and of sending portions one to another, and gifts to the poor.' (Esther ix. 22.)

This festival continues two days, but only the first is kept with solemnity. During these two days they may work or do business; yet they refrain the first day, though they are not obliged to it. The second day they read no new lesson in the synagogue, and the feast is not so great; but they, however, show marks of festivity. When the year consists of thirteen months, and there are two Adars, they celebrate the feast of lots twice over; the grand Purim on the fourteenth of the first Adar, and the lesser Purim on the fourteenth of the second Adar. But this second feast has properly nothing besides the name.

PURGATORY, a place in which, according to the church of Rome, the just who depart out of this life expiate certain offences which do not merit eternal damnation. The Roman doctrine concerning Purgatory, as asserted in the councils of Florence and Trent, is as follows: That every man is subject both to temporal and eternal punishment for his sins; that God does indeed pardon sin, as to its eternal punishment, for the sake of the death and merits of Christ, but that the sinner is still liable to temporal punishment; that this temporal punishment must be expiated by voluntary acts of penance and sorrow, and by such afflictions as he may here endure by the appointment of God; that this expiation does not fully take place in this life, but that there is an intermediate state, in which departed souls suffer the remaining part of their punishment, and as this state is supposed to purge them from all effect of their sins, and to qualify them for the joys of heaven, it is called Purgatory; and the Church of Rome further maintains, that the pains and sufferings of Purgatory may be alleviated and shortened by the prayers of men here on earth, by the intercession of the saints in heaven, and, above all, by the sacrifice of the mass offered by the priests in the name of sinners; and that as soon as souls are released from Purgatory, they are immediately admitted to eternal happiness.

A passage in the New Testament is brought as a full proof of the fire of Purgatory. When St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Corinthians, is reflecting on the divisions that were among them, and on that diversity of teachers who formed men into different principles and parties, he compares them to different builders: some raised upon a rock, an edifice, like the temple at Jerusalem, of gold and silver and precious stones; others upon the same rock raised a mean hovel of wood, hay, and stubble; of both he says, 'Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is.' He adds, 'If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire.' (1 Cor. iii. 10—15.) These words relate to a fire which was soon to appear, and which was to try every man's work; which was to be revealed, and in which every man's work was to be made manifest. Hence, this could have no relation to a secret Purgatory fire. The meaning can only be, that some with the Apostles were building up the Church, not only on the foundation of Jesus Christ, and the belief of his doctrine, but were teaching men doctrines and rules which were good and virtuous. Others, at the same time, were adding a profane mixture both of Judaism and Gentilism, which they joined with some of the precepts of Christianity. The Apostle observes, that a day would soon appear, by which is probably meant the destruction of Jerusalem, and of the Jewish nation, or it may be applied to the persecution that was soon to break out; that, in that day, those whose principles and practices were right, would survive; but that others, who were entangled with weak and superstitious conceits, would be in great danger, though their firm belief that Jesus was the Messiah, would preserve them. Hence it appears, that these words cannot belong to Purgatory, but must denote some signal discrimination to be made, in certain dreadful appearances, which would distinguish between the true and false Apostles, and which could be no other than either the destruction of Jerusalem, or the persecution that was to come on the Church.

The practice of praying for the dead began in the third century; but it was not till long afterwards that Purgatory was even mentioned among Christians. It was at first doubtfully received, and was not fully established till the papacy of Gregory the Great, in the beginning of the seventh century. The belief, that the saying of masses would redeem the souls of the dead from the punishment of Purgatory, was the source of great gain to the clergy of the western churches; the endowments, indeed, for that purpose, became so large and frequent in this country, that it was necessary to restrain them by statutes of mortmain. The doctrine of Purgatory was never admitted into the Greek church, but something of this kind seems to have been believed by Pagans, Jews, and Mahometans.

Not only Purgatory itself is not mentioned in Scripture, but there is not the slightest authority for that distinction between temporal and eternal punishment, which is the foundation of this doctrine; nor are we directed to offer prayers or masses for the souls of the dead. It is nowhere said, that there is any species of guilt or punishment, from which the merits of Christ will not deliver us; on the contrary, we are told, that the 'blood of Jesus Christ will cleanse us from all sin,' (1 John i. 7.); and that 'now there is no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus.' (Rom. viii. 1.) Full and complete forgiveness of sins in the world to come, without any reserve or exception, is promised to repentant sinners; and we have the most positive assurances that they will be eternally happy, without any intimation of suffering, preparatory to their entrance into those joys which are at God's right hand for evermore.

Indeed, it seems absurd to suppose that considerable sufferings should await, in a future life, those who are to be finally saved, and that there should be effectual methods of avoiding or shortening those sufferings, without any mention of the evil, or its remedy, in any part of the New Testament. To this argument from the silence of Scripture, we may add that the Gospel represents Lazarus as at once conveyed to a state of comfort and joy; that our Saviour promised the thief upon the cross that he should on that day be with him in paradise, that St. Paul exults in the prospect of 'a crown of righteousness after death,' (2 Tim. iv. 8.)—that he represents, 'to depart and be with Christ,' (Phil. i. 23.)—'to be absent from the body, and present with the Lord,' (2 Cor. v. 8.) as states which were immediately to follow each other; and St. John says, 'Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours' (Rev. xiv. 13.); but how do they rest from their labours, if they have still the pains of Purgatory to endure?

With respect to temporal punishments, it is evident that God sometimes interposes in visible judgments upon the wicked as well as in blessings upon the good; but, on the other hand, the wicked often appear to prosper, while the good are suffering under adversity. And, indeed, the Gospel warns all men, without any discrimination, to expect crosses and afflictions in this probationary life, and requires faith and patience under the heaviest pressure of the most unprovoked calamities. These are parts of the divine government of this world, which are ordained for the wisest and most salutary purposes, and have no concern whatever with a state of punishment in another life previous to a state of happiness. Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. ii. pp. 347—351; Burnet's Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles, pp. 276, 277.

PURIFICATIONS. There were many kinds among the Hebrews, according to the several kinds of impurities contracted. See DEFILEMENT, LEPROSY, DEATH, NAZARITE, &c. When a woman was delivered of a boy, she was esteemed impure for forty days. (Lev. xii. 1, 2, 3, &c.) During the first seven days she defiled all that she touched. After this she was impure thirty days, but not so as to hinder her from taking care of her household affairs; only from the use and participation of holy things. If she had a girl she was judged unclean for sixty days; during the first two weeks of which she could not touch any thing without defiling it.

When the days of her purification were ended, she offered a lamb to the tabernacle, or temple, for a burnt-offering, and a young pigeon, or dove, for a sin-offering. If she was unable to offer a lamb, she gave two doves, one for a burnt-offering, the other for a sin-offering.

The Virgin Mary complied with the law in this respect, (Luke ii. 2. 23, &c.) in memory of which the church has instituted the feast of the Purification of the Virgin Mary, observed on the second day of February.

The Jews that lived at too great a distance from the temple, and could not resort thither to purify themselves from certain defilements which were unavoidable; such as pollution contracted at the burial of the dead, &c. made use of the ashes of the red heifer sacrificed for this purpose at Jerusalem, and the ashes of which were distributed to all Israelites at a distance. (Numb. xix. 5.) See RED HEIFER.

A man and woman who used the marriage-bed, were unclean until the evening; they washed their clothes, and purified themselves by bathing. (Lev. xv. 16, 17, 18.) A woman under her infirmities was unclean seven days; and whatever she touched was defiled, &c. (Lev. xx. 18.) The ancient Christians on many occasions looked on these infirmities of women as defilements. The Turkish women forbear to come to worship while this lasts. The Indian women do not come into their houses.

Involuntary pollutions in sleep were purified by bathing. (Deut. xxiii. 10.)

The Hebrews had an infinite number of other purifications. They did not so much as eat, or sit down to table, until after they had washed their hands, by pouring water from their fingers' ends up to their elbows. When they returned into their houses, they used to wash their hands. They also purified their pots and cups, their beds, and whatever else they made use of, following the traditions of their elders.

QUA

QUAILS. God gave quails to his people in the wilderness, on two occasions. First in the wilderness of Sin, or Zin, a few days after they had passed the Red Sea. (Exod. xvi. 1—23.) A second time at the encampment, called in Hebrew Kibroth-hattaavah, or, the graves of lust. (Numb. xi. 32. Psalm cv. 40.) Both of these happened in the spring, when the quails pass from Asia into Europe. Then they are found in great quantities on the coasts of the Red Sea and the Mediterranean. God, by a wind, drove them within, and about the camp of Israel; and in this the miracle consists; that they were brought so seasonably to this place and in so great numbers, as to suffice above a million of persons longer than a month. (Exod. xvi. 13.)

QUA

Great difference of opinion has prevailed among the learned with respect to the creature intended by the original word selavim, rendered quails by our translators. This translation is supported by Bochart; by Josephus; by the Rabbins, who reckon four sorts of quails: 1. the Beccafigo; 2. the Thrush; 3. the Pheasant; 4. the Qail. The Septuagint translate ὀρνυομήτρα, the 'mother quail,' a great quail; and with them agree Apollinarius and Philo. On the other hand, the learned Job Ludolph insists, that these Selavim were locusts; because, 1. the word signifies multitudes; 2. the eastern versions retain the original word, whereby it should seem that they do not think it the quail, which they call by another name; 3. Ludolph owns that he received the first idea of his opinion from Porphyry, who mentions an army in Africa ready to perish by hunger, when a cloud of locusts, coming from Libya, relieved their distress. 4. Many tribes of people live on locusts; this must be admitted; and that those insects are sufficiently abundant to maintain them. Bishop Patrick and Scheuchzer entertained a similar opinion. But, not to insist on other arguments, the selavim are expressly called flesh, (Psalm lxxviii. 27.) which locusts are not. The passage in Numbers, (xi. 31.) should be rendered not 'two cubits high,' but, as Bates translates it, 'two cubits distant,' that is, from each other; for, as he well observes, quails 'do not settle, like the locusts, one upon another, but at small distances.' And had the quails lain for a day's journey round the camp, to the great height of two cubits, or nearly three feet, the people need not have been employed two days and a night in gathering them. The spreading them round the camp was in order to dry them for use in the burning sands, as is still practised in Egypt. Parkhurst's Hebrew and English Lexicon, p. 739; Harmer's Observations, vol. iv. p. 367, &c.; *Scripture Illustrated, Exposit. QUAKERS. The members of this society denominate themselves Friends, or the Society of Friends. The name of Quakers was imposed, not assumed; it is expressive of facts rather than of tenets, and, though an epithet of reproach, seems to be stamped upon them indelibly. The appellation of Friends, they borrow from primitive and scriptural example, namely, 'Our friends salute thee,' 'Greet the friends.' (3 John v. 14.) But when they address the king's majesty, and even in their common transactions in the world, they very modestly denominate themselves the people called Quakers, by which name they are more generally known.

Tenets in some respects similar to those of the Quakers appeared in the primitive church, among the Ascodrutæ, as we read in Theodoret; and again, about the latter end of the fourth century, among the Mes-saliani, or Euchitæ, who were for prayer without sacraments; but the people now known by that name took their rise in England, about the middle of the seventeenth century, and rapidly found their way into other countries in Europe, and into the English settlements in North America. They themselves tell us, that, in the seventeenth century, a number of men, dissatisfied with all the modes of religious worship then known in the world, withdrew from the communion of every visible church, to seek the Lord in retirement. Among these was their 'Honourable Elder,' George Fox, who, being 'quicken'd by the immediate touches of Divine love, could not satisfy his apprehensions of duty to God, without directing the people where to find the like consolation and instruction.' In the course of his travels, he met with many 'seeking persons,' in circumstances similar to his own, and these 'readily received his testimony.' 'He was one of the first of the Society of Friends who were imprisoned. He was confined at Nottingham in the year 1649, for having publicly opposed a preacher on a point of doctrine; and in the following year, being brought before two justices in Derbyshire, one of them,' (Justice Bennett) 'scoffing at George Fox, for having bidden him, and those about him, to tremble at the word of the Lord, gave to our predecessors the name of Quakers; an appellation which soon became, and hath remained, our most usual denomination; but they themselves adopted, and have transmitted to us, the endearing appellation of Friends.' They then give us a short account of their sufferings, and different settlements. They also in some measure vindicate Charles II. from the character of a persecutor, acknowledging, that though they suffered much during his reign, he sometimes discountenanced the severities of the legislature. They even tell us that he exerted his authority to rescue their friends from the unprovoked and cruel persecutions which they met with in New England; and they speak with becoming gratitude of the different acts passed in their favour during the reigns of William and Mary, and George the First. At the restoration, a very severe act passed against them, the tendency of which was to compel them to take oaths; but at the Revolution, their scruples found relief, and their affirmation or asseveration has ever since, except in criminal cases, to serve on juries, and hold places of profit under government, been considered as equivalent to an oath.

They give us the following account of their doctrine: 'We agree with other professors of the Christian name, in the belief of one eternal God, the Creator and Preserver of the universe; and in Jesus Christ his Son, the Messiah, and Mediator of the New Covenant. (Heb. xii. 24.) When we speak of the gracious display of the love of God to mankind, in the miraculous conception, birth, life, miracles, death, resurrection, and ascension of our Saviour, we prefer the use of such terms as we find in Scripture; and, contented with that knowledge which Divine Wisdom hath seen meet to reveal, we attempt not to explain those mysteries which remain under the veil; nevertheless we acknowledge and assert the divinity of Christ, who is the wisdom and power of God unto salvation. (1 Cor. i. 24.) To Christ alone we give the title of the Word of God, (John i. 1.) and not to the Scriptures, although we highly esteem these sacred writings, in subordination to the Spirit (2 Peter i. 21.) from which they were given forth; and we hold, with the apostle Paul, that they are able to make wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus. (2 Tim. iii. 15.) We revere those most excellent precepts which are recorded in Scripture to have been delivered by our great Lord, and we firmly believe that they are practicable, and binding on every Christian; and that in the life to come every man will be rewarded according to his works. (Matt. xvi. 27.) And further, it is our belief, that, in order to enable mankind to put in practice these sacred precepts, many of which are contradictory to the unregenerate will of man (John i. 9.), every man coming into the world is endued with a measure of the light, grace, or good spirit of Christ; by which, as it is attended to, he is enabled to distinguish good from evil, and to correct the disorderly passions and corrupt propensities of his fallen nature, which mere reason is altogether insufficient to overcome. For all that belongs to man is fallible, and within the reach of temptation; but this divine grace, which comes by him who hath overcome the world (John xvi. 33.), is, to those who humbly and sincerely seek it, an all-sufficient and present help in time of need. By this the snares of the enemy are detected, his allurements avoided, and deliverance is experienced through faith in its effectual operation; whereby the soul is translated out of the kingdom of darkness, and from under the power of Satan, into the marvellous light and kingdom of the Son of God. Being thus persuaded that man, without the Spirit of Christ inwardly revealed, can do nothing to the glory of God, or to effect his own salvation, we think this influence especially necessary to the performance of the highest act of which the human mind is capable; even the worship of the Father of lights and spirits, in spirit and truth; therefore, we consider as obstructions to pure worship, all forms which divert the attention of the mind from the secret influence of this unction from the Holy One. (1 John ii. 20. 27.) Yet although true worship is not confined to time and place, we think it incumbent on Christians to meet often together, (Heb. x. 25.) in testimony of their dependence on the heavenly Father, and for a renewal of their spiritual strength: nevertheless, in the performance of worship, we dare not depend, for our acceptance with him, on a formal repetition of the words and experiences of others; but we believe it to be our duty to lay aside the activity of the imagination, and to wait in silence to have a true sight of our condition bestowed upon us; believing even a single sigh (Rom. viii. 26.) arising from such a sense of our infirmities, and of the need we have of divine help, to be more acceptable to God than any performances, however specious, which originate in the will of man.

‘From what has been said respecting worship, it follows that the ministry we approve must have its origin from the same source; for that which is needful for man’s own direction, and for his acceptance with God, must be eminently so to enable him to be helpful to others. Accordingly, we believe that the renewed assistance of the light and power of Christ is indispensably necessary for all true ministry; and that this holy influence is not at our command, or to be procured by study, but is the free gift of God to devoted and chosen servants. Hence arises our testimony against preaching for hire, in contradiction to Christ’s positive command, “Freely ye have received, freely give,” (Matt x. 8.); and hence our conscientious refusal to support such ministry by tithes, or other means. As we dare not encourage any ministry but that which we believe to spring from the influence of the Holy Spirit, so neither dare we attempt to restrain this influence to persons of any condition in life, or to the male sex alone; but, as male and female are one in Christ, we allow such of the female sex as we believe to be endued with a right qualification for the ministry to exercise their gifts for the general edification of the church; and this liberty we esteem a peculiar mark of the Gospel dispensation, as foretold by the prophet Joel, (ii. 28, 29.) and noticed by the apostle Peter. (Acts ii. 16, 17.)

‘There are two ceremonies in use among most professors of the Christian name, water-baptism, and what is termed the Lord’s Supper. The first of these is generally esteemed the essential means of initiation into the church of Christ; and the latter of maintaining communion with him. But as we have been convinced that nothing short of his redeeming power, inwardly revealed, can set the soul free from the thralldom of sin; by this power alone we believe salvation to be effected. We hold that as there is one Lord and one faith, (Eph. iv. 5.) so his baptism is one, in nature and operation; that nothing short of it can make living members of his mystical body; and that the baptism with water, administered by his forerunner, John, belonged, as the latter confessed, to an inferior and decreasing dispensation. (John iii. 30.) With respect to the other rite, we believe that communion between Christ and his church is not maintained by that, or by any other external performance, but only by a real participation of his divine nature (2 Peter i. 4.) through faith; that this is the supper alluded to in the Revelation, “Behold I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me,” (Rev. iii. 20.); and that where the substance is attained, it is unnecessary to attend to the shadow; which doth not confer grace, and concerning which, opinions so different and animosities so violent have arisen.' It is probable that Col. ii. 16, 17, applied to the Lord's Supper, might express their minds on this subject.

'Now, as we thus believe that the grace of God, which comes by Jesus Christ, is alone sufficient for salvation, we can neither admit that it is conferred on a few only, whilst others are left without it; nor, thus asserting its universality, can we limit its operation to a partial cleansing of the soul from sin, even in this life. We entertain worthier notions both of the power and goodness of our heavenly Father, and believe that he doth vouchsafe to assist the obedient to experience a total surrender of the natural will to the guidance of his pure unerring Spirit; through whose renewed assistance they are enabled to bring forth fruits unto holiness, and to stand perfect in their present rank. (Matt. v. 48. Eph. iv. 15. Col. iv. 12.) There are not many of our tenets more generally known than our testimony against oaths, and against war. With respect to the former of these, we abide literally by Christ's positive injunction delivered in his Sermon on the Mount, 'Swear not at all.' (Matt. v. 34.) From the same sacred collection of the most excellent precepts of moral and religious duty, from the example of our Lord himself, (Matt. v. 39, 44, &c.; xxvi. 52, 53.) and from the correspondent convictions of his Spirit in our hearts, we are confirmed in the belief that wars and fightings are, in their origin and effects, utterly repugnant to the Gospel; which still breathes peace and good-will to men. (Luke xxii. 51. John xxviii. 11.) We also are clearly of the judgment, that if the benevolence of the Gospel were generally prevalent in the minds of men, it would effectually prevent them from oppressing, much more from enslaving their brethren (of whatever colour or complexion), for whom, as for themselves, Christ died; and even would influence their conduct in their treatment of the brute creation; which would no longer groan, the victims of their avarice, or of their false ideas of pleasure.

'Some of our tenets have, in former times, as hath been shown, subjected our friends to much suffering from government, though to the salutary purposes of government our principles are a security. They inculcate submission to the laws, in all cases wherein conscience is not violated. But we hold, that as Christ's kingdom is not of this world, it is not the business of the civil magistrate to interfere in matters of religion; but to maintain the external peace and good order of the community. We therefore think persecution, even in the smallest degree, unwarrantable. We are careful in requiring our members not to be concerned in illicit trade, nor in any manner to defraud the revenue. It is well known that the Society, from its first appearance, has disused those names of the months and days, which having been given in honour of the heroes or false gods of the heathen, originated in their flattery or superstition; and also the custom of speaking to a single person in the plural number, as having likewise arisen from motives of adulation. Compliments, superfluity of apparel, of furniture, and of provision for the table, outward shows of rejoicing and mourning, and the observation of days and times, we esteem to be incompatible with the simplicity of a Christian life; and public diversions, gaming, and other vain amusements of the world, we cannot but condemn. They are a waste of that time which is given us for nobler purposes; and divert the attention of the mind from the sober duties of life, and from the reproofs of instruction, by which we are guided to an everlasting inheritance. To conclude, although we have exhibited the several tenets which distinguish our religious society, as objects of our belief, yet we are sensible that a true and living faith is not produced in the mind of man by his own effort; but is the free gift of God (Eph. ii. 8.) in Christ Jesus, nourished and increased by the progressive operation of his Spirit in our hearts, and our proportionate obedience. (John vii. 17.) Therefore, although, for the preservation of the testimonies given us to bear, and for the peace and good order of the society, we deem it necessary that those who are admitted into membership with us should be previously convinced of those doctrines which we esteem essential, yet we require no formal subscription to any articles, either as a condition of membership, or a qualification for the service of the church. We prefer judging of men by their fruits, and depending on the aid of him, who, by his prophet, hath promised to be 'for a spirit of judgment to him that sitteth in judgment.' (Isaiah xxviii. 6.) Without this, there is a danger of receiving numbers into outward communion, without any addition to that spiritual sheep-fold, whereof our blessed Lord declared himself to be both the door and the shepherd, (John x. 7, 11.); that is, such as know his voice, and follow him in the paths of obedience.'

They doubtless disregard some things which others deem essentials of the Gospel, as water-baptism, and the use of the bread and wine in the communion, and they are almost the only modern sect, that rejects these two sacraments of the church. Hence, some are unwilling to rank them in the number of Christians. But Dr. Knox, speaking of them, observes, 'I wish any thing I could say (though I wish without hope) could prevail with them to take the outward and visible signs of an inward and spiritual grace. I lament what appears to me to be their mistake; but far be it from any

Christian to say, that they are cut off by it from the body of Christ, while they exhibit proofs in other respects of a Christian faith and a Christian life.'

The Quakers have places of worship, where they regularly assemble on Sundays, and generally once in the week besides; though sometimes without vocal prayer, or any religious or practical exhortations. According to them, all true and acceptable worship is offered by the inward and immediate moving of the Spirit. They do not, however, plead for entirely silent meetings, but only for a retired waiting for the divine aid, which alone qualifies to pray or preach. It does not follow, says Mr. Clarkson, 'because nothing is said, that God is not worshipped. The Quakers, on the other hand, contend, that these silent meetings form the sublimest part of their worship. The soul, they say, can have intercourse with God; it can feel refreshment, joy, and comfort in him; it can praise and adore him, and all this, without the intervention of a word.' They apprehend it their duty to be diligent in assembling themselves together for the worship of God; when such as are duly prepared, by being gathered into a composed awful frame of mind, are enabled, under the influence of divine grace, to worship in solemn silence; or, if moved thereto, to pray or preach as the Spirit giveth them utterance.

Their ceremonies are few and simple. 'In the practice of discipline, we think it indispensable,' say they, 'that the order recommended by Christ himself be invariably observed. (Mat. xviii. 15—17.) To effect the salutary purposes of discipline, meetings were appointed at an early period of the society, which, from the times of their being held, were called quarterly-meetings. It was afterwards found expedient to divide the districts of these meetings, and to meet more frequently; from whence arose monthly-meetings, subordinate to those held quarterly. At length, in 1669, a yearly-meeting was established, to superintend, assist, and to provide rules for the whole; previously to which, general meetings had been occasionally held. A monthly-meeting is usually composed of several particular congregations, situated within a convenient distance from each other. Its business is to provide for the subsistence of the poor, and for the education of their offspring; to judge of the sincerity and fitness of persons appearing to be convinced of the religious principles of the society, and desiring to be admitted into membership; to excite due attention to the discharge of religious and moral duty; and to deal with disorderly members. Monthly-meetings also grant to such of their members as remove into other monthly-meetings, certificates of their membership and conduct; without which they cannot gain membership in such meetings. Each monthly-meeting is required to appoint certain persons, under the name of overseers, who are to take care that the rules of our discipline be put in practice; and, when any case of complaint, or disorderly conduct, comes to their knowledge, to see that private admonition, agreeably to the Gospel rule before-mentioned, be given, previously to its being laid before the monthly-meeting.

'When a case is introduced, it is usual for a small committee to be appointed, to visit the offender, to endeavour to convince him of his error, and induce him to forsake and condemn it. If they succeed, the person is by minute declared to have made satisfaction for the offence; if not, he is disowned as a member of the society. In disputes between individuals, it has long been the decided judgment of the society, that its members should not sue each other at law. It therefore enjoins all to end their differences by speedy and impartial arbitration, agreeably to rules laid down. If any refuse to adopt this mode, or, having adopted it, to submit to the award, it is the direction of the yearly-meeting that such be disowned. To monthly-meetings also belongs the allowing of marriages; for our society hath always scrupled to acknowledge the exclusive authority of the priests in the solemnization of marriage. Those who intend to marry, appear together, and propose their intentions to the monthly-meeting; and, if not attended by their parents or guardians, produce a written certificate of their consent signed in the presence of witnesses. The meeting then appoints a committee to inquire whether they be clear of other engagements respecting marriage; and if at a subsequent meeting no objections be reported, they have the meeting's consent to solemnize their intended marriage. This is done in a public meeting for worship, towards the close whereof the parties stand up, and solemnly take each other for husband and wife. A certificate of the proceedings is then publicly read, and signed by the parties, and afterwards by the relations and others, as witnesses. Of such marriages the monthly-meeting keeps a record; as also of the births and burials of its members. A certificate of the date, of the name of the infant, and of its parents, signed by those present at the birth, is the subject of one of these last-mentioned records; and an order for the interment, counter-signed by the grave-maker, of the other. The naming of children is without ceremony. Burials are also conducted in a simple manner. The body, followed by the relations and friends, is sometimes, previously to interment, carried to a meeting; and at the grave a pause is generally made; on both which occasions it frequently falls out, that one or more friends present have somewhat to express for the edification of those who attend; but no religious rite is considered as an essential part of burial.

'Several monthly-meetings compose a quarterly-meeting. At the quarterly-meeting are produced written answers from the monthly-meetings, to certain queries respecting the conduct of their members, and the meeting's care over them. The accounts thus received are digested into one, which is sent also, in the form of answers to queries, by representatives, to the yearly-meeting. Appeals from the judgment of monthly-meetings are brought to the quarterly-meetings, whose business also it is to assist in any difficult case, or where remissness appears in the care of the monthly-meetings over the individuals who compose them. There are seven yearly-meetings, namely, 1. in London, to which come representatives from Great Britain and Ireland; 2. New England; 3. New York; 4. Pennsylvania and New Jersey; 5. Maryland; 6. Virginia; 7. the Carolinas and Georgia.

'The yearly-meeting has the general superintendence of the society in the country in which it is established; and, therefore, as the accounts which it receives discover the state of inferior meetings, as particular exigencies require, or as the meeting is impressed with a sense of duty, it gives forth its advice, makes such regulations as appear to be requisite, or excites to the observance of those already made; and sometimes appoints committees to visit those quarterly-meetings which appear to be in need of immediate advice. Appeals from the judgment of quarterly-meetings are here finally determined; and a brotherly correspondence, by epistles, is maintained with other yearly-meetings.

'In this place it is proper to add, that, as we believe women may be rightly called to the work of the ministry, we also think, that to them belongs a share in the support of our Christian discipline; and that some parts of it, wherein their own sex is concerned, devolve on them with peculiar propriety. Accordingly, they have monthly, quarterly, and yearly-meetings of their own sex, held at the same time with those of the men; but separately, and without the power of making rules: and it may be remarked, that during the persecutions, which formerly occasioned the imprisonment of so many of the men, the care of the poor often fell on the women, and was by them satisfactorily administered.

'In order that those who are in the situation of ministers may have the tender sympathy and counsel of those of either sex, who, by their experience in the work of religion, are qualified for that service, the monthly-meetings are advised to select such, under the denomination of elders. These, and ministers approved by their monthly-meetings, have meetings peculiar to themselves, called meetings of ministers and elders; in which they have an opportunity of exciting each other to a discharge of their several duties, and of extending advice to those who may appear to be weak, without any needless exposure. Such meetings are generally held in the compass of each monthly, quarterly, and yearly-meeting. They are conducted by rules prescribed by the yearly-meeting, and have no authority to make any alteration or addition to them. The members of them unite with their brethren in the meetings for discipline, and are equally accountable to the latter for their conduct.

'It is to a meeting of this kind in London, called the second day's morning meeting, that the revival of manuscripts concerning our principles, previously to publication, is entrusted by the yearly-meeting held in London; and also the granting, in the intervals of the yearly-meeting, of certificates of approbation to such ministers as are concerned to travel in the work of the ministry in foreign parts; in addition to those granted by their monthly and quarterly-meetings. When a visit of this kind doth not extend beyond Great Britain, a certificate from the monthly-meeting, of which the minister is a member, is sufficient; if to Ireland, the concurrence of the quarterly-meeting is also required. Regulations of similar tendency obtain in other yearly-meetings.

'The yearly-meeting of London, in the year 1675, appointed a meeting to be held in that city, for the purpose of advising and assisting in cases of suffering for conscience' sake, which hath continued with great use to the society to this day. It is composed of friends, under the name of correspondents, chosen by the several quarterly-meetings, and who reside in or near the city. The same meetings also appoint members of their own in the country as correspondents, who are to join their brethren in London on emergency. The names of all these correspondents, previously to their being recorded, are submitted to the approbation of the yearly-meeting. Such men as are approved ministers are also members of this meeting, which is called the Meeting for Sufferings; a name arising from its original purpose, and which is not yet become entirely obsolete.

'The yearly-meeting has entrusted the Meeting for Sufferings with the care of printing and distributing books, and with the management of its stock; and, considered as a standing committee of the yearly-meeting, it hath a general care of whatever may arise, during the intervals of that meeting of the society, and requiring immediate attention; particularly of those circumstances which may occasion an application to government.

'There is not, in any of the meetings which have been mentioned, any president, as we believe that Divine Wisdom alone ought to preside; nor hath any member a right to claim pre-eminence over the rest. The office of clerk, with a few exceptions, is undertaken voluntarily by some member; as is also the keeping of the records. Where these are very voluminous, and require a house for their deposit, (as is the case in London, where the general records of the society in Great Britain are kept,) a clerk is hired to have the care of them; but, except a few clerks of this kind, and persons who have the care of meeting-houses, none receive any stipend or gratuity for their services in our religious society.'

The Quakers are to be found chiefly in Great Britain and Ireland, and in North America. In 1681, king Charles the Second granted to William Penn, in lieu of arrears due to his father Admiral Penn, a large tract of land in North America, since called Pennsylvania after his name; and it is remarkable, that all the settlements of the Europeans in America, except the Quaker settlement of Pennsylvania, were made by force of arms, with very little regard to any prior title in the natives.

Some have said that the Quakers are a species of Deists, exalting their natural light above the Scripture, which some of them have called a dead letter; others have deemed them a kind of enthusiasts, violently enslaved by their impulses and feelings; whilst a third class have considered them, notwithstanding their professions respecting the Spirit, as worldly-minded, eagerly intent on the acquisition of property, and thus commanding the good things of this present world. Their sentiments are doubtless peculiar, as are also their manners; yet we have much reason to believe, that, in general, they are sincere in their professions, and, with some exceptions, steadily governed by the prospects of another world. So far, at least, are they from being Deists, that they are one of the few Christian societies in Britain, which support their discipline in such a manner as to disown those members, who, by word or writing, profess or propagate deistical principles; when, after due labour, such cannot be brought to acknowledge their error.

The Quakers have burying-grounds distinct from those of other denominations. Refusing to pay tithes, they suffer the loss of their goods and of their liberty, rather than comply with the demand, and their losses are emphatically termed sufferings. Many have endured long imprisonments on that account. In the century before last they were exposed, in common with the Non-conformists, to severe persecutions. Even the famous William Penn was tried at the Old Bailey; where he pleaded his own cause.

With respect to the divinity of Christ, they have been very explicit, as may be seen by the following extracts from Penn and Barclay: 'He that is the Everlasting

Wisdom, the Divine Power, the true Light, the only Saviour, the creating Word of all things (whether visible or invisible), and their Upholder by his own power, is without contradiction God; but all these qualifications and divine properties are by the concurrent testimonies of Scripture ascribed to the Lord Jesus Christ, therefore; without a scruple, I call and believe him really to be the mighty God.' '[Christ] having been with God from all eternity, being himself God, and also in time partaking of the nature of man, through him is the goodness and love of God conveyed to mankind, and by him again man receiveth and partaketh of these mercies.'

We may well envy the mild creed, and universal charity, or fraternal love, of the Quakers, while we must allow with a sigh, that a nation of Quakers could not exist, except all nations were of the same persuasion. To this, however, it has been said by one of their writers, that any nation actually possessing and practising Christian principles, may be contented with the protection of Heaven, which can always find means to protect what it brings to pass. However few of other denominations may be disposed to think well of their religious opinions, or of many of their peculiar customs, it cannot be denied that the Quakers, as members of society, are a very respectable body; and that though they have a church (if that term may be used in regard to their society) not only without sacraments, but even without a priesthood, and a government without a head, they are perhaps the best organized and most unanimous religious society in the world. Their benevolence, moral rectitude, and commercial punctuality, have excited, and long secured to them, very general esteem; and it has been well observed, that in the multitudes that compose the vast legion of vagrants and street beggars, not a single Quaker can be found.

They object to the common mode of solemnizing marriage, as, say they, from Genesis to Revelation, no record is to be found of marriage performed by a priest. They consider it as a civil contract, and they quote William Penn, who says, that 'it was the unanimous sense of Friends, that joining in marriage was the work of the Lord only.' Hence, of all the sects in England, they are indulged with the peculiar privilege of being married in their own way, and in their own places of worship. What that particular way, or what the form of the vows, or rather promises, which they then make, may be, are not sufficiently known: we are, notwithstanding, led to suppose that they are seldom broken; for it is a fact, and to their credit be it spoken, that we never hear of adultery or divorce among them. Adam's Religious World Displayed, vol. iii. pp. 314—345.

R.

RA'AMAH, רעמא, rayma, signifies the thunder, or exprobation; otherwise an apple, or certain society, or certain breaking. Raamah, the fourth son of Cush, peopled the country of Arabia, whence they brought to Tyre spices, precious stones, and gold. Calmet thinks this country to have been in Arabia Felix, at the entrance into the Persian Gulf. (Gen. x. 7. Ezek. xxvii. 22.) A late writer observes, 'the greatest probability is, that it is Reama, in Arabia Felix, which is described by Barthema as a place of considerable trade; and, as Ezekiel characterizes Raamah as dealing with Tyre, this seems to coincide. Niebuhr places Rema in N. lat. 15½, not far from Sanaa, south; and this further corroborates the conjecture that here we may place Raamah, says Michaelis.' Sacred Geography.

RAB, רב, signifies great. Rab, Rabbin, Rabban, or Rabbam, a title of dignity among the Hebrews, which signifies master, or excellent. We find the name Rab given not only to masters and doctors, to the chief of a class, but also to the principal officers of the court of a prince; for example, Nebuzaradan, general of the army of king Nebuchadnezzar, is always called Rab Tabachim, (2 Kings xxv. 8. 20. Jer. xxxix. 9.) or the master of the butchers, cooks, or guards. Esther (i. 8.) says, that Ahasuerus appointed a Rab of his court over every table of his guests, to take care that nothing should be wanting. Daniel (i. 3.) speaks of Ashpenaz, the Rab of the eunuchs of the house of Nebuchadnezzar, and of the Rab of Saganim, or chief of the governors or peers. (Dan. ii. 48.) This prophet himself was preferred to be chief of the interpreters of dreams, or Rab of the Chartunim. (Dan. v. 11.) It appears that this name came originally from the Chaldees; for before the captivity, when mention is made of Judea, we do not find it used, but only in reference to the officers of the king of Babylon.

Rab, or Rabban, properly signifies master, or one who excels in any thing; Rabbi or Rabbani, is My master. Rabbin is the plural. This Rab is of greater dignity than Rabbi, and Rabbin or Rabbim, is of greater dignity than Rab, or Rabbi.

There were several gradations among the Jews before the dignity of Rabbin, as among us, before the degree of doctor. The head of a school was called Chacham, or wise; he, who aspired to the doctorship, had the name of Bachur, or Elou; he frequented the school of the Chacham. When further advanced, he had the title of Cabar of the Rab, or master's companion. Lastly, when further skilled in the knowledge of the law and traditions, he was called only Rab, or Rabin, and Morena, our master.

The Chacham Rab, or master Rabbin, decided differences, determined things allowed or forbidden, and judged in religious, and even in civil controversies. He celebrated marriages, and declared divorces. He preached, if he had a talent for it; and was head of the academies. He had the head seats in the assemblies, and in the synagogues. He reprimanded the disobedient, and could excommunicate them; and this procured him great respect. In their schools they sat upon raised chairs, and their scholars were seated at their feet. Hence (Acts xxii. 3.) St. Paul is said to have studied at the feet of Rabbi Gamaliel.

Our Saviour upbraids the Rabbins and masters of Israel with their vanity, and eagerness to have the first places at feasts, and the head seats in the synagogues; and also with their being saluted in the streets, and desiring to be called Rabbi, my master.

The studies of the Rabbins are employed either on the text of the law, or the traditions, or the Cabbala; these three objects form so many different schools, and different sorts of Rabbins. Those who chiefly apply to the letter of Scripture, are called Caraites, Literalists. Those who chiefly study the traditions and oral laws of the Talmud, are called Rabbinists. Those who give themselves to their secret and mysterious divinity, letters and numbers, are called Cabbalists, Traditionaries.

The Rabbins are generally very ignorant in history, chronology, philology, antiquity, and geography. They understand the holy language but imperfectly. They know not the true signification of a multitude of words in the sacred text. They are prodigiously conceited about their traditions, so that there is very little profit in reading them; and experience shows, that most who have applied themselves to peruse their books have been but little benefited by them, and have entertained a perfect contempt of their understanding and their works.

The chief function of the Rabbins is to preach in the synagogue, to make public prayers there, and to interpret the law; they have the power of binding and loosing, that is, of declaring what is forbid, and what is allowed. When the synagogue is poor and small, there is but one Rabbin, who at the same time discharges the offices of a judge and a teacher. But when the Jews are numerous and powerful, they appoint three pastors, and a house of judgment, where all their civil affairs are determined. Then the Rabbin applies himself to instruction only, unless it be thought proper to call him into the council, to give his advice; in which case he takes the chief place.

They have the authority of creating new Rabbins. They pretend that formerly every doctor had a right of giving his title to his disciple; but that in the time of Hillel they relinquished this power to him, and restrained themselves to asking leave of the head of the captivity, at least in the East. At present they content themselves with installing the new Rabbin in an assembly of several doctors. Sometimes it is sufficient for one Rabbin alone to lay on his hands, when it is difficult for several to assemble.

In vain do the Rabbins boast of the antiquity of their schools and doctors: when we search into these things, we find nothing but confusion and uncertainty. They speak with great emphasis of their schools at Japhne and Tiberias, in Palestine, after the destruction of the temple; and those of Nahardea, Pundebita, and Sora, in the East. They produce lists of doctors who have taught in them; but all these are so ill put together, that nothing can be concluded from them.

RAB'BAH, רבב, ἄρα ραββὰθ, signifies great, a multitude. Rabbah, Rabbath, or Rabbat-Ammon, or Rabbath of the children of Ammon, afterwards called Philadelphia, was the capital of the Ammonites, and was situated beyond Jordan. It was famous and considerable even in the time of Moses, who tells us that there was still preserved here the iron bedstead of king Og. When David declared war against the Ammonites, his general, Joab, laid siege to Rabbath-Ammon, where the brave Uriah lost his life, by a secret order give by this prince, that Uriah should be forsaken in a place of danger. And when the city was reduced to the last extremity, David himself went thither, that he might have the honour of taking it. From this time it became subject to the kings of Judah. Afterwards the kings of Israel became masters of it, with all the rest of the tribes beyond Jordan.

But towards the conclusion of the kingdom of Israel, Tiglath-pileser having taken away a great part of the Israelites from that country, the Ammonites were guilty of many cruelties against those that remained; from whence it originated, that the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel pronounced very severe prophecies against Rabbath, the capital city of the Ammonites, and against the rest of the country; which probably had their completion five years after the destruction of Jerusalem. Antiochus the Great took the city of Rabbath-Ammon, about the year of the world 3786. Some time before this, Ptolemy Philadelphus had given it the name of Philadelphia. See PHILADELPHIA.

RAB'BATH MOAB, or Rabbath of the children of Moab, was the capital of the Moabites, and was otherwise called Ar, or Areopolis. This city underwent many revolutions, and the prophets threatened it with great misfortunes.

RAB'SHAKEH, רב־שקה, signifies cup-bearer of the prince, or chamberlain; it denotes the chief butler, or cup-bearer, and is a term of dignity, a title of office, and not a proper name. Rab-shakeh was sent by Sennacherib, king of Assyria, to summon Hezekiah, which he did. Rab-shakeh spoke to him in a very haughty and insolent manner, and told him in Hebrew that he ought not to put any confidence either in the king of Egypt, or the Lord, who had ordered Sennacherib to march against Judea. (2 Kings xviii. 17.)

After this, Rab-shakeh returned to his master, who had quitted the siege of Lachish to meet the king of Egypt, then coming to assist Hezekiah. But in this march the destroying angel slew 185,000 of the army of Sennacherib; and he was obliged to hasten back to Nineveh, where he was slain by his own sons. See HEZEKIAH. (Isai. xxxvii. 36, 37, &c. 2 Kings xix. 35, 36, 37.)

RAB'SARIS, רב־סרים, signifies grand, master of the eunuchs; or, gentleman of the chamber to the prince. Rab-saris, or Rabsares, was chief of the eunuchs of king Sennacherib, and was sent with Rab-shakeh and Tartan to summon Hezekiah. Rabsaris is not a proper name, but a name of dignity, a title of office. (Jer. xxxix. 3.)

RACA, ρακα, a Syriac word, signifying empty, vain, beggarly, foolish, and including a strong idea of contempt. Jesus Christ says (Matt. v. 22.) that whoever shall say to his neighbour Raca, shall be condemned by the council or Sanhedrim.

Lightfoot assures us, that in the books of the Jews the word Raca is a term of the utmost contempt; and is used to be pronounced with certain gestures of indignation, as spitting, turning away the head, &c.

RA'CHEL, רחל, signifies sheep. Rachel was the daughter of Laban, and sister of Leah. When Jacob fled from his brother Esau's resentment, he arrived in Mesopotamia, near the city of Haran: finding some shepherds there, he inquired if they knew Laban the son of Nahor. They answered, We know him well, and here is his daughter Rachel coming with the flock. Jacob introduced himself to her, was brought into Laban's house, and entertained with great civility. When he had been there about a month, Laban desired him to propose some recompense for his services. Jacob offered to serve him seven years for his younger daughter Rachel in marriage. Laban agreed to this; but instead of Rachel, Laban imposed her elder sister, Leah, on Jacob.

Jacob, the next morning, made bitter complaints; Laban excused it, and offered, if he was willing to serve him other seven years, to let him have Rachel also. Jacob agreed; and when the week of Leah's wedding was over, he married Rachel. His affection for Rachel abated his kindness for Leah; but the Lord gave children to Leah, and none to Rachel. This excited Rachel's anger, and she said to Jacob, 'Give me children or else I die:' but Jacob answered her with indignation. Rachel said, Take my maid Bilhah, that I may have children by her. Jacob taking Bilhah, she brought forth a son, whom Rachel called Dan. Bilhah had another son the year following, whom Rachel named Naphtali.

At last the Lord remembered Rachel; she brought forth a son, whom she named Joseph. Some years after, Jacob taking a resolution to return to Canaan, Rachel, unknown to Jacob, privately took away the Teraphim or domestic gods of her father Laban, in the year of the world 2265. (Gen. xxxi.) Laban pursued Jacob, and charged him with this theft. Jacob wished him to search every tent, which he did without finding any thing. Laban coming into Rachel's tent, she hid the Teraphim under her camel's furniture, and sat down upon it. When her father had searched every where in vain, she said, Let not my lord be angry that I cannot rise in his presence, for the custom of women is upon me; and thus she evaded her father's inquiry.

When Jacob passed over the brook Jabbok, he divided his wives and children into three companies. He put the two maids and their children first; Leah and her children second; and lastly, Rachel and her son Joseph. This he did, that, if Esau should assault the first company, the second and third might escape; or if he should not spare the second, at least the third might avoid his fury. After he had passed over Jordan, as he advanced towards Hebron, and was not above a furlong from Bethlehem, otherwise called Ephrath, Rachel was seized with the pains of child-birth. She brought forth a son, whom she named Ben-oni, or the son of my pain; but Jacob named him Benjamin, or the son of my right hand. Rachel died, and Jacob buried her in this place, erecting a monument for her, which continued for ages.

They show in Judea a monument which they call Rachel's; but it is too like the Turkish monuments to be ancient.

It may have been renewed in later ages. Rachel died in the year of the world 2265.

The prophet Jeremiah (xxxi. 15.) and after him St. Matthew (ii. 18.) have put Rachel for the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, born from Joseph the son of Rachel. 'A voice was heard in Ramah, lamentation and bitter weeping; Rachel, weeping for her children, refused to be comforted for her children, because they were not.' This prophecy was completed when these two tribes were carried into captivity beyond the Euphrates. St. Matthew has accommodated this prophecy to what happened at Bethlehem, when Herod slew the children there. Then Rachel, who was buried there, might be said to renew her cries and lamentations for the death of so many infant innocents, sacrificed to his jealousy and cruelty.

RA'HAB, רהב, signifies which is large and extended, or public place. Rahab was an hostess of the city of Jericho, who received and concealed the spies sent by Joshua. The Hebrew calls her Zonah (Joshua ii. 1.), which Jerome and many others understand of a prostitute. Others think she was only an hostess or inn-keeper, and that this is the true signification of the original word. Had she been a woman of ill fame, would Salmon, a prince of the tribe of Judah, have taken her to wife? or could he have done it by the law? Besides, the spies of Joshua would hardly have gone to lodge with a common harlot; they who were charged with so nice and dangerous a commission. Those who maintain she was an harlot, pretend that she was perhaps one of those women that prostituted themselves in honour of the Pagan deities; as if this could extenuate her crime, or the scandal of her profession, if she was a public woman. It is also observable, that such women are called Kadeshah, not Zonah, in the Hebrew.

But, whatever was Rahab's profession, when the spies had entered her house, notice was given to the king of Jericho, who sent to Rahab to produce those men: but she hid them, and told the messengers, that such men had been at her house, but that, when the gates of the city were shutting, they went out. Pursue them quickly, she said, and you may overtake them. They forthwith pursued them, but in vain, for they were concealed on the terrace of Rahab's house.

When the king's messengers were gone away, Rahab went up to the terrace, or roof, of her house, and said to the spies, I know the Lord has delivered this country into your hands; promise me, now, that you will save the lives of me and my family, when you take this city. The spies promised her, with an oath, and bid her tie a scarlet string to her window, that her house might be distinguished when the Israelites should enter Jericho.

Then she let them down by a rope; for her house joined to the walls of the city; advising them to return by the mountains, for fear of meeting those who had been sent in quest of them; and to continue on the mountains three days, in which time the messengers would return, after which they might proceed. The spies followed Rahab's counsel exactly, and at the end of three days arrived at Joshua's camp, to whom they related all they had discovered at Jericho, and their promises to their benefactress Rahab. When Joshua took the city, he sent the two spies to the house of Rahab, to bring her out safe with all her relations. Rahab married Salmon, a prince of Judah, by whom she had Boaz: from whom descended Obed, Jesse, and king David. Thus Jesus Christ condescended to reckon this Canaanitish woman among his ancestors. St. Paul magnifies the faith of Rahab. (Heb. xi. 31.)

RAHAB, רַהַב, signifies proud; otherwise quarrelsome. The Psalmist (lxxxvii. 4.) speaks of another Rahab, different from this now mentioned. 'I will make mention of Rahab and Babylon to them that know me.' And again, (Psalm lxxxix. 10.) 'Thou hast broken Rahab in pieces,' or 'the Egyptian.' Isaiah (li. 9.; xxx. 7.) makes use of the same word Rahab, to denote the destruction of Pharaoh and his army in the Red Sea.

RAIN, the vapours exhaled by the sun, which fall from the clouds to the earth in drops. (Eccles. xi. 3.) Some are of opinion, from certain expressions of Scripture, that the ancient Hebrews imagined rain to be derived from certain great reservoirs above the heavens, which Moses calls the superior waters, by way of contradistinction from the inferior waters, the sea. Moses says that, at the Deluge, 'All the fountains of the great deep were broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened.' And Hosea says (ii. 21.) that in times of great drought the clouds cry to the Lord, beseeching him to permit the waters which he keeps in his treasures and repositories, to fall into them and replenish them.

The sacred writers often speak of the rain of the former season, and of the rain of the latter. (Deut. xi. 14.) Twice in the year, there fell plenty of rain in Judea: in the beginning of the civil year about September or October; and half a year after in the month Abib, or March, which was the first month in the ecclesiastical or holy year, whence it is called the latter rain in the first month. (Joel ii. 23.)

RAINBOW, or simply the bow, a meteor in form of a party-coloured arch, or semi-circle, exhibited in a rainy sky opposite to the sun, by the refraction of his rays in the drops of falling rain. There is a secondary or fainter bow usually seen, investing the former, at some distance; and among naturalists, we also read of lunar rainbows, marine rainbows, &c. The rainbow, Sir Isaac Newton observes, never appears, except where it rains in the sunshine; and it may be represented artificially, by contriving water to fall in little drops like rain through which the sun shining exhibits a bow to a spectator placed between the sun and the drops, especially if a dark body, as black cloth, be disposed beyond the drops.

On the origin and nature of the rainbow there have been a great variety of conjectures, till Anthony de Dominis, bishop of Spalatro, in a treatise of his published by Bartholus in 1611, partly suggested the true cause of this phenomenon, which was afterwards fully explained and demonstrated by Sir Isaac Newton. To readers in general it may be sufficient to say, that the rainbow is a mere natural effect of a natural cause: 1. It is never seen but in showery weather. 2. Nor then, unless the sun shines. 3. It never appears in any part of the heavens but in that opposite to the sun. 4. It never appears greater than a semi-circle, but often much less. 5. It is always double, there being what is called the superior and inferior, or primary, and secondary rainbow. 6. These bows exhibit the seven prismatic colours, red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo, and violet. 7. The whole of this phenomenon depends on the rays of the sun falling on spherical drops of water, and being, in their passage through them, refracted and reflected.

The rainbow was the sign or token which God appointed as a confirmation of the truth of his promise to Noah, that he would not any more destroy the earth by a general deluge, or disturb the order of nature and the several seasons of the year, and their regular vicissitudes. (Gen. ix. 8—17.) From the well-known cause of this phenomenon, it cannot be rationally supposed that there was no rainbow in the heavens before the time mentioned in this passage; for, as the rainbow is the natural effect of the sun's rays falling on drops of water, and of their being refracted and reflected by them, it must have appeared at different times from the creation of the sun and the atmosphere. Nor does this passage intimate that the bow was now created, for a sign to Noah and his posterity; but, that what was formerly created, or rather, that which was the necessary effect, in certain cases, of the creation of the sun and atmosphere, should now be considered by them as an unfulfilling token of their continual preservation from the waters of a deluge. It is, indeed, no more necessary to suppose that the rainbow was now created, for this purpose, than the symbols of bread and wine, for the institution of the Lord's Supper. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. p. 43; Dr. Adam Clarke's Comment. on Gen. ix. 13.

RAM, or BATTERING RAM, an engine of war, well known and much used by the ancients in sieges. It is mentioned by Ezekiel, (iv. 1, 2.; xxi. 22.) in two passages; and Nebuchadnezzar used it at the siege of Jerusalem. Pliny says, it was Epeus that invented the ram at the siege of Troy; but Vitruvius and Tertullian ascribe the invention to the Carthaginians. It is thought Ezekiel is the first author that has made any mention of this machine.

RA'MAH, רמה, signifies height or exalted; otherwise, projected. Ramah was a city of Benjamin, between Gaba and Bethel, towards the mountains of Ephraim, six miles from Jerusalem north. Jerome places it near Gaba, seven miles from Jerusalem: it was, in his time, only a small village. This city stood on the road from Samaria to Jerusalem; for this reason, Baasha, king of Israel, caused it to be fortified, to obstruct the passage from the land of Judah into that of Israel. Josephus calls it Ramathan. (Josh. xviii. 25. Judg. iv. 5.; xix. 13. 1 Kings xv. 17. 2 Chron. xvi. 1.) This Ramah is also thought to be the city of Samuel. (1 Sam. i. 19.; ii. 11, &c.)

It is also very probable that Jeremiah speaks of this Ramah, (Jer. xl. 1, 2, 3.) when he says, Nebuzaradan, who commanded the Chaldaean army, having found him among the captives at Ramah, whither they had been all brought, set him at liberty. Of the same place Calmet explains that other prophecy of Jeremiah, (xxxi. 15, 16, 17.) in which the Lord comforts Rachel, on account of the taking the children of Ephraim and Manasseh into captivity: 'A voice was heard in Ramah, lamentation and bitter weeping; Rachel weeping for her children,' &c. Matthew, (ii. 18.) has accommodated this passage to the massacre of the infants of Bethlehem by Herod.

The Scripture often joins Ramah with Gaba, Geba, or Gibeah, as being neighbouring places. (Ezra ii. 26. Nehem. vii. 30. Isaiah x. 29. Hosea v. 8.) We also see, (1 Sam. xxii. 6.) that Saul, when in Gibeah, sat under a tree at Ramah: but in this place Calmet takes Ramah only to signify the eminence at Gibeah.

'The oriental geographers,' says Mr. Buckingham, 'speak of Ramah as the metropolis of Palestine, and every appearance of its ruins even now confirms the opinion of its having been once a considerable city. Its situation, as lying immediately in the high road from Jaffa to Jerusalem, made it necessarily a place of great resort; and from the fruitfulness of the country around it, it must have been equally important as a military station or a depôt for supplies, and as a magazine for the collection of such articles of commerce as were exported from the coast. In its present state, the town of Ramah, or, as it is now called, Ramlah, is about the size of Jaffa, in the extent actually occupied. The dwellings of this last, however, are crowded together around the sides of a hill, while those of Ramah are scattered widely over the face of the level plain on which it stands. The style of building here is that of high square houses, with flattened domes covering them; and some of the terraced roofs are fenced around with raised walls, in which are seen pyramids of hollow earthenware pipes, as if to give air and light without destroying the strength of the wall itself. On the large mosque we noticed a square tower with pointed arched windows, like many of our country-church steeples in England, differing only from these in being surmounted by an open gallery, and a flat-domed summit. These last, it could be plainly seen, were subsequent additions, and did not harmonize with the tower itself, which is purely Gothic, and, no doubt, a Christian work at the period of the Crusades. We saw also, in other parts of the town, vestiges of Gothic edifices, of a character decidedly different from Saracen architecture, though both of them have the pointed arch in common: but all these were greatly ruined. The convent of the Latins is large and commodious, though not equal to that of Nazareth. It has a good church, an open court, with a fine spreading orange-tree, and several wells of excellent water in it for their gardens. The inhabitants are estimated at little more than five thousand persons, of whom about one-third are Christians of the Greek and Catholic communion, and the remaining two-thirds Mahometans, chiefly Arabs; the men of power and the military only being Turks, and no Jews residing there. The principal occupation of the people is husbandry, for which the surrounding country is highly favourable; and the staple commodities produced by them are corn, olives, oil, and cotton, with some soap and coarse cloth made in the town. There are still remains of some noble subterranean cisterns at Ramah, not inferior either in extent or execution to many of those at Alexandria. They were intended for the same purpose, namely, to serve in times of war as reservoirs of water.'

'The town,' says Dr. Clarke, 'is situated in the middle of an extensive and fertile plain, which is a part of the great Field of Sharon, if we may bestow upon any particular region a name which was applied to more than one district of the Holy Land. It makes a considerable figure at a distance; but we found nothing within the place, except traces of devastation and death: It exhibited one scene of ruin. Houses fallen or deserted appeared on every side; and instead of inhabitants, we beheld only the skeletons of putrifying carcases of horses and camels. These were lying in all the streets, and even in the courts and chambers of the buildings belonging to the place. A plague, or rather a murrain, during the preceding year, had committed such ravages, that not only men, women, and children, but cattle of all kinds, and every thing that had life, became its victims.' Clarke's Travels, vol. iv. p. 431; Buckingham's Travels in Palestine, vol. i. pp. 261—264, octavo edition of 1822.

RAMAH, a city of the tribe of Naphtali, (Josh. xix. 36.) on the frontiers of Asher. (Josh. xix. 29.) Jerome reads Horma in Hebrew; but our version, the Septuagint, and Eusebius, read Ramah. The same Eusebius, and Cyrillus of Jerusalem, own there was a Ramah in the tribe of Asher, and another belonging to Naphtali.

RAMOTH, רמותר, ראמותר, signifies eminences, or heights. Ramoth was a famous city in the mountains of Gilead; often called Ramoth-Gilead; sometimes Ramoth; and sometimes Ramath-mispeh, or the Watch-tower. (Josh. xiii. 26.) Josephus calls it Ramatham, or Aramatha. This city belonged to the tribe of Gad. It was assigned to the Levites, and was one of the cities of refuge beyond Jordan. (Deut. iv. 43. Josh. xx. 8.; xxi. 38.) It became famous during the reigns of the latter kings of Israel, and was the occasion of several wars between these princes and the kings of Damascus, who had conquered it, and from whom the kings of Israel endeavoured to regain it. (1 Kings xxii. 3, 4, &c. 2 Kings viii. 28, 29. 2 Chron. xxii. 5.) Jehoram, king of Judah, was dangerously wounded at the siege of this place: and Jehu, the son of Nimshi, was here anointed king of Israel, by a prophet sent by Elisha. (2 Kings ix. 1, 2, &c.) Ahab, king of Israel, was killed in battle with the Syrians before this place. (2 Chron. xviii. 3, 4, 5, &c.) Eusebius says, that Ramoth was fifteen miles from Philadelphia east. Jerome places it in the neighbourhood of Jabbok, and, consequently, north of Philadelphia. It is now called Ramza.

REASON. Many, who have not been enemies to religion, have nevertheless disputed the necessity of the Christian revelation: they thought that reason itself, without any supernatural communication, was sufficient to discover the relations in which God stands to man, and man to God; to determine what is man's present duty and his future expectations. But that reason alone is inadequate for this purpose, we may learn from the insufficiency of its exertions in the heathen world; for surely it will not be denied that among the heathens, whether we consider the sages of Greece or of Rome, there were men who possessed a vigour of mind, which, if it has been equalled, has never been exceeded in modern times: and yet these men, after the closest and most elaborate intellectual research, could never attain to any thing more than a slight glimmering of those truths which may be called the fundamentals of religion.

If the efforts of the wisest philosophers, during a series of ages, were found so totally inadequate to the moral and religious improvement of the speculative and the practical habits of mankind, we may conclude that similar efforts, unassisted by any Divine communication, would have been equally unavailing if they had continued to the present time; for though knowledge is progressive, yet no successions of intellectual endeavour can advance the progress of that knowledge, which is so independent of rational experiment and research as the doctrine of a future life; and therefore we may readily suppose that, on this most important article of religion, the heathen sages had learned all that reason could teach without the aid of revelation. Hence we may well infer the necessity of some Divine interposition to bring life and immortality to light; to demonstrate to us, not by a long chain of reasoning, too subtle or profound for the popular apprehension, but in a way suited to the conceptions of the most untutored intellect, that the consciousness of man is not destroyed by death, and that there is a state of impartial retribution beyond the grave.

Though reason, however, might pretend to some knowledge of a future state, her utmost abilities could not discover what atonement God would be pleased to accept for the sins of the world. This was a task to which she was wholly unequal. The heathens, indeed, plainly saw that some expiation was necessary. They were convinced, that if there was a God, he must be offended with vice and pleased with virtue. They knew that they were not virtuous, and that, therefore, they could not be in favour with God. They wanted the first and fundamental requisite for obtaining tranquillity; an assurance that pardon could be procured on any terms. Indeed, there was a possibility, and, perhaps, a probability, that the Almighty would pardon their offences; but there was a possibility that he would not. The very possibility, therefore, of being exposed to the resentment of a God without mercy, and without control, was enough to sink them into despair. Having no confidence in any thing, they tried every thing. They made use of every expedient which could be devised, and, like men ready to perish, caught at whatever seemed to afford a prospect of relief. Hence originated that infinite number of deities, temples, altars, festivals, games, sacrifices, supplications, and processions. The infinite number of ceremonies and superstitions which they employed, plainly demonstrated their uneasiness, but could not remove its efficient cause. From the Gospel we know that God is merciful, long-suffering, and of great goodness. We know that the death of his Son was intended as a propitiatory atonement for the sins of mankind. We are acquainted with the means of preserving that favour, which Christ has procured us; and, with respect to the misery which guilt occasions, we no longer feel the torment of not knowing in what manner it is to be expiated. The Scripture assures us, that 'Jesus is the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world;' that he 'came to seek and to save that which was lost;' and that 'whosoever believeth in him shall not perish, but have everlasting life.' Hence, then, in the most important of all human concerns, we see the necessity of a Divine revelation, from which the meanest and most ignorant Christian enjoys more true content, more peace and satisfaction of mind, than any heathen philosopher could ever receive from all his wisdom and erudition. See RELIGION and REVELATION.

Bishop Porteus's Sermons.

REBEK'AH, רבקה, signifies fat, fattened; otherwise, quarrel, appeased, or removed. Rebekah, or Rebecca, was daughter of Bethuel, and wife of Isaac. (Gen. xxiv.) Eliezer, the steward of Abraham's house, went to fetch a wife for Isaac from Haram, a city of Mesopotamia, and he brought Rebekah. Rebekah lived with Isaac twenty years, without having children: Isaac interceded for her by his prayers; and she became with child of two children; who, struggling together in her womb, and giving her great uneasiness, she consulted the Lord on this occasion; who told her that two nations were in her womb, and that the elder should be subject to the younger. It is not agreed whom Rebekah consulted with: some will have it that she went to Shem, the son of Noah; some, to Melchisedek; some, to Heber; some, to Abraham; and others think she went to sacrifice on Mount Moriah, or on the altar that Abraham had erected in the forest of Beer-sheba, and that while she slept there God revealed this to her.

When Rebekah's time of delivery was come, she became the mother of twins. The first was ruddy and hairy, and they named him Esau. The other immediately followed, holding in his hand the heel of his brother; wherefore they called him Jacob, the Heeler. When they grew up, Esau betook himself to hunting; but Jacob was a plain inactive man, and dwelt at home in tents. Isaac had most inclination for Esau, but Jacob was the favourite of Rebekah; she found means of making him obtain surreptitiously the blessing of his father Isaac. See JACOB and ISAAC.

A great famine having forced Isaac to Gerar, a city of the Philistines, of which Abimelech was king; when asked, who Rebekah was, he answered 'his sister;' because he feared they might put him to death, in order to possess his wife. Abimelech one day perceived him to caress her in a manner that better agreed with a husband than a brother. Abimelech then ordered him to be called, and reprimanded him; and forbade any one to meddle with his wife, on pain of death.

Jacob, by the management of his mother Rebekah, having obtained his father's blessing, to the prejudice of his brother Esau, Esau threatened to be his death for it. Rebekah had notice of his design, and, to prevent it, advised Jacob to travel into Mesopotamia to his uncle Laban, and there to marry one of his daughters. She prevailed with Isaac to consent to this journey, insinuating that her life became a burden to her, on account of the daughters of Heth, one of whom Esau had married; and that if Jacob should also take a wife of this country, her life would no longer be supportable. Scripture makes no farther mention of Rebekah; and the year of her death is uncertain: but she certainly died before Isaac; because it is said, that Isaac was put into the tomb with Rebekah his wife. This tomb was the same in which Abraham and Sarah had been before buried, and where afterwards Jacob and Leah were deposited. (Gen. xlix. 31, &c.; xxxv. 29.)

RE'CHAB, רכב, signifies square, or chariot, or team of horses, or a rider. Rechab was father of Jonadab, and of the Rechabites. It is not known in what time this Rechab lived, nor what was his original. Some will have him to proceed from the tribe of Judah. Others think he was a priest, or at least a Levite, because it is said, (Jeremiah xxxv. 19.) that there shall be always found of the descendants of Jonadab stedfast to the service of the Lord. Some Rabbins pretend, that the Rechabites having married the daughters of the priests or Levites, their children were employed in the temple service. Others think, that indeed they waited in the temple, but only as servants, like the Gibeonites and Nethinim, who were servants of the priests and Levites. We read (1 Chron. ii. 55.) that the Rechabites were originally Kenites, and that they were singers in the house of God.

The Kenites were not descended from Jacob, but from Midian, son of Cush; by Hobab, or Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses. They entered the promised land with the Hebrews, and dwelt in the tribe of Judah, about the Dead Sea. They were distinguished from the Israelites by their retired sort of life, and by their contempt of cities and houses. Some have thought that Hobab or Jethro was the first founder of the Rechabites; that Rechab was one of his names; that Jonadab, in the time of Jehu, was one of his descendants; that Heber the Kenite followed the customs of the Rechabites. Serrarius distinguishes the ancient Rechabites, descended from and instituted by Jethro, from the new Rechabites, of Jonadab, son of Rechab, who lived in the time of Jehu, king of Israel.

The injunction imposed by Jonadab on his posterity was, not to drink wine, not to build houses, not to sow grain, nor to plant vineyards, to have no lands, and to dwell in tents all their lives. Such was the institution of the children of Rechab. It laid no obligations on the Kenites, nor on the other descendants of Jethro. This they continued to observe above three hundred years, from the time of Jehu to that of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, when Nebuchadnezzar coming to besiege Jerusalem, the Rechabites were obliged to leave the country, and take refuge in the city; whence it is imagined they were carried captives, together with the Jews, by the Chaldeans.

REDEMPTION denotes our recovery from sin and death, by the obedience and sacrifice of Christ, who, on this account, is called 'The Redeemer.' (Isai. lix. 20. Job xix. 25.) 'God made his creature man upright, but he sought out many inventions.' We could not possibly have come forth from the hands of an infinitely good and Almighty Maker, such wicked and unhappy creatures as we are. How we came into this state of corruption and misery, by the transgression of a covenant, made between God and our first parent and representative, is plainly set forth in the Mosaic history, where the origin of moral evil or sin, and of the universal disposition in all men to sin, is cleared up, and charged on our freedom, that is, on the highest perfection of our nature. If then we were, and still are, free to do good or evil, though more inclinable to evil, does not sin, if we commit it, 'lie at the door?' But since it is as plain, from the universal prevalence of corruption and sin, that we did originally fall, as it is, from daily experience, that we do continually fall, in what light from the beginning must we have stood before our Maker? In that, no doubt, of offending children. As offenders, Divine justice must have looked on us with an eye of infinite indignation, and resolved to punish us proportionally to our guilt. But, on the other hand, as children, the Divine goodness must have beheld us with equal tenderness and pity, and resolved to show us mercy.

As we were led into sin by our first parent, as we became corrupt and guilty in the sight of God through the disobedience of a representative, it seems reasonable, that a representative, if such there may be, should atone for our guilt, and, by suffering, remove our punishment. Nay, it is as reasonable that we should become righteous by imputed goodness, as guilty by imputed sin. As to our own actual sins, we having been betrayed into them by a corruption of our nature, derived from the original seduction, merely in consequence of God's own appointment, who sent us into being through a natural entail of that corruption; it appears most highly agreeable not only to the goodness, but to the very justice of God, that if a representative may take away the guilt of original, he may remove that of actual, sin also, provided it is truly repented of. In order that sin may be truly repented of, and all men become fit objects of the Divine mercy, by a thorough reformation, it further appears to be reasonable, that the new representative should not only suffer the punishment due to our sins, which is death, but should likewise undertake to create us anew, and instead of sinful creatures, as we are by nature, to make us holy and good in the sight of God.

To fill up these characters of a Creator and Redeemer, and to effect the high, and otherwise impossible purposes of both, the Son of God, the second person in the blessed Trinity, interposes; and, that he may, 'by the word of his power,' speak us into a new life, and suffer the punishment due to our sins, 'becomes flesh, makes his tabernacle among men, is delivered up to death for our offences, rises again for our justification,' and, placing himself at the right hand of his Father, urges the merits of his all-sufficient sacrifice for every one who believes in him, and effectually hears his call to repentance.

On this subject Dr. Barrow observes as follows: 'In correspondence to all the exigencies of the case [that God and man both might act their parts in saving us] the blessed eternal Word, the only Son of God, by the good-will of his Father, did vouchsafe to intercede for us, and to undertake our redemption; in order thereto voluntarily being sent down from heaven, assuming human flesh, subjecting himself to all the infirmities of our frail nature, and to the worst inconveniences of our low condition; therein meriting God's favour to us, by a perfect obedience to the law, and satisfying God's justice by a most patient endurance of pains in our behalf; in completion of all, willingly laying down his life for the ransom of our souls, and pouring forth his blood in sacrifice for our sins.'

Jesus Christ, then, by dying for us, hath made peace between God and us; hath procured us admittance into his family and service; hath, both by precept and example, by his sabbaths, his sacraments, his ministers, taught us how to serve him; hath, by his grace, enabled us to perform whatsoever in that service is above our natural strength; hath, by an assurance of eternal rewards and punishments, brought over desire and fear, our strongest springs of action, to assist in the struggles of virtue against temptation. In the agony of that death, by which sin and the old creature are destroyed, he cries out, 'It is finished!' the great work of rooting out evil, and subduing its author, is finished: and immediately on his rising from the dead, he cries, 'Behold! I make all things new.' No sooner is the moral world made over again, than 'a new heaven and a new earth,' are fitted to it. Man is a new creature, and consequently all other things, that were made for him, are become new to him. These things that lately tempted him to sin, now no less powerfully prompt him to gratitude, to love, to goodness, and to a new life. Clapham's Sermons, vol. i. pp. 475—478; Dr. Barrow's Works, vol. i. p. 467, edit. 1683.

RED HEIFER. See HEIFER.

REFORMATION, that great change in the corrupted system of Christianity, begun by Luther in the year 1517. To overturn a system of religious belief, founded on ancient and deep-rooted prejudices, supported by power, and defended with no less art than industry; to establish in its room doctrines of the most contrary genius and tendency; and to accomplish all this, not by external violence or the force of arms; are operations which historians, the least prone to credulity and superstition, ascribe to that Divine Providence which, with infinite ease, can bring about events which to human sagacity appear impossible. The interposition of Heaven, in favour of the Christian religion at its first publication, was manifested by miracles and prophecies wrought and uttered in confirmation of it. Though none of the reformers possessed, or pretended to possess, these supernatural gifts, yet that wonderful preparation of circumstances which disposed the minds of men for receiving their doctrines, that singular combination of causes which secured their success, and enabled men, destitute of power and of policy, to triumph over those who employed against them extraordinary efforts of both, may be considered as no slight proof, that the same hand which planted the Christian religion, protected the reformed faith, and reared it, from beginnings extremely feeble, to an amazing degree of vigour and maturity. It was from causes seemingly fortuitous, and from a source very inconsiderable, that all the mighty effects of the reformation flowed. Leo X., when raised to the papal throne, found the revenues of the church exhausted by the vast projects of his two ambitious predecessors, Alexander VI. and Julius II. His own temper, naturally liberal and enterprising, rendered him incapable of that severe and patient economy which the situation of his finances required. On the contrary, his schemes for aggrandizing the family of Medici, his love of splendour, his taste for pleasure, and his magnificence in rewarding men of genius, involved him daily in new expenses; in order to provide a fund for which, he tried every device that the fertile invention of priests had fallen upon to drain the credulous multitude of their wealth. Among others he had recourse to a sale of indulgences.

The right of promulgating these indulgences in Germany, together with a share in the profits arising from the sale of them, was granted to Albert, elector of Mentz and archbishop of Magdeburg, who, as his chief agent for retailing them in Saxony, employed Tetzel, a Dominican friar of licentious morals, but of an active spirit, and remarkable for his noisy and popular eloquence. He, assisted by the monks of his order, executed the commission with great zeal and success, but with little discretion or decency; and though by magnifying excessively the benefit of their indulgences, and by disposing of them at a very low price, they carried on for some time an extensive and lucrative traffic among the credulous and the ignorant; the extravagance of their assertions, as well as the irregularities in their conduct, came at last to give general offence. Whilst Luther was at the height of his reputation and authority, Tetzel began to publish indulgences in the neighbourhood of Wittenberg, and to ascribe to them the same imaginary virtues which had, in other places, imposed on the credulity of the people. As Saxony was not more enlightened than the other provinces of Germany, Tetzel met with prodigious success there. It was with the utmost concern that Luther beheld the artifices of those who sold, and the simplicity of those who bought indulgences. The opinions of Thomas Aquinas and the other schoolmen, on which the doctrine of indulgences was founded, had already lost much of their authority with him; and the Scriptures, which he began to consider as the great standard of theological truth, afforded no countenance to a practice, equally subversive of faith and of morals. His warm and impetuous temper did not suffer him long to conceal such important discoveries, or to continue a silent spectator of the delusion of his countrymen. From the pulpit, in the great church at Wittenberg, he inveighed bitterly against the irregularities and vices of the monks who published indulgences; he ventured to examine the doctrines which they taught, and pointed out to the people the danger of relying for salvation upon any other means than those appointed by God in his word. The boldness and novelty of these opinions drew great attention; and being recommended by the authority of Luther's personal character, and delivered with a popular and persuasive eloquence, they made a deep impression on his hearers. Encouraged by the favourable reception of his doctrines among the people, he wrote to Albert, elector of Mentz and archbishop of Magdeburg, to whose jurisdiction that part of Saxony was subject, and remonstrated warmly against the false opinions, as well as wicked lives, of the preachers of indulgences; but he found that prelate too deeply interested in their success to correct their abuses. His next attempt was to gain the suffrage of men of learning. For this purpose he published ninety-five theses, containing his sentiments with regard to indulgences. These he proposed, not as points fully established, or of undoubted certainty, but as subjects of inquiry and disputation; he appointed a day, on which the learned were invited to impugn them, either in person or by writing; to the whole he subjoined solemn protestations of his high respect for the apostolic see, and of his implicit submission to its authority. No opponent appeared at the time prefixed; the theses spread over Germany with astonishing rapidity; they were read with the greatest eagerness; and all admired the boldness of the man, who had ventured not only to call in question the plenitude of papal power, but to attack the Dominicans, armed with all the terrors of inquisitorial authority.

The friars of St. Augustin, Luther's own order, gave no check to the publication of these uncommon opinions. Luther had, by his piety and learning, acquired extraordinary authority among his brethren; he professed the highest regard for the authority of the pope; his professions were at that time sincere; and as a secret enmity subsists among all the monastic orders of the Romish church, the Augustins were highly pleased with his invectives against the Dominicans, and hoped to see them exposed to the hatred and scorn of the people. His sovereign, the elector of Saxony, the wisest prince at that time in Germany, secretly encouraged his attempts, and flattered himself that this dispute among the ecclesiastics themselves might give some check to the exactions of the court of Rome, which the secular princes had long, though without success, been endeavouring to oppose. Several theses appeared in opposition to the ninety-five published by Luther; and the arguments produced for his confutation were the sentiments of schoolmen, the conclusions of the canon law, and the decrees of popes. The decision of judges so partial and interested did not satisfy the people, who began to call in question the authority even of these venerable guides, when they found them standing in direct opposition to the dictates of reason, and the determinations of the divine law.

In the mean time, these novelties in Luther's doctrines, which interested all Germany, excited little attention and no alarm in the court of Rome. Leo, fond of elegant and refined pleasures, intent upon great schemes of policy, a stranger to theological controversies, and apt to despise them, regarded with the utmost indifference the operations of an obscure friar, who, in the heart of Germany, carried on a scholastic disputation in a barbarous style. He imputed the whole to monastic enmity and emulation, and seemed inclined not to interpose in the contest, but to allow the Augustins and Dominicans to wrangle about the matter with their usual animosity.

The solicitations, however, of Luther's adversaries, together with the surprising progress which his opinions made in different parts of Germany, roused at last the attention of the court of Rome, and obliged Leo to take measures for the security of the church against an attack that now appeared too serious to be despised. For this end he summoned Luther to appear at Rome, within sixty days, before the auditor of the chamber, and the inquisitor-general, Prierias, who had written against him, whom he empowered jointly to examine his doctrines, and to decide concerning them. He wrote, at the same time, to the elector of Saxony, beseeching him not to protect a man whose heretical and profane tenets were so shocking to pious ears; and enjoined the provincial of the Augustins to check, by his authority, the rashness of an arrogant monk, which brought disgrace upon the order of St. Augustin, and gave offence and disturbance to the whole church. The professors in the university of Wittemberg, anxious for Luther's safety, wrote to the pope, and, after employing several pretexts to excuse Luther from appearing at Rome, intreated Leo to commit the examination of his doctrines to some persons of learning and authority in Germany. The elector requested the same thing of the pope's legate at the diet of Augsburg; and as Luther himself, who at that time did not even entertain the smallest suspicion concerning the divine origin of papal authority, had written to Leo a submissive letter, promising an unreserved compliance with his will, the pope gratified them so far as to empower his legate in Germany, cardinal Cajetan, a Dominican, eminent for scholastic learning, and passionately devoted to the Roman see, to hear and determine the cause.

Luther, having obtained the emperor's safe conduct, immediately repaired to Augsburg. The cardinal required him, by virtue of the apostolic powers with which he was clothed, to retract his errors with regard to indulgences and the nature of faith, and to abstain for the future from the publication of new and dangerous opinions. Luther, fully persuaded of the truth of his own tenets, and confirmed in the belief of them by the approbation which they had met with among persons conspicuous both for learning and piety, was surprised at this abrupt mention of a recantation, before any endeavours were used to convince him that he was mistaken. He declared, with the utmost firmness, that he could not, with a safe conscience, renounce opinions which he believed to be true; nor should any consideration ever induce him to do what would be so base in itself, and so offensive to God. At the same time, he continued to express no less reverence than formerly for the authority of the apostolic see; he signified his willingness to submit the whole controversy to certain universities which he named, and promised neither to write nor preach concerning indulgences for the future, provided his adversaries were likewise enjoined to be silent with respect to them. All these offers Cajetan disregarded or rejected, and still insisted, peremptorily, on a simple recantation; threatening him with ecclesiastical censures, and forbidding him to appear again in his presence, unless he resolved instantly to comply with what he had required. This haughty and violent proceeding, as well as other circumstances, gave Luther's friends such strong reasons to suspect that even the imperial safe conduct would not be able to protect him from the legate's power and resentment, that they prevailed on him to withdraw secretly from Augsburg, and to return to his own country. But before his departure he prepared a solemn appeal from the legate, ill-informed at that time concerning his cause, to the pope, who indeed ought not to have committed a cause of this importance to an inferior agent.

The judges before whom Luther had been required to appear at Rome, without waiting for the expiration of the sixty days allowed him in the citation, had already condemned him as an heretic. Leo had, in several of his briefs and letters, stigmatized him as a child of iniquity, and a man given up to a reprobate sense. As every step which was taken by the court of Rome convinced Luther that Leo would soon proceed to the most violent measures against him, he had recourse to the only expedient in his power, in order to prevent the effect of the papal censures. He appealed to a general council, which he affirmed to be the representative of the catholic church, and superior in power to the pope, who, being a fallible man, might err, as St. Peter, the most perfect of his predecessors, had erred.

It soon appeared that Luther had not formed rash conjectures concerning the intentions of the Church of Rome. A bull, of a date prior to his appeal, was issued by the pope, in which he magnified the virtue and efficacy of indulgences; he required all Christians to assent to what he delivered as the doctrine of the Catholic church, and subjected those, who should hold or teach any contrary opinion, to the heaviest ecclesiastical censures. Among Luther's followers, this bull, which they considered as an unjustifiable effort of the pope in order to preserve that rich branch of his revenue which arose from indulgences, produced little effect. But among the rest of his countrymen, such a clear decision of the sovereign pontiff against him, and enforced by such dreadful penalties, must have been attended with consequences very fatal to his cause, if these had not been prevented, in a great measure, by the death of the emperor Maximilian, whom both his principles and his interest prompted to support the authority of the holy see. To this event was owing the suspension of any further proceedings against Luther for eighteen months. Perpetual negotiations, however, in order to bring the matter to some amicable issue, were carried on during that space. The manner in which these were conducted having given Luther many opportunities of observing the corruption of the court of Rome, he began to utter some doubts with regard to the divine original of the papal authority. A public disputation was held upon this important question at Leipsic, between Luther and Eccius, one of his most learned and formidable antagonists; but it was as fruitless and indecisive as such scholastic combats usually prove.

Nor did this spirit of opposition to the doctrines and usurpations of the Romish Church break out in Saxony alone; an attack no less violent, and occasioned by the same causes, was made upon them about this time in Switzerland. The Franciscans, being entrusted with the promulgation of indulgences in that country, executed their commission with the same indiscretion and rapaciousness, which had rendered the Dominicans so odious in Germany. They proceeded, nevertheless, with uninterrupted success till they arrived at Zurich. There Zuinglius, a man not inferior to Luther in zeal and intrepidity, ventured to oppose them; and, being animated with a republican boldness, he advanced with more daring and rapid steps to overturn the whole fabric of the established religion. The appearance of such a vigorous auxiliary, and the progress which he made, was at first matter of great joy to Luther. On the other hand, the decrees of the universities of Cologne and Louvain, which pronounced his opinions to be erroneous, afforded great cause of triumph to his adversaries.

But the undaunted spirit of Luther acquired additional fortitude from every instance of opposition; and he began to shake the firmest foundations on which the wealth or power of the church was established. At last, on the 15th of June 1520, the bull, so fatal to the church of Rome, was issued. Forty-one propositions, extracted out of Luther's works, are therein condemned as heretical, scandalous, and offensive to pious ears; all persons are forbidden to read his writings, upon pain of excommunication; such as had any of them in their custody, are commanded to commit them to the flames; he himself, if he did not, within sixty days, publicly recant his errors, and burn his books, is pronounced an obstinate heretic; is excommunicated, and delivered unto Satan for the destruction of his flesh; and all secular princes are required, under pain of incurring the same censure, to seize his person, that he might be punished as his crimes deserved.

This sentence, which he had for some time expected, did not disconcert or intimidate Luther. After renewing his appeal to the general council, he published remarks upon the bull of excommunication; and being now persuaded that Leo had been guilty both of impiety and injustice in his proceedings against him, he boldly declared the pope to be that man of sin, or antichrist, whose appearance is foretold in the New Testament; he declaimed against his tyranny and usurpations with greater violence than ever; he exhorted all Christian princes to shake off such an ignominious yoke; and boasted of his own happiness in being marked out as the object of ecclesiastical indignation, because he had ventured to assert the liberty of mankind.

In the following year, he was requested to appear before his avowed enemy, the emperor Charles V., in the diet at Worms, when, unmoved by the apprehensions of his friends, who reminded him of the fate of Huss, he instantly obeyed, and there acknowledged that his writings had occasionally been violent and acrimonious; but he refused to retract his opinions, until they should be proved erroneous by the Scriptures. An edict, pronouncing him an excommunicated criminal, and commanding the seizure of his person as soon as the duration of the safe conduct which he had obtained should have expired, was immediately promulgated. Frederic the Wise, elector of Saxony, who had all along countenanced him without professing his doctrines, now withdrew him from the storm. As Luther was returning from Worms, a troop of horsemen in masks, rushed from a wood, seized him, and conveyed him to the castle of Wartenberg, where he was concealed nine months, encouraging his adherents by his pen, and cheered in return by accounts of the rapid diffusion of his doctrines. John, the successor of Frederic, took a decisive step, and established the reformed religion in 1527 throughout his dominions.

In a diet at Spire, held about the same time, the execution of the edict of Worms against the Lutherans, now too formidable to be oppressed with impunity, was suspended until the convocation of a general council, to remedy the disorders of the Church. But in another diet held at the same place, in 1529, the suspension was revoked by a decree obtained through the influence of Charles; who then found himself at more leisure to push forward his views against the supporters of the Reformation. Against this new decree six princes, and the deputies of thirteen imperial cities and towns, solemnly protested; and from this the appellation of Protestants became common to all who embraced the reformed religion. At the diet of Augsburg, in Suabia, the following year, a clear statement of the reformed faith, drawn up by Luther and Melancthon, was presented to Charles and the diet, on behalf of the Protestant members of the empire; and hence it obtained the name of 'the Confession of Augsburg.' This Confession was received as the standard of the Protestant faith in Germany.

The same or next year, the Protestant princes made the famous league of Smalkalde, for the mutual defence of their religion, which obliged the emperor to grant the Protestant Lutherans a toleration, till the differences in religion should be settled in a council, which he engaged himself to call in six months. The Protestant party gaining strength every day, instead of being viewed only as a religious sect, as hitherto, soon became to be considered as a political body of no small consequence; and having refused the bull for convening a council at Mantua, Charles summoned a general diet at Ratisbon, where a scheme of religion, for reconciling the two parties, was examined and proposed, but without effect. At length in 1545, the famous Council of Trent was opened for accommodating the differences in religion; but the Protestants refused to attend or obey a council convoked in the name, and by the authority of the pope, and governed by his legates.

The following year Luther died, but the work of Reformation which he had begun did not die with him; for though Charles, having concluded a treaty with the pope for the destruction of the reformed religion and its adherents, assembled troops on all sides, and was at first successful in the field, yet on the appearance of Maurice, elector of Saxony, in arms against him, with a force which he was wholly unprepared to resist, he was checked in his career, and the consequences were, the 'Religious Peace,' concluded at Passau, in Bavaria, in 1552, and the complete security of religious freedom to the Protestant States in Germany, which they have enjoyed ever since.

During the course of these events, the reformed opinions were extending their influence in various other countries. Before this time they were completely adopted in Sweden, and had likewise obtained perfect toleration in Denmark, where they were adopted soon after as the doctrines of the national church. They were also daily gaining converts in other kingdoms of Europe. They acquired many friends even in Italy. They privately diffused themselves in Spain, notwithstanding the crowded dungeons and busy flames of the Inquisition. In France, they had still more ample success, where their abettors have long been contemptuously termed Huguenots. This appellation was given to the Protestants in France in 1560, and is supposed by some to be derived from a gate in Tours, called Hugon, where they first assembled. According to others, the name is taken from the first words of their original protest, or confession of faith, Huc nos venimus, &c. At Geneva they were firmly established by Calvin; but their principal triumph was in Great Britain, where the papal power and jurisdiction were abolished by Parliament, the king was declared supreme head of the church, and all the authority of which the popes were deprived was vested in him. - In England that vast fabric of ecclesiastical dominion, which had been raised with such art, and of which the foundations seemed to have been laid so deep, being no longer supported by the veneration of the people, was overturned in a moment. In the reign of Edward VI. a total separation was made from the Church of Rome in articles of doctrine, as well as in matters of discipline and jurisdiction.

The Roman Catholics themselves are ready to admit, that the papal doctrines and authority would soon have fallen into ruin in all parts of the world, in consequence of the opposition made to them by Luther and his adherents, had not the force of the secular arm, and the fire of the Inquisition, been employed to support the tottering edifice. In the Netherlands, particularly, the most grievous persecutions took place; so that, by the emperor Charles V., upwards of 100,000 were destroyed, whilst still greater cruelties were exercised upon the people there, by his son Philip II. The formidable ministers of the Inquisition put so many to death, and perpetrated such horrible acts of cruelty and oppression in Italy, &c. that most of the reformed consulted their safety by a voluntary exile, while others returned to the religion of Rome, at least in external appearance. In France, too, the Huguenots were persecuted with unparalleled fury; and though many princes of the blood, and of the first nobility, had embraced their sentiments, yet in no part of the world did the reformers suffer more. See PROTESTANT and LUTHERANISM. Robertson's History of Charles V., vol. ii. pp. 90, &c.; vol. iii. p. 60; Adam's Religious World Displayed, vol. ii. pp. 83, 84, &c.; 325, &c.

REFUGE, CITIES OF. To provide security for those who, undesignedly, should happen to kill a man, in whatever manner, the Lord commanded Moses to appoint six cities of refuge, or asylas, that whoever, against his will, should have spilt blood, might retire thither, and have time to prepare his defence before the judges; so that the kinsman of the deceased might not pursue him thither and kill him. (Exod. xx. 13. Numb. xxxv. 11, 12, 13. &c.) Of these cities there were three on each side Jordan. On this side Jordan were Kedesh of Naphtali, Hebron, and Shechem; beyond Jordan were Bezer, Golan, and Ramoth-Gilead. (Josh. xx. 7, 8.) They served not only for Hebrews, but for all strangers who might dwell in their country. The Rabbins confine the name strangers to proselytes; but in this, Calmet thinks they depart from the design of the law. (Deut. xix. 1—8.) The Lord also commanded, that when the Hebrews should multiply, and enlarge their country, they should add three other cities of refuge. As this command was never fulfilled, the Rabbins say, that the Messiah will accomplish it.

These cities were to be of easy access; to have good roads leading to them, and bridges wherever there was occasion. The width of these roads was to be, at least, thirty-two cubits, or forty-eight feet. At cross-roads, they set up posts, with inscriptions, directing the way to the city of refuge. Every year, on the fifteenth of Adar (February), the magistrates of the cities inspected the roads, to see that they were in good condition. The city was to be well supplied with water and provisions. It was not allowed to make any weapons there, that the relations of the deceased might not procure arms to gratify their revenge. Lastly; it was necessary that whoever took refuge there, should understand a trade or calling, that he might not be chargeable. They used to send some prudent and moderate persons, to meet those who were pursuing their revenge for their relations, in order to dispose them to clemency and forgiveness, and to await the decision of justice.

Though the manslayer had fled to the city of refuge, yet he was not therefore exempt from the pursuit of justice, (Numb. xxxv. 12.); an information was lodged against him; he was summoned before the judges and the people, to prove that the murder was truly casual and involuntary. If found innocent, he dwelt safely in the city to which he had retired; if otherwise, he was put to death, according to the law. The Scripture is not very express, whether the affair was under the cognizance of the judges of the place where the murder was committed, or of the judges of the city of refuge to which the murderer had fled; and commentators are at variance on this matter. (Deut. xix. 11, 12. Josh. xx. 4, 5, 6. Numb. xxxv. 25.) But it appears to us, from the passage of Joshua, that the fugitive underwent two trials: first in the city of refuge, where the judges summarily examined the affair; secondly, in his own city, where the magistrates examined the cause more strictly. If the latter judges declared him innocent, they recondacted him under a good guard to the city of refuge.

To inspire the greater horror, even of involuntary bloodshed, the law punished it by a kind of banishment: for the manslayer was obliged to dwell in this city, without going out of it, till the death of the high priest: but after the high priest's death, he was free to go safely where he pleased.

'The institution of the cities of refuge not only gave opportunity to the aggressor to escape, and to the avenger to cool; but took from either the determination of the case, and, after a proper hearing, adjudged the slayer to security, yet to confinement, till the high priest died: at which period, not only might the offence be in part forgot, but be regularly and honourably passed over: especially among the general mourning on that event, and the general interest of the nation in it. We see the spirit of revenge inquiet both parties: but on such a solemn occasion, both parties might honourably forego their animosity, without any 'fear of fighting, or any disturbance of sleep;' so that this appointment was of, perhaps, equal advantage to both culprit and avenger.' Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary of the Holy Bible, No. X. p. 24.

REGENERATION, a new birth. 'Regeneration, or the new birth,' says a late divine, 'consists of two parts; an outward baptism, which includes a profession of Christ's religion, and an inward sanctification, or holiness of heart and life. This is expressly told us by our Saviour and St. Paul. The former said to Nicodemus, that "except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God;" and in the next words, our Saviour explains what he means by this new birth; "except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." So that to a man's being born again, there must be the baptism of water, and the renewing of the Spirit. To the same purpose speaks St. Paul: "God, according to his mercies hath saved us, not by works of righteousness, which we have done, but by the washing of regeneration, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost." The washing of regeneration is the outward part; the renewing of the Holy Ghost, the inward. Well, therefore, might our church teach in her offices, that infants are regenerated by baptism, since both Scripture and antiquity speak the same. The truth is, this term of regeneration or the new birth, cannot be properly understood without having respect to baptism.

'Our Saviour seems to take this expression from the Jews, by whom it denoted a man's becoming a proselyte to their religion, and being admitted to it by baptism; which was the way of receiving proselytes into the Church, with the addition of circumcision to some. Whoever was thus admitted into the Jewish Church, was said to be new-born, or regenerate; and they esteemed a proselyte to be so really new-born, that they considered him ever after as a stranger to all his natural relations. When our Saviour says, 'except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of heaven,' he means to express the absolute necessity incumbent on every one, whether Jew or Gentile, to become a proselyte, a disciple of his doctrine, if he wishes to obtain the happiness of heaven. Indeed, our Saviour's idea of regeneration was more extensive than that of the Jews, who thought an outward baptism, or profession, sufficient to entitle a man to the name of new-born. But our Saviour requires that a man be born of the Spirit, as well as of water, in order to his entering the kingdom of heaven; that is, besides an outward baptism and profession, an inward principle of virtue and holiness must be wrought in the person by the Spirit of God. Yet both these may be united; for whoever hath the outward regeneration of baptism, may have also the inward regeneration of the Spirit, if he be not false to God and to himself.'

When our Saviour says, that 'except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God,' we are to understand in this place, with the liturgy, articles, and the ablest divines of the Church of England, that by water is meant water-baptism, and not merely, with some persons, symbolical purification in general, for the following reasons:—1. Our Lord here states the necessity of a higher baptism than that of John, with which Nicodemus must have been acquainted, and the insufficiency of which, as ministering only to repentance, John himself acknowledged; whereas, the ensuing baptism of Christ was to be more efficacious, as being the baptism of the Holy Spirit unto regeneration. 2. This is confirmed by the analogy between our Lord's doctrine in this place, and in his last commission to his Apostles; in which they were expressly required to baptize all nations with water, in the name of the Holy Trinity, to entitle them to initiation into the kingdom of heaven, or to the privileges of the Christian covenant, of which this peculiar mode of baptism was to be the instrument, or stipulated condition on God's part, of granting salvation, as faith is required on our part, as the indispensable condition of receiving it. 3. If we look to the practice of the Apostles as the best explanation of this precept, we shall find that all the converts who professed their faith or belief in the efficacy of Christ's atonement for the sins of mankind, were invariably baptized in token of their conversion. 4. The universality of the practice satisfactorily explains also the meaning of the indefinite term rig 'any one,' in our Lord's answer, by showing that it must be understood universally, as equivalent to πᾶς, 'every one,' corresponding with his last commission to the Apostles to publish the Gospel to all the creation :—'He that believeth, and is baptized, shall be saved; but he that believeth not, shall be damned:' for the word 'he,' in this place signifies 'whosoever,' or 'every one.'

Though baptism is here considered as a necessary condition of salvation, in addition to belief, yet, it is remarkable, that damnation is threatened only to disbelief, or obstinate unbelief, without including the omission of baptism. This, Waterland remarks, may perhaps be a reserved case, in which God may dispense with the general rule of baptism, in favour of such as may not have the means or opportunity of receiving this rite; as in the penitent malefactor on the cross, or in sudden emergencies. At the same time, since the Christian covenant holds forth no engagement to save mankind, or make them heirs of eternal life, without the performance of this rite, baptism must be considered as the ordinary standing instrument, or conveyance of Gospel salvation on God's part; and, therefore, no person who neglects or despises it can properly be entitled to those privileges. Hence, our church rightly considers the baptized, whether infants or adults, immediately after the ceremony is performed, as 'regenerate and grafted into the body of Christ's Church.'

It was the opinion of several early fathers of the church, Irenæus, Tertullian, Cyril, Nazianzen, &c. that the water applied in baptism secured or sealed, at it were, the body to a happy resurrection; whilst the Spirit more immediately sealed the soul: and thus the whole man was understood to be cleansed, sanctified, and accepted by God in baptism. The rite of baptism once administered, is effectual unto regeneration, on God's part, and need not be repeated. As there is but one Lord, and one faith, so there is but one baptism once performed, (Ephes. iv. 5.); for as the natural birth happens only once, so does the spiritual. The grant of regeneration subsists in force after baptism, though its efficacy depends on performing the conditions of the covenant then made, namely, repentance, faith, and obedience; for the privileges may be vacated, or forfeited, unless we walk in newness of life. Lapsed converts in Scripture, such as Simon Magus, (Acts viii. 22.) the revolting churches of Asia Minor, (Rev. ii. 5—16.; iii. 3—19.) the wicked prophetess Jezebel, (Rev. ii. 20, 21, &c.) are no where exhorted to be born anew or regenerated, after they had been once baptized; but frequently to repent, to be converted, to be renewed in the spirit of their mind, or transformed by the renewing of their mind, (Acts iii. 19. Ephes. iv. 23. Rom. xii. 2.) upon which they may be reinstated in their former privileges.

Regeneration and sanctification are only different expressions of the same thing. Regeneration is a metaphor used in Scripture to express our translation and change from one state to another, from a state of sin and wickedness to that of grace and holiness; and sanctification is our being made holy, purified, and cleansed from sin and impurity. Hence regeneration and sanctification are attributed to the same causes, the Spirit and word of God; we are said to be born of the Spirit, to be sanctified of the Holy Ghost, to be begotten, and to be sanctified by the word of truth, that is, the word of God. So that the Scriptures speak of them as the same thing; which they really are: for if sanctification be the making of us holy, as well as regeneration, then they are both the same. Another mistake is, that in regeneration and conversion, some think all the habits of grace are infused together, and at once; that is, for men who were vicious before in several kinds, to be in an instant, by an omnipotent act of God's grace, and by a new principle infused into them, endued with the habits of the contrary graces and virtues; and to be as chaste, temperate, just, meek, and humble, as if they became so by the frequent practice of these virtues. I do not deny that this may sometimes be the case; for some men, by an extraordinary power of God's grace, are suddenly changed, and strangely reclaimed from a wicked and vicious, to a religious and virtuous life. This may in some sense be called the infusion of the habits of grace and virtue together at once; but even in such I doubt not but that the habits of several graces and virtues are afterwards attained by the frequent practice of them. This was common and visible in many of the first converts to Christianity, especially of those who were reclaimed from the abominable idolatry and impiety of heathenism. The Spirit of God did then work miraculously in the cures of both spiritual and bodily diseases. But to make this the rule and standard of God's ordinary proceedings in the conversion and regeneration of men, is equally as unreasonable, as still to expect miracles for the cure of diseases.

If a man be baptized, and sincerely endeavour to lead a good life; if his faith in Jesus Christ be so strong as by it to overcome the world, and the evil customs of the world; if he so conform himself to the laws of our Saviour, as not to live in any wilful transgression of them, but, in the general course of his life, walks honestly and piously, and keeps a good conscience towards God and man; such a person, however he came into this state, and with whatever infirmities it may be attended, provided that he prays and strives against them, is a good man, and gives a true evidence of his regeneration, though he may not have all the marks and qualifications that may be required by some ; such a man, if he persevere in this religious course, will, without doubt, at last be justified before God, and find an admission into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. REHOB'AM, רִהְבֹּם, signifies who sets the people at liberty ; otherwise, space of the people ; otherwise, that lets the people breathe or blow. Rehoboam was son and successor of Solomon ; and his mother was Naamah, an Ammonitess. (1 Kings xiv. 20, 21.) He was forty-one years old when he began to reign ; and, consequently, he was born in the first year of his father's reign. It seems, indeed, to be customary in the East, for the eldest son, born after the father's accession to the throne, to succeed him as king. Rehoboam began to reign in the year of the world 3029. His father Solomon was eighteen, or nineteen, years old when Rehoboam was born. This prince reigned seventeen years at Jerusalem, and died in the year of the world 3046.

After the death of Solomon, Rehoboam came to Shechem, where all Israel was assembled. Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who had headed a sedition against Solomon, and had been forced to take refuge in Egypt, when he heard of Solomon's death, returned into Judea, and was at the assembly of the people at Shechem. The Israelites would have made terms with Rehoboam, and said to him, Diminish the weight of your father's yoke, and we will serve you, as we have served your father. This proposal makes it plain, that the succession to the kingdom was not then fully established in the house of David. Rehoboam postponed his answer for three days. In the mean time, he advised with the ancient counsellors of his father's council, who represented to him, that, by an obliging answer, he would fix the people in his interest for ever. But Rehoboam chose rather to follow the advice of his young counsellors, and answered the people roughly ; which he had soon reason to repent of ; for the multitude began to cry out, What part have we in David ? What interest have we in the son of David ? To your tents, O Israel ; David look to your own house. The tribes of Judah and Benjamin continued faithful to king Rehoboam ; but the other ten tribes acknowledged Jeroboam, the son of Nebat. Hence originated the kingdom of Israel.

Rehoboam, being come to Jerusalem, assembled the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, to the number of 180,000 men, to reduce the revolted ten tribes. But the prophet Shemaiah forbade the expedition. Then Rehoboam, continuing at Jerusalem, began to apply himself to the strengthening of his kingdom against Jeroboam. He fortified and stored, &c. several cities ; as Bethlehem, Etam, Tekoa, Beth-zur, Shoco, Adullam, Gath, Mareshah, Ziph, Adoraim, Lachish, Azekah, Zorah, Aijalon, Hebron.

The number of his subjects was considerably increased by the priests and Levites, from the cities and territories of Jeroboam, who, seeing that king had abolished the established worship of the Lord, and made priests for his golden calves, withdrew into the land of Judah and Benjamin, that they might attend their functions in the temple at Jerusalem. But Rehoboam and his people did not continue faithful to the Lord above three years. After this short space of time, Judah also did evil before the Lord, and provoked him by their wickedness, more than their fathers had done ; and, in short, they committed all the wickedness and abominations that had been committed by the Canaanites, whom the Lord had driven out.

Rehoboam married eighteen wives, and had sixty concubines ; by these he had twenty-eight sons, and sixty daughters. In the fifth year of Rehoboam, God sent against Judah, Shishak, (or Sesac) king of Egypt, who took away all the treasure of the house of the Lord, the king's treasures, the golden bucklers made by king Solomon, and laid waste the whole country. (2 Chron. xii. 1, 2, 3, &c. 1 Kings xiv. 25.) The prophet Shemaiah went to attend Rehoboam, and the princes of Judah that were with him at Jerusalem, and said to them from the Lord ; You have forsaken me, and I, in my turn, have forsaken you, and have delivered you into the hands of Shishak. The princes, being convinced of these reproaches, humbled themselves ; and God said to Shemaiah, that he would not utterly abandon them, but only make them sensible of the difference between serving the Lord, and being subject to a foreign power.

After the departure of Shishak, Rehoboam caused brazen bucklers to be made, in the room of those of gold, which the king of Egypt had taken away ; and when he went to the temple, his guards carried these brazen bucklers before him. The history of Rehoboam had been written at length by the prophets Shemaiah and Iddo ; but these accounts are not come to our hands ; nor any particulars of those constant wars which were between Rehoboam and Jeroboam. Rehoboam died after a reign of seventeen years, was buried in the city of David, and left his son Abijah, his successor.

RELICS, in the Roman Church, the remains of the bodies or clothes of saints or martyrs, and the instruments by which they were put to death, were devoutly preserved, in honour to their memory ; kissed, revered, and carried in procession. In the early ages of the Gospel, when its professors were exposed to every species of danger and persecution, it was natural for Christians to show every mark of respect both to the bodies, and to the memory, of those who had suffered death in its cause. They collected their remains, and buried them, not only with decency, but with all the solemnity and honour which circumstances would allow. A remarkable fact of this kind is recorded by Eusebius, which is of itself sufficient to prove the practice of the second century; he tells us that the Christians of Smyrna were very careful to seek for and bury the bones and ashes of their illustrious bishop and martyr, the aged Polycarp, who had been put to death, and his body burnt by his implacable enemies. It was also the custom for Christians to hold their religious meetings at the places where their martyrs were buried, by which they seemed, as it were, united with them; and to display their attachment to their departed brethren by such rites as were dictated by the fervour of their devout affection, and were consistent with the principles of their religion. It does not appear that this boundary was ever transgressed in the first three centuries: but in the fourth century, when the pure and simple worship of the Gospel began to be debased by superstitious practices, we find strong proofs of an excessive love for every thing which had belonged to those who had distinguished themselves by their exertions or their sufferings for the truth of Christianity, and especially for any part of their garments, hair, or bones. Augustine in Africa, and Virgilantius in Spain, complained loudly of this culpable fondness for relics, which they speak of as a new corruption, then first appearing in the Christian world; but the warm disposition of Jerome led him to stand forward in their defence, with more zeal than discretion. However, this learned father, even while he leans to the opinion that miracles were sometimes wrought by relics, explicitly declaims all idea of offering them worship: but when superstition has once made its way into the minds of men, it gradually gains ground, and it is difficult to set limits to it, particularly when there is a set of persons respected for their piety, who are studious to encourage it.

Monks carried about relics; and with great ease, and no small advantage to themselves, persuaded that ignorant age of their value and importance. Under their recommendation and patronage, they were soon considered as the best preservatives against every possible evil of soul and body; and when the worshipping of images came to be established, the enshrining of relics was a natural consequence of that doctrine. This led the way to absolute worship, which was now preached by the Romish clergy as a Christian duty. Every one thought it necessary to possess a relic of some saint or martyr, as the effectual means of securing his care and protection; and fraud and imposition did not fail to furnish a supply proportionable to the demand. The discovery of the catacombs at Rome was an inexhaustible source of relics; and thus the popes themselves became directly interested in maintaining this superstitious worship. The Council of Trent authorized the adoration of relics; and they are still held in high estimation among the Roman Catholics.

It is, however, said, that the Roman Catholics show respect to the bodies or bones of the dead for the following reasons: '1. Because they have been the victims, and the living temples of God, in which his Divine Majesty has, in a particular manner, inhabited, and which he has sanctified by his presence and grace; and, therefore, if God required of Moses, (Exod. iii. 5.) and of Joshua, (Josh. v. 15.) to loose their shoes from off their feet, in respect to the ground on which they stood, as being rendered holy by his presence, or that of his angels, we must think that it is agreeable to his Divine Majesty, that we should testify the like honour to that venerable earth of the bodies of his saints, which he in such an extraordinary manner has sanctified, by abiding in them as in his temples. 2. We know the bodies of the saints are pre-ordained to a happy resurrection and eternal glory, and upon this account also deserve our respect. 3. The bodies and other relics of the saints have been, and are daily, the instruments of the power of God for the working of innumerable miracles, which God, who is truth and sanctity itself, would never have effected, if it had not been agreeable to him that we should honour and respect these precious remnants of his servants. 4. The relics and shrines of the martyrs and other saints serve very much to encourage the faithful to an imitation of their virtues, and to help to raise their souls from the love of things present and temporal, to the love of things eternal.

But, as Bishop Burnet observes, 'there was cause given in St. Austin's time to suspect that many of the bones which were carried about by monks, were none of their bones, but impostures, which very much shakes the credit of the miracles wrought by them, since we have no reason to think that God would support such impostures with miracles; as on the other hand, there is no reason to think that false relics would have passed upon the world, if miracles had been believed to accompany true ones, unless they had their miracles likewise to attest their value: so let this matter be turned which way it may, the credit both of relics, and of the miracles wrought by them, is not a little shaken by it. But in the following ages we have more than presumptions, that there was much of this false coin that went abroad in the world. It was not possible to distinguish the false from the true.' Burnet's Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles, p. 303; Nightingale's Portraiture of the Roman Catholic Religion, pp. 398, 399; Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. ii. pp. 358—361.

RELIEF KIRK. The members of the Relief Kirk are a species of Dissenters in Scotland, whose chief ground of dissent from the establishment is, the liberty and privilege which they maintain of choosing their own ministers.

It would appear that, since the act restoring patronage in the end of Queen Anne's reign, there have always been a number of ministers in the establishment who steadily opposed the rigorous exercise of patronage, or the settlements of ministers by presentations, where the concurrence of the generality of the parishioners could not be obtained. But the sect now under consideration, which took its rise from this opposition, had no separate existence until 1752, when Mr. Thomas Gillespie, minister of Carnock, in the presbytery of Dunfermline, was deposed by the General Assembly, for refusing to assist at the admission of Mr. Andrew Richardson, in the parish of Inverkeithing, the parishioners, in general, being unwilling to receive him as their pastor.

The Assembly of that year not only appointed Mr. Richardson's admission, in Inverkeithing, contrary to the wishes of the inhabitants, but also required every member of the presbytery to attend and witness the execution of the sentence, when Mr. Gillespie, and other five ministers, still declined countenancing that admission; in consequence of which, he, as the most obstinate offender, was deposed from the office of the ministry, and his kirk declared vacant.

The manner and despatch with which this affair was conducted is truly, as a minister, formerly of the Relief, but now in the establishment, has observed, 'very remarkable;' for, 'on Monday, the Assembly gave out this appointment; the day fixed for ordination was Thursday, at eleven o'clock; every member of the presbytery was summoned to appear at the Assembly's bar on Friday, and Mr. Gillespie, who disobeyed the appointment, but obeyed the summons, was deposed on Saturday, all in one week!'

When the presbytery appeared at the bar of the Assembly on the Friday, Mr. G. and his five brethren confessed that they had not obeyed the Assembly's appointment, and gave in an humble representation, signed by them, and Mr. Stark, of Torrieburn, as a vindication of their conduct, in which they stated their scruples, and observed, that settlements, where there was but a small concurrence of the parishioners, had already produced a train of the most unhappy consequences, greatly affecting the interests of religion; and, if turned into the stated and fixed rules of procedure, would, in all probability, be attended with very fatal effects. As an argument in their favour, they likewise remind the Assembly, that that body had themselves declared, in 1736, 'that it is, and has been ever since the Reformation, the principle of the Church, that no minister shall be intruded into any parish contrary to the will of the congregation; and, therefore, it is seriously recommended to all judicatories of this Church, to have a due regard to the said principle, in planting vacant congregations, so as none be intruded into such parishes, as they regard the glory of God, and the edification of the body of Christ.'

But this argument, instead of giving the desired satisfaction, 'highly displeased the Church,' and may be considered as having laid a foundation for the erection of the Relief Kirk, as a distinct and independent society. Though the other five transgressors were involved in the same offence with Mr. G., the Assembly, 'desirous to mix mercy and lenity with their judgment,' only suspended them from the exercise of their office in judicatories: but after the sentence of deposition was issued against him, he still claimed his pastoral relation to the people of Carnock; and, convinced that it was still his duty to preach the Gospel, he determined not to be silent. When cast out of his kirk, he went to the fields, and warmly spoke to the people, from these words of St. Paul, 'For necessity is laid upon me; yea, woe is unto me, if I preach not the Gospel.' (1 Cor. ix. 16.) His situation now rendered him more conspicuous and popular than before; and a chapel was soon built for him in Dunfermline, where he continued to preach to a congregation that was much attached to him, and to oppose the law of patronage in the Kirk. Nor was it long before he was joined by Mr. Thomas Boston, minister of Oxnam, who, being refused the presentation, when the town-council, kirk-session, and a great body of the people in Jedburgh, declared in his favour, on a vacancy in their kirk, gave in his demission to the presbytery of Jedburgh, and undertook the pastoral care of that people, in connexion with Mr. G.

Mr. Boston's cause was brought before the General Assembly, who declared him incapable of receiving a presentation, or even of preaching in a parish church; and all its members were prohibited from holding ministerial communion with him. Being thus excluded from the communion of the Kirk, these two gentlemen, and a Mr. Collier, originally from Fife, who had been for some time officiating among the dissenters in England, but was now recalled to take charge of a congregation at Colinsburgh, together with some ordained elders, constituted themselves into a presbytery at this last place, whose inhabitants were the first who formerly applied to them for relief, hence called 'The Presbytery of Relief;' being willing, say they, to afford relief from the rigorous execution of the act of patronage, to all 'who adhered to the constitution of the Church of Scotland, as exhibited in her creeds, canons, confessions, and forms of worship.'

Such is the account which is generally given of the origin and name of this sect of Dissenters from the establishment in Scotland. Others, however, pretend to say, that the chief ground of their separation was the Armenian tenets, and the moral, or, as they call it, the legal preaching of many of the established clergy, and that the foundation of the schism was laid by the late Dr. Witherspoon, before he set out from this country for America. He, we are told, 'collected together as many of the popular clergy who had poor livings as he could, and told them, that if they would leave their churches, without joining the Seceders, they would find a powerful assistance from many of the people. They would build them meetings, and their livings would be doubled.' Accordingly, many left the churches, and had some meetings built for them. It was some time before they could fix upon what name they should assume; and, therefore, as they were to give relief to those people who were plagued by the moral preachers, they took upon themselves the name of the Presbytery of Relief. However, this representation of the cause of their dissent, and final separation from the establishment, is said by a respectable minister of this denomination, to be incorrect, if not wholly groundless.

But whatever may have been the real grounds upon which they acted, and the true motives by which they were influenced, in constituting this denomination, that it has actually existed from the time here specified cannot be questioned; and notwithstanding the great numbers that have gone off from the establishment of late years to the New Independents, its members have all along been gradually increasing, inasmuch that they reckon in their communion upwards of 70 congregations, and about 40,000 members.

In regard to doctrines, worship, church-government, and discipline, the members of the Relief Kirk differ in little or nothing from the establishment. Their presbyteries require from every new member of their own body, as the terms of admission, a solemn and public profession of his faith in God, his belief of the Scriptures, his approbation of presbytery, 'according to reformation principles, and his adherence to the constitution of the Church of Scotland, as exhibited in her creeds, canons, confessions, and forms of worship.' This profession he solemnly makes to the presbytery before his people, and promises to abide by these, in subjection to his brethren. Such hath been their uniform practice, at the admission of every new pastor, from the date of their separation from the Kirk to the present day; and, consistently with this profession, in all deliberations in church courts, the established laws of presbytery are consulted, and by them their transactions are regulated. Their Synod, consisting of all the ministers, and one lay-elder, deputed from each congregation, meets for two years successively in Edinburgh, and every third year in Glasgow, in the month of May; and under it are six presbyteries, namely, those of Edinburgh, Glasgow, St. Ninians, Dysart, Perth, and Dumfries.

They have no academies of their own, like the Seceders; but their licentiates, or candidates for the ministry, are educated under the professors of divinity in the different Scottish Universities, whose certificates they acknowledge. Hence they are unwilling to be reckoned Seceders or Dissenters; and yet the members of the establishment seem but little disposed to own them as brethren; for, by a late act of the General Assembly, their ministers are excluded from their communion, until they have undergone a fresh examination.

Their views of church-communion are not so contracted as those of the Seceders, for they permit their members, in the absence of their pastor, or when they are at a distance from any chapel in their own communion, 'to join in any other society of sound Presbyterians, where the speaker is known to be orthodox, of good report, and regularly called to the ministry.' Many of their people receive the sacrament of the Lord's Supper with equal readiness in the established Kirk as in their own, and they admit to communion, not only Presbyterians, but Christians of every denomination, who, 'as far as they can judge, have a competent measure of knowledge, are sound in the faith, and unblamable in their lives, though not their followers.'

Mr. Gillespie assured the public, that 'his views were to hold communion with all who appear to hold communion with the head our Lord Jesus Christ, and with such only;' and their synod has determined, 'that it is agreeable to the principles of the Presbytery of Relief to hold communion with visible saints in the Episcopalian and Independent churches.' Adam's Religious World Displayed, vol. iii. pp. 223—232; Hurd's View of all Religions, p. 691.

RELIGION has been defined the love of God kindled in our souls, and producing obedience to his will.

All religion supposes and takes for granted the clear and undoubted principles of natural religion. By natural religion is meant obedience to the natural law, and the performance of such duties as natural light, without any express and supernatural revelation, dictates to men. Such as, that we should believe all God's revelations, depend on him, implore his aid and assistance in all our necessities and distresses, and acknowledge our obligations to him for all the blessings and benefits which we receive; that we should moderate our appetites, with respect to the pleasures and enjoyments of this world, and use them temperately and chastely; that we should be just and upright in all our dealings, true to our word, faithful to our trust, and act by others as we would they should act by us; that we should be kind and charitable, merciful and compassionate, ready to do good to all, and not only to pity, but relieve, if we can, the miserable and necessitous. These and such-like particulars are what we call moral duties; and they are of eternal obligation, because they naturally oblige men, without any express revelation from God. And these great and fundamental duties are the foundation of revealed and instituted religion; for all revelation from God supposes us to be men, and alters none of those duties to which we were before naturally obliged. The Scripture constantly speaks of these moral or natural duties, as the main and fundamental parts of the Jewish religion. Our Saviour told the Jews, that the first and great commandment of the law, was to love the Lord our God with all our heart, and our neighbour as ourselves. Sacrifice, circumcision, and the law of the sabbath, on which the Jews laid great stress, he regarded as things very inconsiderable; he mentions only two moral duties, the 'love of God, and of our neighbour,' which are of a natural and perpetual obligation, comprehending all other moral duties. The New Testament declares it to be the great design of the Gospel to instruct us in those duties, and engage us to the practice of them.

Christianity, however, is to be considered in a further view, as containing an account of a dispensation of things, not at all discoverable by reason, in consequence of which several distinct precepts are enjoined us. Christianity is not only an external institution of natural religion, and a new promulgation of God's general providence, as righteous governor and judge of the world; but it contains also a revelation of a particular dispensation of Providence, carrying on by his Son and Spirit, for the recovery and salvation of mankind, who are represented, in Scripture, to be in a state of ruin. And in consequence of this revelation being made, we are commanded 'to be baptized,' not only 'in the name of the Father,' but also 'of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost;' and other obligations of duty, unknown before, to the Son and the Holy Ghost, are revealed. Now the importance of these duties may be judged of, by observing, that they arise, not from positive command merely, but also from the offices which appear, from Scripture, to belong to those Divine Persons in the Gospel dispensation, or from the relations in which, we are there informed, they stand to us. By reason is revealed the relation in which God the Father stands to us. Hence arises the obligation of duty which we are under to him. In Scripture are revealed the relations in which the Son and the Holy Spirit stand to us. Hence arise the obligations of duty which we are under to them. The truth of the case, as one may speak, in each of these three respects being admitted, that God is the governor of the world, on the evidence of reason; that Christ is the Mediator between God and man, and the Holy Ghost our Guide and Sanctifier, on the evidence of revelation; the truth of the case in each of these respects being admitted, it is no more a question why it should be commanded that we be baptized in the name of the Holy Ghost, than that we be baptized in the name of the Father.

Let it be remembered, then, that religion comes under the two-fold consideration of internal and external; for the latter is as real a part of religion, of true religion, as the former. Now, when religion is considered under the first notion, as an inward principle, to be exerted in such and such inward acts of the mind and heart, the essence of natural religion may be said to consist in religious regards to 'God the Father Almighty;' and the essence of revealed religion, as distinguished from natural, to consist in religious regards to 'the Son,' and to 'the Holy Ghost.' And the obligation we are under of paying these religious regards to each of these Divine Persons respectively, arises from the respective relations in which they stand to us. The manner in which these relations are made known, whether by reason or revelation, makes no alteration in the case; because the duties arise from the relations themselves, not from the manner in which we are informed of them. The Son and the Spirit have each his proper office in that great dispensation of Providence, the redemption of the world: the one our Mediator, the other our Sanctifier. Does not, then, the duty of religious regards to both these Divine Persons as immediately arise to the view of reason, out of the very nature of these offices and relations, as the inward good-will and kind intention, which we owe to our fellow-creatures, arise out of the common relations between us and them? But it will be asked, 'What are the inward religious regards, appearing thus obviously due to the Son and the Holy Spirit, as arising, not merely from command in Scripture, but from the very nature of the revealed relations in which they stand to us?' To this it is answered, that they are the religious regards of reverence, honour, love, trust, gratitude, fear, hope. In what external manner this inward worship is to be expressed, is a matter of pure revealed command; as, perhaps, the external manner in which God the Father is to be worshipped, may be more so than we are ready to think; but the worship, the internal worship itself, to the Son and the Holy Ghost, is no farther matter of pure revealed command, than as the relations in which they stand to us are matter of pure revelation; for the relations being known, the obligations to such internal worship are obligations of reason, arising out of those relations themselves. In short, the history of the Gospel as immediately shows us the reason of these obligations, as it shows us the meaning of the words, Son and Holy Ghost. Butler's Analogy of Religion, Natural and Revealed, pp. 188—191; Warner's System of Divinity and Morality, vol. i. pp. 79—81.

RELLYANISTS, or RELLYAN UNIVERSALISTS, the followers of Mr. James Relly. He first commenced his ministerial character in connexion with Mr. Whitfield, and was received with great popularity: upon a change of his views, he encountered reproach, and was pronounced by many as an enemy to godliness. He believed that Christ as a Mediator was so united to mankind, that his actions were theirs, his obedience and sufferings theirs; and, consequently, that he has as fully restored the whole human race to the divine favour, as if all had obeyed and suffered in their own persons; and upon this persuasion he preached a finished salvation, called by the apostle Jude, 'the common salvation.' Many of his followers are removed to the world of spirits; but a branch still survives and meets at the chapel in Windmill-street, Moorfields, London, where there are different brethren who speak. They are not observers of ordinances, such as water-baptism and the sacrament; professing to believe only in one baptism, which they call an immersion of the mind or conscience into truth by the teaching of the Spirit of God; and by the same Spirit they are enabled to feed on Christ as the bread of life, professing that in and with Jesus they possess all things. They inculcate and maintain good works for necessary purposes; but contend that the principal and only works which ought to be attended to, is the doing real good without religious ostentation; that to relieve the miseries and distresses of mankind according to our ability, is doing more real good than the superstitious observances of religious ceremonies. In general, they appear to believe that there will be a resurrection to life, and a resurrection to condemnation; that believers only will be among the former, who, as first fruits, and kings and priests, will have part in the first resurrection, and shall reign with Christ in his kingdom of the millennium; that unbelievers, who are after raised, must wait the manifestation of the Saviour of the world, under that condemnation of conscience which a mind in darkness and wrath must necessarily feel; that believers, called kings and priests, will be made the medium of communication to their condemned brethren; and like Joseph to his brethren, though he spoke roughly to them, in reality overflowed with affection and tenderness; that, ultimately, every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess, that in the Lord they have righteousness and strength; and thus every enemy shall be subdued to the kingdom and glory of the great Mediator. A Mr. Murray, belonging to this society, emigrated to America, and preached these sentiments at Boston, and elsewhere. Mr. Relly published several works, the principal of which were, 'Union,' 'The Trial of Spirits,' 'Christian Liberty,' 'One Baptism,' 'The Salt of Sacrifice,' 'Antichrist Resisted,' 'Letters on Universal Salvation,' and 'The Cherubimical Mystery.' Evans's Sketch of the Denominations of the Christian World, pp. 191—193; Adams's View of Religions, pp. 319—329.

REMONSTRANTS. See ARMINIANS and DORT.

REM'PHAN, רֵמֶפָּא, remphā, signifies an idol, according to the Septuagint. Amos (v. 26.) upbraids the Hebrews with having carried, during their wanderings in the wilderness, 'the tabernacle of their Moloch and Chiun, their images, the star of their god, which they made to themselves,' according to our version of the Bible. St. Stephen, in the Acts (vii. 43.) quoting this passage of Amos, says, 'Ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch, and the star of your god Remphan,' which has given occasion to a variety of conjectures. Grotius thinks it to have been some deity, as Rimmon; and Capellus and Hammond take this Remphan to be a king of Egypt deified by his subjects. A late writer also is of opinion, that God here refers to the idolatries, to which, in succeeding ages, the Jews were gradually given up, after having begun to revolt in the wilderness by the sin of the golden calf. He proposes to render the passages in Amos and the Acts as follows: 'But you set up the—succoths, booths, tabernacles, temporary residences—of your king [Moloch] and of that Chiun you set up your images: and the star of your divinities which ye made—formed—fashioned—had to do with—instituted to yourselves.' See CHIUN. Fragments annexed to Calnet's Dictionary of the Holy Bible, No. ccciii. p. 52.

RENOVATION, a reformation of life. Renovation is not to be confounded with regeneration. We can be born anew only once, because we can live only once in this present world; but we can rise and recover often, we can grow, and be nourished often with spiritual food, because we can fall often, and offend often. (Prov. xxiv. 16.) This distinction is expressly noticed in the New Testament: 'We are saved by the washing [or baptism] of regeneration, and by the renovation of the Holy Spirit.' (Titus iii. 5.) We are exhorted, as Christians, after admission into the church, or regeneration, 'to present our bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, which is our reasonable service: not to be conformed to this world, but to be transformed by the renewing of our mind, to prove what is the good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God.' (Rom. xii. 1, 2.) Agreeably to this, the Church of England, in her liturgy, directs us to pray, 'that we being regenerate, and made God's children by adoption and grace, may daily be renewed by his Holy Spirit.' This necessity of renovation after regeneration, results from the fleshly part of man's nature. 'Christ, indeed, in the truth of our nature, was made like unto us in all things, sin only except; from which he was clearly void, both in his flesh, and in his Spirit.'—'But all we the rest, although baptized, and born again in Christ, yet offend in many things.'—'And this infection of nature doth remain, yea in them that are regenerated; whereby the lust of the flesh, always contrary to the Spirit, (Rom. viii. 6, 7.) is not subject to the law of God.'

Thus does the cautious wisdom of our Church, in both her liturgy and articles, guard against two dangerous errors of enthusiasm: 1. that regeneration is a sinless state of perfection; and 2. that the work of conversion, or renovation, is instantaneous, produced by some sudden impulse of the Holy Spirit on the mind, and sensible or perceptible by the individual himself, at some particular time and place.

Nothing can be more express, than the whole tenor of Scripture, against the presumptuous doctrine of sinless perfection, so contrary to our just sense of the present imperfection of human nature, even in its most improved state.

When, therefore, we meet with such counter-declarations in Scripture, as that, 'Noah was perfect in his generation,' (Gen. vi. 9.); that 'David followed God with all his heart, to do only what was right in his eyes,' (1 Kings xiv. 8.); that 'Zacharias and his wife Elisabeth were both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless,' (Luke i. 6, &c.); such declarations must be understood in a qualified sense, as if those persons were comparatively, though not absolutely, perfect or blameless in their generation.

When it is said, 'Every one that is born of God committeth not sin, because his seed remaineth in him; and he cannot sin, because he is born of God,' (1 John iii. 9.)

if we suppose the apostle to write consistently with his former declaration, he must mean, that whosoever is born of God, by spiritual regeneration at baptism, neither doth nor can live in the allowed commission of sin; that he cannot sin, with allowance, continuance, and satisfaction to himself. For, as Dr. Doddridge justly observes, 'unless the words be understood in a qualified sense, they would prove not only the sinless perfection of every regenerate person, but the impossibility of his sinning any more; contrary to reason, Scripture, and experience.'—'The perfect Christian, according to the representation of Holy Writ, is he, who, as far as the infirmity of his nature will admit, aspires to universal holiness of life; uniformly and habitually endeavouring to stand perfect and complete in all the will of God, and to fulfil all righteousness, in humble imitation of his Redeemer; who daily and fervently prays for increase of faith, like the apostles themselves, and strenuously labours to add to his faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge, and to knowledge temperance, and to temperance godliness, and to godliness brotherly kindness, and to brotherly kindness charity. Such is the assemblage of virtues necessary to constitute the character of the perfect Christian; ever aiming at, though never attaining to, absolute or sinless perfection, in this present state of trial, probation, and preparation for a better; and meekly resting all his hopes of favour and acceptance with God, not on his own defective or imperfect righteousness, but on the free grace of God, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus; for by grace we are saved through faith; and this, not of ourselves, "it is the gift of God; not of works, lest any one should boast."'

The gradual growth of the spiritual life in the regenerate, as well as its imperceptibility by the individual himself, is most happily illustrated in the following parable of our Lord: 'So is the [preparation for the] kingdom of heaven, as if a man should cast seed into the ground; and though he sleep by night and rise by day, [following his ordinary occupation] yet the seed should spring, and grow up, himself knoweth not how. For the ground spontaneously beareth fruit; first the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear. But when the fruit [or grain] is produced, immediately he sendeth the [reapers] sickle, because the harvest is ready.' (Mark iv. 26—29.) In this beautiful agricultural imagery, the seed of grace and holiness is sown in the heart at baptism, by the Holy Spirit; it vegetates and grows imperceptibly, the man himself knows not how, he being utterly unconscious of the way of the Spirit, or his mode of operation, and can only judge by the fruits, or by his spiritual improvement, till the harvest or general resurrection. But though the regenerate be utterly unconscious of the manner of his spiritual growth, he is not to be idle or inactive, as if the Holy Spirit was to do every thing, and himself nothing. 'Giving all diligence, he must add to his faith virtue,' or morality, and all the Christian graces noticed as requisite to attain 'a Divine nature,' (2 Pet. i. 4—8.); he must 'work out his own salvation with fear and trembling,' mindful of his own inability and insufficiency, without the Divine aid, and humbly acknowledging, that 'it is God that worketh in us, by his Spirit, both to will and do, what is right, of his own good pleasure.' (Phil. ii. 12, 13.) See CONVERSION and REGENERATION. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book ii. pp. 978—983.

REPENTANCE signifies a sincere sorrow for all past transgressions of God's laws, an unfeigned disposition of mind to perform the will of God better for the future, and an actual avoiding and resisting of those temptations to sin by which we have been overpowered. All are sufficiently willing to admit that repentance does suppose and imply sorrow for sin; because a little sorrow, a short-lived passion, will not cost much pains and trouble. With this part of repentance the weak side of human nature is most pleased; but then, there must be also a change of disposition within. St. Paul does not reckon sorrow a part of repentance, but repentance an effect of sorrow. 'Godly sorrow (of which I am speaking) worketh repentance to salvation not to be repented of;' that is, such a disposition of mind, as manifestly shows what it produceth. If we are truly sorrowful, and heartily concerned, for having offended God, this will certainly be accompanied with a sincere disposition to please him, and obey his will for the future. No sorrow can be sincere without this. But this sorrow and change of mind, if real, will unavoidably produce in us a contrary behaviour to what caused this sorrow. Unless this is the effect of it, it will only tend to increase the condemnation of those who pretend to it. For St. Paul's words properly signify a repentance, that supposes such a conduct and behaviour, of which there is no reason to repent. The truth of this we are ready enough to admit, when it concerns ourselves. We only judge of other persons' sincerity towards us, by their outward actions and behaviour. We never take the professions of others to be the true representation of their inward affection for us, unless we see the effects and fruits of it in a suitable conduct. How then can we think ourselves sincere in our sorrow and inward repentance towards God, when we show it not in our lives and conversation? A good tree is known by its fruit. This is that repentance, which can alone avail any professed Christian.

Hence we may learn not to place any hopes in what is called a death-bed repentance. For this repentance, extorted from us by the prospect of death, is perhaps only a sorrow occasioned by our present fears; which is no more than the first step to repentance, but is not complete in all its parts. It is true, these are favourable signs; but it is to be declared that sorrow and good words, are not the end of the Gospel institution, but an holy life and conversation.

It is a fatal mistake to think that confession and sorrow will entitle us to pardon, unless they be attended with resolutions of future obedience through the grace of God, and unless those good resolutions be carried into practice. All the instruments of humiliation are no otherwise pleasing to the Deity, than as they lead us to amendment. A Being of infinite goodness and mercy can feel no delight in the sorrow and misery of his creatures; and he never inflicts misery on them, but for the sake of producing to them some greater good and happiness. Hence amendment is the chief thing, the most essential part of duty; it is the end to which all acts of humiliation are intended to lead the offender. Let it, however, be observed, that repentance, like every other grace, is the gift of God. In the words of our Church, we are taught to 'beseech him to grant us true repentance and his Holy Spirit.' 'The virtue of repentance in the heart of man,' says Hooker, 'is God's handy-work, a fruit or effect of Divine grace, which grace continually offereth itself even unto them that have forsaken it, as may appear by the words of Christ in St. John's Revelation,—'I stand at the door and knock;' nor doth he only knock without, but also within assist to open, whereby access and entrance are given to the heavenly presence of that saving Power, which maketh man a repaired temple for God's good Spirit again to inhabit.'

The great danger and folly of deferring repentance from day to day; of hazarding an immortal soul and the great concerns of eternity on a distant moment which is not at our disposal, is evident from many considerations. The shortness and uncertainty of human life are placed by the inspired writers in a striking point of view, and represented by a variety of strong and beautiful images. If a sinner propose to enjoy his pleasures for some years to come, and then to repent and be saved, can he be surprised if he were to receive a sudden message from the Author of his being; 'Thou fool, this night, or this very instant, thy soul shall be required of thee?' If we refuse to humble ourselves immediately before our offended Sovereign, the act of indemnity may, for aught we know, suddenly expire, and we be punished, as we justly deserve, for rebelling against his authority. If we sin that grace may abound, it would be no wonder if he were to cut us off in the midst of our days, and hurry us into the other world, when we are ill prepared for so hasty a removal. Every moment of human life is due to the great Author and Giver of it; and, therefore, every moment which is employed in such a manner as a reasonable and religious creature cannot account for, is so much time misemployed, and contrary to the design of the Almighty in bringing us into existence. When we have unhappily sinned, and there is not a man on earth who sinneth not, how good and gracious is God to pardon our sins, and to receive us again into favour, on our repentance and amendment!

'Confession is the first, the proper, the natural language of repentance. In this manner Job confessed, when God, appearing to him with Divine glory, discovered to him the corruption of his heart, and the guiltiness of his life. "I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth thee. Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes." In the same manner David also confessed: "I acknowledge my transgression, and my sin is ever before me." Thus also Nehemiah and his companions, the captives who had returned from Babylon, spent one fourth part of the day of their public humiliation in confessing their sins; and they said, "Thou art just in all that is brought upon us: for thou art right; but we have done wickedly." Thus the Lamentations of Jeremiah are extensively occupied in this employment. Thus Daniel in strong terms declared to God the sins of himself and his people. Thus, finally, have all sincere penitents done in every age and in every country. The heart, in the clear view of its sins, in the strong apprehension of the wrongs which it has done to God and to mankind, is full and overflows; and out of its abundance the mouth is compelled to "speak." Besides, confession is the first attempt towards making amends for the injury; and the penitent is ready to adopt every measure, which may in his view contribute to the accomplishment of an end believed to be so important, and relished as desirable.' Dwight's Theology, vol. iii. p. 89; Richardson's Divine and Moral Essays, pp. 177—181; Warner's System of Divinity and Morality, vol. i. pp. 425—427.

REP'HAIM, רֶפְאִים, signifies giants; otherwise, physic, or relaxatives. They were ancient giants of Canaan. There were several families of them in that country. It is commonly thought, they were descended from one called Rephah, or Rapha; but others imagine that the word Rephaim properly signified giants, in the ancient language of that people. There were Rephaim beyond Jordan, at Ashteroth Karnaim, in the time of Abraham; (Gen. xiv. 5.) and some of them in the time of Moses. Og king of Bashan was of the posterity of the Rephaim. In the time of Joshua there were some of their descendants in the land of Canaan. (Josh. xii. 4.; xvii. 15.) Lastly, we hear of them in David's time, in the city of Gath. (1 Chron. xx. 4, 5, 6.) The giants Goliath, Sippai, Lahmi, and others, were remains of the Rephaim. Their magnitude and strength are well known in Scripture. See GIANT.

The valley of the Rephaim, or giants, was famous in Joshua's time, and also in that of David. (Josh. xv. 8.; xviii. 16. 2 Sam. v. 18. 22. 1 Chron. xi. 15.; xiv. 9.) It is mentioned likewise by Isaiah. (xvii. 5.) It is also called in Greek, the valley of the Titans; and in our translation and the Vulgate, the valley of the giants. (2 Sam. xxiii. 13.) Joshua places the valley of Rephaim as one limit of the portion of Judah. It was near Jerusalem, and it may be doubted whether it belonged to Judah or to Benjamin, because of the proximity of these two tribes. Eusebius places it in Benjamin; but Joshua, (xviii. 16.) and those passages of the books of Samuel where it is mentioned, hint that it belonged to Judah, and was south or west of Jerusalem.

REP'HIDIM, רֶפְדִּים, signifies couches, or beds; otherwise, the letting go of the hand, or medicine of the hands. Rephidim was a station or encampment of the Israelites in the desert. (Exod. xvii. 1.) Departing from the wilderness of Sin, they came to Rephidim, where the people wanted water; they began therefore to murmur against Moses, saying, Why have you brought us out of Egypt, to kill us with thirst in this desert? Moses then cried to the Lord, and God returned him this answer: Take the people to the rock of Horeb, with the elders; I shall be there on the rock before you; you shall strike it with your rod, and water shall gush out, that the people may drink. This Moses did. The place was called Temptation, because of the complaints of Israel, who there tempted the Lord, saying, Is the Lord among us or not?

Rephidim was not far from Horeb, because God ordered Moses to go from thence to the rock of Horeb, to give the people water. Dr. Shaw gives the following information respecting it: 'After we had descended, with no small difficulty, down the western side of this mountain, we came into the other plain that is formed by it, which is Rephidim. Here we still see that extraordinary antiquity, the rock of Meribah, which hath continued down to this day, without the least injury from time or accidents. It is a block of granite marble, about six yards square, lying tottering as it were and loose in the middle of the valley, and seems to have formerly belonged to Mount Sinai, which hangs in a variety of precipices, all over this plain.' It is thus described by Pococke: 'This rock is on the foot of Mount Serich, and is a red granite stone, fifteen feet long, ten wide, and about twelve high. On both sides of it, towards the south end, and at the top of the stone, for about the breadth of eight inches, it is discoloured, as if by the running of water; and all down this part, on both sides, and at top, are a sort of openings, or mouths, some of which resemble the lion's mouth, that is sometimes cut in stone spouts, but appears not to be the work of a tool. There are about twelve on each side, and within every one is a horizontal crack, and in some also a crack down perpendicularly. There is also a crack from one of the mouths next the hill, that extends two or three feet to the north, and all round the south end. The Arabs call this the stone of Moses.' Pococke's Travels, p. 148; Sacred Geography, Geographical Excursions, p. 73.

REPROBATION is equivalent to rejection. Rejection, says a late writer, always implies a cause: 'reprobate silver shall men call them, inasmuch as the Lord hath rejected them, (Jerem. vi. 30.); that is, they are base metal, counterfeit coin. Where all are equally unworthy, if some be preferred to honour, the rest may be said, in a sense, to be reprobated, that is, left where they were; their condition is not worse, but it is not improved. Yet those only can be said to be rejected, who have been offered, either by themselves or by others. God never rejects any who offer themselves; but those who by continuing in sin reject the offered mercy of God, reprobate themselves: they say unto God, 'Depart from us, for we desire not the knowledge of thy ways.'

REPROOF, blame or reprehension spoken to a person's face. Just reproof supposes not only that what we reprove is not an ideal supposition, but an actual certainty; not only that it is, or has happened, but that it justly and morally deserves reproof. Hence what we reprove ought to be morally and unequivocally an object of blame; for, to reprove on account of things which are indifferent, or which, being neither good nor evil, are neither objects of praise nor blame, shows not only a want of discretion, but the presence of a censorious and malevolent disposition. Hence we ought always to observe the utmost moderation in our invectives and reproaches; and rather blame less than we ought, than more than we ought; rather pass over some trivial neglects, or venial offences which deserve blame, than reprove men for those things for which no reproof is due.

Though reproof may be deserved at one time as much as at another, yet there are times when it may be more patiently heard than at others; and, consequently, it behoves us to watch and to embrace the fittest season for applying it. To what purpose is it to utter remonstrances, to make objections, or express reproaches, to which men will not attend, which strike only upon the ear like the hoarse murmurs of the tempest, without producing any wholesome conviction in the mind, or an useful persuasion in the heart? To reprove a man for any particular act, when he is under the influence of any violent emotion, is only to increase his rage. There are hours, when even the most unpalatable truths may gain admission, not only to men's ears, but to their hearts. These hours it behoves those diligently to watch and instantly to seize, who are studious to reform the vices, or abolish the prejudices, of their fellow-creatures. The best intended reproof will fail of its effect unless it be well timed; and, as the end of reproof is the correction of the individual, we ought to be careful that it be not conveyed in harsh and offensive terms, such as provoke rather than convince, and exasperate rather than persuade. 'A soft answer,' said the wise man, 'turneth away wrath;' and certainly that rebuke which is mild and affectionate is most likely to effect the reformation of the individual. Even when we rebuke the most obstinate offenders, though our language may mark our abhorrence of the vice, we ought not to discard all fellow-feeling for the person; for, the difference between the best men and the worst can never be so great as to exclude the feeling of compassion, justify the expression of contempt, or smother the sense of our common imperfections. Fellows's Body of Theology, vol. ii. pp. 396—398.

RESENTMENT is a sense of injury associated with a desire to retaliate it. This desire, in the first instance, is merely physical, and lasts no longer than the sensation of pain which produced it. Every sensation of pain, particularly when considered as caused by a being willing, or capable of willing, to produce it, seems instinctively to cause not only a desire to get rid of the pain itself, but, in some measure, to transfer it to the author. The feeling of resentment is necessary, in many cases, to quicken the energies of resistance, and invigorate the self-preserving power. The passion, therefore, itself, though like other passions liable to be abused and perverted to ends very different from that for which it was bestowed, must be regarded in man, as in other animals, as a provision made by nature for our defence. It is, therefore, to be regarded as a preventive of evil; and practically it ought never to be exerted, except with a view of producing good or counteracting evil.

Though the feeling of resentment operates to the prevention or the redress of evil, yet it must always be regarded as a painful remedy, to which no benevolent being will have recourse, except for the sake of producing some greater good, or some pleasure, which more than counterbalances the pain. The practice of revenge, if it be ever justifiable, can be so only when it is followed not for its own sake, or for any pleasure to be derived to the individual, from inflicting pain on one who has inflicted pain on him, but for the sake of some good to be derived to society from punishing offenders against those rules of conduct, the observance of which constitutes its security and happiness.

The object of resentment is to cause pain, and the end of it is to counteract misery. Revenge thus differs from other particular passions and affections, that in the exertion of it not the object, but only the end, is to be considered. It is vicious to delight in giving pain; but surely benevolence itself may be employed in averting evil either from others or ourselves. And as our nature must be considered as a whole made up of many parts, the feeling of resentment can be morally justified, only so far as it is kept subordinate to that general feeling of benevolence, which religion inspires, and which no other passion ought to be suffered to suppress. When resentment has not settled into rancour, it is not so incompatible with the feeling of benevolence, as may, at first sight, be imagined. A man may, in some measure, resent the improper conduct of his friends, or even his children; and yet, at the same time, entertain the most affectionate concern for their welfare.

Our good will to others is susceptible of various gradations, and, though our enemy may not enjoy a very high share of it, yet as a sentient being, capable of pleasure or pain, of happiness or misery, there always will be a share to which he is entitled; and of which nothing can justify the deprivation, whatever may have been the enormities of his conduct or the bitterness of his hostility. We are all, in some measure, members one of another; or we are parts of one great whole, connected by a multitude of sympathies and interests; and the Scripture presses this consideration upon us in order to teach us that we ought to feel a repugnance to inflict pain on others, as we do to inflict it on ourselves. But as, notwithstanding the reluctance of sensitive inclination, we often inflict various pains on ourselves, and even submit to the amputation of our limbs and other grievous sufferings and privations, for the sake of some important benefit, so we ought never to inflict pain on any of our fellow-creatures, unless for the sake of promoting their greater good, or the good of the society of which they are one of the constituent parts. Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. ii. 205—210.

RESURRECTION. There are many passages in the Old Testament which either obscurely hint at the resurrection, or immediately refer to it, (Joh. xix. 23—27. Dan. xii. 2. Isai. xxv. 8.; xxvi. 19. Hos. vi. 2.; xiii. 14. Ezek. xxxvii. 1—14.); but they are by no means such as produced a firm belief in the doctrine among the Jews. The doctrine of the Resurrection of the dead is, however, one of the great articles of the Christian faith. We believe that Jesus died and rose again; we also believe, for so we are taught in the New Testament, that 'them which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him,' that 'Christ by his rising became the first fruits of them that slept,' that 'the dead shall be raised incorruptible,' that 'the grave and the sea shall give up their dead,' that, at this resurrection, 'the dead in Christ shall rise first,' the Lord Jesus Christ will change our vile body, and fashion it like unto his glorious body, according to the working of that mighty power whereby he is able to subdue all things to himself.' (1 Thess. iv. 14. 16. 1 Cor. xv. 20—52. Rev. xx. 13. Philip. iii. 21.)

From history we learn not merely that the body of Lazarus was reanimated after it had been interred four days, and that of Jesus Christ after it had lain in the grave part of three days; but farther, that 'after his resurrection, many bodies of the saints which slept arose from their graves,' which had been thrown open by the earthquake at his crucifixion, 'and went into the holy city, and appeared unto many,' (Matt. xxvii. 52, 53.) thus attesting the truth of his resurrection, and declaring their own rescue from the grave (in which some of them had long lain) by virtue of his power over death and corruption. So that to deny the possibility of the resurrection, is to deny the truth of several matters of fact, all at least as well attested as any other facts in history; and that in contradiction to some very obvious modes of reasoning, and some striking analogies.

The restoring to life a body deprived of motion, animation, and sensation, is not beyond the power of God; since the communication of any qualities to an organized body, or body capable of organization, which it had lost, cannot be imagined to require a greater exertion of power than the original creation of such body with certain appropriate attributes. Indeed, cases occur almost daily in which human efforts lead to a change to all appearance as great as the deliverance of a dead man from the silence and inactivity of the grave. I allude to fainting-fits, and instances of suspended animation by drowning. In these the subject is often for a considerable time so completely void of motion, feeling, and, as it would seem, of life, that no one, who had never previously witnessed or heard of a similar suspension, could avoid concluding that it would be final and eternal. There is, it is true, a difference in the durations of lifelessness in the cases of swooning and apparent drowning, and of real death; but that is more than compensated in the difference of power and skill in the respective agents of restoration. Nearly allied to these are the examples of peculiar transformations undergone by various insects, and the state of rest and insensibility which precede those transformations.

'That which thou sowest (says the apostle to the Corinthians) is not quickened except it die.' (1 Cor. xv. 37.) Seed may be sown, but unless it lose its external configuration, and appear corrupted, no future vegetable will spring from it. The little infinitesimal or germen, which is to spring forth into new life, is fed by the death and corruption of the rest; a fact well known not only to scientific botanists, but to almost every gardener and husbandman. So that those, who deny the propriety and correctness of the analogy traced by the apostle, are as little supported by truth and nature as the Corinthian freethinkers, whose objection he thus philosophically refuted. The apparent corruption which a grain when deposited in the earth undergoes, may be considered as the casting of exuviae, whose removal and decay are necessary to the dawning of latent life; and thus, in like manner, may the future body be ripening through the mysterious process of dissolution, till the day of the general resurrection, when it shall come forth a glorious body, fitted for new union with the soul from which it had been separated, and so formed as thenceforward to endure for ever. The principal difference in the two cases relates to frequency of occurrence: the process of vegetation from a corrupted grain is observed annually; while the deliverance of a body from corruption in the grave will occur but once. Yet this ought rather to stimulate our hopes than to generate scepticism: the contrast between the sterility and death-like appearance of the vegetable world in the winter, and the gladsome verdure, vigour, and variety of spring, when God 'renews the face of the earth,' (Psalm civ. 30.) is admirably fitted to teach us what the Creator and Governor of the universe can effect, to convince us that he can 'loosen the bands of death,' as easily as he can educe vegetation from corruption, and, in conjunction with the promises of the Gospel, to excite a lively and rapturous anticipation of that delightful period, when 'one unbounded spring' shall 'encircle all.'

Objectors, however, have advanced still farther, and urge that after death the body may not merely become insensible, inactive, and undergo corruption, but, farther, may experience dispersion of particles and union with other bodies. Thus the body of a dead man may be burnt, its ashes scattered in the air, blown about by the wind, or exhaled into the atmosphere, or, after it is resolved into earthy or humid matter, it may be taken up by the vessels which supply plants with nutriment, and at length become constituent parts of the substance of those plants. How can particles thus dispersed over half the earth, or thus intimately combined with other bodies, be recalled from their state of dispersion, or separated from the bodies of which they have subsequently formed constituent parts and re-united so as to form one body? Here again we may deprive the objection of all force, by contemplating processes of daily occurrence. Chemists can intermix several liquids, of essentially different kinds, in such manner, that the smallest sensible particle of the resulting liquid shall partake of all the constituent liquids; and then they can, by analysis, separate the compound substance into all the simple liquids of which it was composed. They can detect, separate, and measure, the several simple substances of which a certain compound natural mass shall be formed. Does the collecting together of the scattered particles of dead bodies, or the separation of them from other bodies with which they may have become combined, require skill or energy so much greater than the operations of art to which I have just been adverting, that we must pronounce them too difficult for the Creator of the world to perform? Is his knowledge so circumscribed that he cannot tell what becomes of every particle of every body he has created? Or cannot matchless knowledge, and unlimited power, know and accomplish all things required by infinite wisdom, or promised by boundless love, as easily and successfully as a chemist can ascertain or separate the various substances in a compound mass?

Again it is said, 'of men drowned in the sea, the bodies may be eaten by fishes, and they again by other men; or, among cannibals, men feast upon the flesh of men; in such cases, where one man's body may be converted into part of the substance of another man's body, and so on, how shall each at the resurrection recover his own peculiar body?' To this Dr. Calamy replies, 'that the body of man does not always continue in the same state, or consist of the same matter; but is perpetually spending and renewing itself, every day losing and gaining new matter. This is undeniably certain from experience. For so much as our bodies grow, so much new matter is added to them, over and besides the repairing of what is continually spent. And after a man comes to his full growth, he usually wastes and carries off, by insensible perspiration, every day, in the proportion of five parts to eight of what he eats and drinks. So that every man must change his body several times in a year. Indeed, the bones do not change so often as the fluid and fleshy parts of the body; but they also change, because they grow; for whatever grows, is nourished and spends, or otherwise it would not want repair. If the matter of a man's body, which he had at any time of his life, be raised, it is as much his own, and the same body, as that which he had at his death, and generally much more perfect. Besides, it is a very small and inconsiderable part of what is eaten and descends into the stomach, that turns into nourishment; the far greater quantity going off by excretions and perspirations. Or if it did not, to what a vast, monstrous bulk should we grow in a few years! So that was the body of a man eaten by cannibals, very little of it would pass into the substance of their bodies. Or, was it more, there cannot be so much as is before gone from the same man's body. If a man lives thirty or forty years, his body hath undergone many new repairs in that time, and yet in the sense of all mankind, it is the same body. Suppose a corpulent man to fall into a gradual consumption, must this man at the resurrection have no more of his body than he had, when at the hour of his death? Would it not then be the same body, if made up of the parts it had at the beginning of his consumption? If it be, then, the same holds as to other times of his life. And consequently this objection of cannibals devouring men, is of no force to destroy the possibility of the resurrection.'

The great Head of the Church hath assured us, that 'the hour is coming in which all that are in their graves shall hear his voice, and come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation.' At that great and solemn event, when we shall 'all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump,' 'the dead shall be raised incorruptible;' and it is probable, that the bodies of the righteous and the wicked, though each shall in some respects be the same as before, will each be in some respects not the same, each undergoing some change conformable to the character of the individual, and suited to his future state of existence; but both, as the passage just quoted clearly teaches, are then rendered indestructible. Respecting the good it is said, 'When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, we shall appear with him in glory,' 'we shall be like him, our body shall be fashioned like his glorious body,' (Col. iii. 4. 1 John iii. 2. Phil. iii. 21.); yet, notwithstanding this, 'it doth not yet fully appear what we shall be.' This is for a very obvious reason. Our present manner of knowing depends upon our present constitution, and we know not the exact relation which subsists between this constitution and the manner of being in a future world; we derive our ideas through the medium of the senses; the senses are necessarily conversant with terrestrial objects only; our language is suited to the communication of present ideas; and thus it follows that the objects of the future world may in some respects (whether few or many we cannot say) differ so extremely from terrestrial objects, that language cannot communicate to us any such ideas as would render those matters comprehensible. But language may suggest striking and pleasing analogies; and with such we are presented by the philosophic apostle. 'All flesh (says he) is not the same flesh; but there is one flesh of men, another of beasts, another of fishes, and another of birds;' and yet all these are fashioned out of the same kind of substance, mere inert matter till God gives it life and activity. It is sown an animal body; a body which previously existed with all the organs, faculties, and propensities, requisite to procure, receive, and appropriate nutriment, as well as to perpetuate the species; but it shall be raised a spiritual body, refined from the dregs of matter, freed from the organs and senses required only in its former state, and probably possessing the remaining senses in greater perfection, together with new and more exquisite faculties, fitted for the exalted state of existence and enjoyment to which it is now rising. In the present state the organs and senses appointed to transmit the impressions of objects to the mind, have a manifest relation to the respective objects; the eye and seeing, for example, to light; the ear and hearing, to sound. In the refined and glorious state of existence to which good men are tending, where the objects which solicit attention will be infinitely more numerous, interesting, and delightful, may not the new organs, faculties, and senses, be proportionally refined, acute, susceptible, or penetrating? Human industry and invention have placed us, in a manner, in new worlds; what, then, may not a spiritual body, with sharpened faculties, and the grandest possible objects of contemplation, effect in the celestial regions to which Christians are invited? There the senses will no longer degrade the affections, the imagination no longer corrupt the heart, the magnificent scenery thrown open to view will animate the attention, give a glow and vigour to the sentiments; that roused attention will never tire, those glowing sentiments will never cloy; but the man, now constituted of an indestructible body, as well as of an immortal soul, may visit in eternal succession 'the streets of the celestial city,' may 'drink of the pure river of the water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God, and of the Lamb;' and dwell for ever in those abodes of harmony and peace, which, though 'eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor has it entered into the imagination of man to conceive,' we are assured 'God hath prepared for them that love him.' REU, רעו, signifies his friend, his shepherd; or his misfortune. Reu, or Ragau, son of Peleg, was born in the year of the world 1787. His father was then thirty years old. He bagat Serug, being thirty-two years old, in the year of the world 1819, and died at the age of two hundred and thirty-nine years, in the year of the world 2026. It is not impossible, that the city of Ragæ, and the plain of Ragau, might take their names from Reu, or Ragau; for these are the same in the Hebrew.

REU'BEN, ראובן, signifies who sees the son, or vision of the son. Reuben or Ruben, the eldest son of Jacob and Leah, was born in the year of the world 2246. (Gen. xxix. 32.) One day Reuben went into the field, being yet young, and found a fruit called in Hebrew, dudaim, generally interpreted mandrakes, which he brought to his mother Leah. (Gen. xxx. 14.) Rachel was desirous of having them, and asked them of Leah, who bargained with her for Jacob's company the night following. Long after this Jacob being returned into the land of Canaan, Reuben defiled his father's concubine, Bilhah; for which he lost his birth-right, and all the privileges of primogeniture.

When Joseph's brethren had taken a resolution to destroy him, Reuben endeavoured by all means to deliver him. He proposed to them to let him down into an old water-pit, which had now no water, that afterwards he might take him up again, and restore him to his father Jacob. His brethren took the advice; but while Reuben was at some distance from them, they sold Joseph to a party of Ishmaelites. Reuben going to the pit, and not finding him there, tore his clothes, and said to his brethren; 'The child is not to be found, and whither shall I go?'

Jacob, when dying, warmly reproaches Reuben with his crime committed with Bilhah; saying, 'Reuben, thou art my first-born, my might, but, unstable as water, thou shalt not excel, because thou wentest up to thy father's bed; then defiledst thou it.'

REVELATION. That a Divine revelation was not only expedient, but highly necessary, to be a sure guide in matters of religion, is fully apparent from the most successful efforts of mere natural reason, which could never discover Divine truths, nor the duties to be performed. If the ancient philosophers, after all their searches, could not discover in what manner God was to be worshipped, or sinners reconciled to him; if they could never come to a certain knowledge concerning the immortality of the soul, and future rewards and punishments, which are the principal motives to the performance of our duty; if the differences among the philosophers, about points of the greatest importance in religion, were so many, that, instead of informing mankind of their duty, they perplexed and disturbed them, no one in particular having authority to prescribe a fixed scheme of duty; if, under the direction and discipline of the philosophers, the heathen world, and the generality of persons, for several ages, actually remained in a state of gross idolatry, as uncleanness, impiety, and immorality of all kinds, and this was the real case; it then follows, that mankind must either irrecoverably continue in such a state of ignorance and corruption, or have some Divine revelation to assist them. In truth, it is very absurd to suppose that philosophy, or any thing but Divine revelation, could give them this assistance. The ancient philosophers clearly saw a great degree of darkness and degeneracy, corruption and depravity, in the minds of men; but they could find no remedy; and therefore Socrates and Plato, two of the greatest of them, despaired of man's recovery out of a state of error and corruption, without some extraordinary assistance from God.

No one who believes there is a God, and that he is a being of infinite power, wisdom, and knowledge, can doubt whether he can make a revelation of his will to mankind, fully attested to come from him, either by miracles, predictions of future events, or other undeniable testimonies of a divine mission; because this would not only be in fact to deny a God, but to contradict the universal belief that we find in all ages and nations of divine communications with man. This shows at least the general sense of mankind as to the possibility of the thing; and considering the false and very corrupt notions the world had concerning God, and his worship, and the other duties we owe him, it was very agreeable to the natural notions we have of the divine goodness and wisdom, to suppose that he would make a farther revelation to mankind, which might give them a clearer knowledge, and a stronger sense of duty, unless we suppose that he had utterly abandoned them. They who think it had been most agreeable to the divine wisdom and goodness, to have given mankind one certain rule from the beginning, which should have been a sufficient guide to all future generations, and that the want of a new revelation implies a defect of knowledge and foresight in God, seem to forget that man was created a free agent, and as such, must have it in his power to do good or evil. And when the generality of men were actually fallen into a state of final corruption, the informing of them, by a special revelation, how they might be delivered out of it, and their natures rectified, and themselves restored to the favour of God, could not surely be any derogation to the infinite characters of goodness and wisdom.

It may be proper to notice the extreme vanity and presumption of those, who think themselves at liberty to disregard the Gospel revelation, till God shall think fit to satisfy them, why he did not make it sooner, and at once to all mankind; as if he were accountable to us for his proceedings and dispensations, and we at liberty to refuse the benefits or deliverances he sends, because they come not at a time, nor in the manner, that we judge most proper. Such may as well ask, why he made us men, and not angels? why he did not bring us into the world with the perfect use of our reason? why he did not give to all men the same capacity and leisure, to know and learn their duty? why he has appointed different degrees of happiness in the next life?

No less unreasonable are they, who plead, that a revelation ought to be made to every person, and in every age. For a rule of duty is one and the same thing to all persons, and in all ages; and when a standing test is once given to distinguish truth from error, it is equally a test at all times, and in all places, supposing it to be conveyed to them with sufficient evidence of its coming from God. This being the case of the Gospel revelation, God having given such evidence as is abundantly sufficient to satisfy any ingenuous and unprejudiced mind, it is very unreasonable to suppose, that he is obliged to make, to every age and country, a scene of new miracles only to gratify the disingenuity and obstinacy of those who have already received ample evidence, and yet will not be convinced. Such 'if they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead.' The spirit of infidelity is proof against all arguments and conviction; and the Jews are a lasting testimony, how little it avails to be eye-witnesses to miracles, when men have once resolved to be infidels.

Could the doubts which envelope the subject of natural religion be dispelled by any one philosopher, to his own satisfaction, yet he might want the inclination, or, if he possessed that, he must want the power, to make others adopt his views, and thus taste his enjoyments. Or, could the great doctrines of religion and the rules of morality be settled, and proposed, and taught, ever so plainly or frequently, yet it would be difficult, or indeed impossible, to enforce the practice of them. A system of ethics may be considered by those who acquaint themselves with it, as extremely ingenious; but it is entirely optional whether they will or will not adopt it as a rule of conduct; and the experience of all ages shows that it is perfectly ridiculous to expect that any such system should ever be considered as binding. Even were human laws established in aid of it, it would still be inefficacious; for no secular power, however it may restrain from crimes, can produce a single action that shall be truly and essentially virtuous. Either, then, God himself must interpose and favour us with rules of virtue, and motives to the practice of it, such as it is difficult to withstand, or the world must necessarily sink deeper and deeper into vice and misery. To admit the latter, is to deny that the Supreme Being interests himself about the welfare of those whom he created and governs. Since, therefore, God is a being of matchless justice, mercy, and bounty, it follows, irrefragably, that if the deficiencies of natural reason, or the inattention of mankind to the footsteps of his providence, were such at any time (and such they have been) that all the inhabitants of the world were in danger of being lost in ignorance, irreligion, and idolatry, then would God interpose by extraordinary instruction, by alarming instances of judgment or of mercy, by prophetic declarations of things to come, that is, by a supernatural revelation of his will, to make us better acquainted with his attributes and our own character, to point out to us the path of duty, to lead us from the vanities of the world, and to draw us to himself. Gregory's Letter son the Evidences, Doctrines, and Duties of the Christian Religion, vol. i. pp. 26, 27; Warner's System of Divinity and Morality, vol. i. pp. 91—96

RE'ZIN, רִצִּין, ras-sōw, signifies voluntary, or good-will; otherwise runner. Rezin, or Rasin, king of Syria, agreed with Pekah, son of Remaliah, king of Israel, to invade Ahaz, king of Judah, and to make an irruption into his kingdom, in the year of the world 3262. (2 Kings xv. 37, 38.; xvi. 5, 6, 7.) The first year of his reign they besieged Jerusalem; but not being able to take it, they wasted the country round about, and went away. The year following they returned into Judah, and the Lord delivered up to them the army and the country of Ahaz. After this they separated their armies; and that of Rezin plundered every where, and carried away captives to Damascus.

About the same time Rezin took Elath on the Red Sea; he drove out the Jews, and settled the Idumeans in their room; who, probably, had engaged him to undertake this war. The Hebrew text, our version, and the Vulgate, intimate that Rezin, king of Syria, made a conquest of Elath for the Syrians. But the tenor of the discourse sufficiently shows that it ought to be read, for the Idumeans; and that in the Hebrew it should be read Edom, instead of Aram. The difference between these two words in the original, is scarcely to be perceived.

Ahaz, finding himself not strong enough to withstand Rezin and Pekah, applied to Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, and with a very large sum of money bought his assistance. Tiglath-pileser marched against Damascus, took the city, and slew Rezin; he also carried away his people to Kir, probably the river Cyrus, in Iberia. (2 Kings xvi. 9.)

RE'ZON, רִזְזֹן, peẕẕōn, signifies lean, or small; otherwise secret; otherwise prince. Rezon, or Razon, son of Eliadah, revolted from his master Hadadezer, king of Zobah, while David made war against him, and heading a band of robbers, made excursions into the country about Damascus. (1 Kings xi. 23.) He at last became master of this city, and was acknowledged king. It should seem that he could not settle here, till toward the end of Solomon's reign; for David conquered Damascus, as well as the rest of Syria; and Solomon maintained his command over all the provinces David had subjected. But if Rezon did not rule at Damascus till toward the end of Solomon's reign, he must have lived very long; for from David's war with Hadadezer, about the year of the world 2960, to the end of the reign of Solomon, who died in the year of the world 3029, must be sixty-nine years. Rezon must at least be five-and-twenty or thirty years of age, at the time of the first wars; since he was then a general of Hadadezer's army, and presently became head to a troop of freebooters; so that he must have been about ninety years of age when he began to govern at Damascus. If this seems hardly credible, it may be allowed, that Rezon might have reigned at Damascus under David and Solomon, as a tributary to these princes; and that he did not begin to revolt till towards the end of Solomon's reign.

RHE'GIUM ῥήγιον, signifies rupture, or fracture. Rhegium (now Rheggio) is a city of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples. St. Paul landed here when he went to Rome, A.D. 61. (Acts xxviii. 13, 14.) St. Luke being then of his company, and having said nothing of those miracles that are pretended to have been performed by St. Paul in this place, his silence ought at least to render them very much suspected; or rather, to put a total negative upon them.

RHO'DES, ῥόδος, signifies rose. Rhodes is an island and famous city of the Levant: its ancient name was Asteria, Ophiusa, and Æthrea. The name 'Rhodes' is from the great quantity and beauty of the roses that grew there. This city is chiefly famous for its brazen Colossus, which was one hundred and five feet high, and was made by Chares, of Lindus: it continued perfect only fifty-six years, being thrown down by an earthquake, under the reign of Ptolemy III. Euergetes, king of Egypt, who began to reign in the year of the world, 3758. When St. Paul went to Jerusalem, A.D. 58, he went from Miletus to Coos, from Coos to the Isle of Rhodes, and thence to Patara, in Lycia. (Acts xxi. 1.)

The Septuagint (Gen. x. 4.) put the Rhodians among the children of Javan. They probably read Rodanim, instead of Dodanim in the Hebrew. The Samaritan reads also Rhodanim in Genesis; Eusebius, Jerome, and Isidore followed the Septuagint, and think the Isle of Rhodes to have been peopled by the Rhodanim, the posterity of Javan. The Arabic of the Polyglots reads neither Rhodanim nor Dodanim, but Adana, which is a town in Cilicia, not far from Tarsus. If Dodanim be the true reading here, then it points to Dodona, an extremely ancient oracle in Epirus, which equally applies to a son of Javan, in Greece. If Rhodanim be the true reading, then the Isle of Rhodes is the most obvious station for the Rhodanim. To this it has been objected, that this island is one of those which have been raised from the bottom of the sea, as Pliny asserts; and therefore was not extant in the time of Moses. These principles may be reconciled by supposing, that, as other cities, Tyre, Aradus, &c. were originally built on the opposite and almost adjoining continent, yet were afterwards removed to islands close by, so Rhodes was a truly ancient city, on the continent first, but at length removed to the island where it still continued to assert its antiquity.

'Rhodes,' says Chateaubriand, 'exhibited to me, at every step, traces of our manners, and memorials of my country. I found here a little France in the midst of Greece. I walked through a long street, still called the street of the Knights. It consists of Gothic houses, the walls of which are studded with Gallic devices, and the arms of families that figure in our annals. I remarked the lilies of France crowned, and as fresh as if they had just come from the hands of the sculptor. The Turks, who have every where mutilated the monuments of Greece, have spared those of chivalry; Christian honour astonished infidel bravery, and the Saladins felt respect for the Coucis. The commercial port of Rhodes would be very safe, if the ancient works which defended it were rebuilt. At the extremity of this harbour stands a wall, flanked with two towers. These towers, according to a tradition current in the country, occupy the site of the two rocks which served as a base for the Colossus.—The coast of Rhodes, opposite to Caramania, the ancient Doris and Caria, is nearly upon a level with the sea: but the land rises in the interior; and a lofty mountain, with a flat summit, mentioned by all the geographers of antiquity, appears very conspicuous. At Lindus are yet left some vestiges of the temple of Minerva; but Camirus and Ialysus have totally disappeared. Rhodes formerly supplied all Anatolia with oil; at present it has not enough for its own consumption. It still exports a small quantity of corn. The vineyards yield an excellent wine, resembling those of the Rhone.' Chateaubriand's Travels in Greece, Palestine, Egypt, and Barbary, vol. i. pp. 346—348; Sacred Geography.

RIB'LAH, ריבלה, signifies wrangling, or their magnitude; otherwise, the yoke of the inveterate, or restless, or the yoke of the flowing. Riblah was a city of Syria, in the country of Hamath, which, according to Jerome, was the same as what was afterwards Antioch of Syria. However this may be, Riblah, as a residence, was one of the most agreeable of all Syria; whence it was a favourite abode of the kings of Babylon. Pharaoh Necho, king of Egypt, made a stop here at his return from the expedition of Carchemish, (2 Kings xxiii. 33.); and having sent for Jehoahaz, king of Judah, hither, he deprived him of the royal dignity, and put Jehoiakim in his place. Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, continued at Riblah, while his general, Nebuzaradan, besieged Jerusalem; and after the reduction of the place, king Zedekiah, and the rest of the prisoners, were brought to Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah, where Nebuchadnezzar caused Zedekiah's eyes to be put out, &c. (2 Kings xxv. 6, 20, 21. Jer. xxix. 21.; lii. 9.)

RIM'MON, רימון, signifies exalted, pomegranate. Rimmon was the name of an idol of the people of Damascus. Naaman the Syrian confesses to Elisha that he had often been in the temple of Rimmon with the king of Damascus, his master, who leaned on his arm, while he paid his adorations to Rimmon. (2 Kings v. 18.) It is thought this god was the sun, and that the name of Rimmon, or high, was given to him, because of his elevation. Grotius takes it for Saturn, because this planet is the most elevated. Selden will have it to be the God most high, the god Elion of the Phœnicians. Sarrarius believes it to be the goddess Venus. We know no other god in all antiquity, than this, by the name Rimmon.

This idol, says a late writer, was a serpent idol: for as the serpent was originally considered as an emblem of infinite wisdom, as well as the wisdom or subtilty of the sensual principle in man; so also the word Rimmon was used to signify the elevation and springing forth of wisdom in man. Bellamy's History of all Religions, p. 39.

RINGS. The antiquity of rings appears from Scripture and from profane authors. Judah left his ring with Tamar. (Gen. xxxviii. 18.) When Pharaoh committed the government of Egypt to Joseph, he took his ring from his finger and gave it to Joseph. (Gen. xli. 42.) After the victory of the Israelites over the Midianites, they offered to the Lord the rings, the bracelets, and the golden necklaces, taken from the enemy. (Numb. xxxi. 50.) The Israelitish women wore rings, not only on their fingers, but also in their nostrils and their ears.

St. James distinguishes a man of wealth and dignity by the ring of gold on his finger. (James ii. 2.) At the return of the prodigal son, his father orders him to be dressed in a new suit of clothes, and to have a ring put on his finger. (Luke xv. 22.) When the Lord threatened Jeconiah with the utmost effects of his anger, he tells him, that though he were the signet or ring on his finger, yet he should be torn off. (Jer. xxii. 24.)

RIPHATH, ריפא, signifies remedy, or medicine, or release, or pardon; otherwise stable. Riphath, or Riphat, second son of Gomer, and grandson of Japhet, (Gen. x. 3.) רפת. He is called Diphath, (1 Chron. i. 6.) דפת. The resemblance of the two Hebrew letters ר (Resh) and ד (Daleth) is so close, that they are very often confounded. But the translators of our English version have restored the original reading, and rendered it Riphath. The learned are not agreed what country was peopled by the descendants of Riphath. The Chaldee and Arabic take it for France; Eusebius for the country of the Sauromatæ, the Chronicon Alexandrinum for that of the Garamantæ; Josephus for Paphlagonia. Mela assures us, that anciently the people of this province were called Riphatai, or Riphaces: and in Bithynia, bordering on Paphlagonia, are the river Rhebeus, a people called Rhebanites, and a district of the same name. For these reasons Bochart believed that Riphath peopled Paphlagonia. Others think he peopled the Montes Riphei; and this opinion seems the most reasonable, because the other sons of Gomer peopled the northern countries towards Scythia, and beyond the Euxine Sea.

RIVER. The Hebrews give the name of the river, without addition, sometimes to the Nile, sometimes to the Euphrates, and sometimes to the Jordan. The tenor of the discourse must determine the sense of this uncertain and undeterminate way of speaking. They give also the name of river to brooks and rivulets that are not very considerable. The name of river is sometimes given to the sea. Habakkuk (iii. 8, 9.), speaking of the passage through the Red Sea, says, The Lord was displeased against the rivers; and the Psalmist (lxxiv. 15.) that the Lord dried up the mighty rivers.

RIZ'PAH, ריזפה, signifies bed, or extension, or coal, or fire-stone. Rizpah was the daughter of Aiah, concubine to king Saul. That prince having put to death a great number of the Gibeonites, on what occasion is not known, God, to punish this massacre, sent a famine into the land of Israel, which lasted three years. (2 Sam. xxi. 1. 3. &c.) To expiate this, David, who was then king, gave up to the Gibeonites, Armoni and Mephibosheth, two sons of Saul by Rizpah, the daughter of Aiah; also five sons of Michal, the daughter of Saul, by Adriel, the son of Barzillai, or rather by Phaltiel. (2 Sam. xxi. 9.) These they hanged on the mountain near Gibeah, at the beginning of barley-harvest.

Rizpah, the daughter of Aiah, took a sackcloth and spread it upon the rock; and continued there from the beginning of harvest, till water from heaven fell on them; or till the Lord sent his rain on the earth, and restored its former fertility. She hindered the birds from tearing the bodies by day, and the ravenous beasts from devouring them by night. When this action of Rizpah was related to David, he was moved with compassion, and sent to fetch the bones of Saul and Jonathan, which were at Jabesh-gilead, brought them to Gibeah, and put them in the tomb of Kish, the father of Saul; together with the bones of the seven men who had been executed by the Gibeonites.

On this occasion they acted contrary to the law of Deuteronomy, (xxi. 23.) which orders that they should take the bodies down from the cross or gibbet before the setting of the sun. But these unhappy remains of the family of Saul were left there, probably from the beginning of the spring to autumn: whether because the crime of their father deserved this severe treatment, or because the Gibeonites, being only proselytes of habitation, were not obliged to the observance of this law of Moses. Lastly, whereas God had ordered David to give satisfaction to the Gibeonites, this prince thought fit to leave the management of it to themselves. But, perhaps, this statement may be doubted. It might not be long before their bodies were wetted by rain; and it is not improbable, that the phrase 'waters from heaven' may signify copious dew.

Soon after the death of Saul, Abner, the general of his army, fell in love with Rizpah, and took her. Ishbosheth, son of Saul, who reigned at Mahanaim beyond Jordan, and who was supported in his regal state only by the credit of Abner's valour, resented this, and upbraided him with it. Abner was so provoked at this reproach, that he vowed the ruin of Ishbosheth, and leagued with David to bring over to his interest all the adherents of Ishbosheth. (2 Sam. iii. 7. 11.)

ROLL is taken for record. 'Search was made in the house of the rolls,' (Ezra vi. 1.) and a roll was found, containing Cyrus's decree in favour of the Jews. Ezekiel was commanded to eat 'a roll,' or small volume of a book, to signify the information about to be communicated to his mind. But it must be owned that foreknowledge in general, is like the roll of this prophet in the preceding chapter, 'written within and without: full of lamentation, and mourning, and woe.' This makes the author of the Revelation say, the book which he ate, was in his mouth sweet as honey, that is, in his first taste, or knowledge communicated; but in his belly, bitter as gall, that is, in digestion and rumination, foreknowledge is little more than the anticipation of evils.

The prophet Zechariah (v. 1.) saw a flying roll, in length twenty cubits, or thirty feet, in breadth ten cubits, or fifteen feet; it appears also to have been written on both sides; 'for every one that stealeth shall be cut off, according to the curse or penalty of the law, written on this side: and every one that sweareth according to the curse, or penalty, written on that side.' That curses when written, &c. were metaphorically very efficacious, see the instances of the curses washed into water and drank by the woman under the ordeal on account of jealousy. (Numb. v. 14. &c.)

ROMAN CATHOLICS. Names—By a Roman Catholic, the members of the Church of Rome understand one who, being in communion with the pope, believes every truth revealed by God, and proposed to him as such by the church, because God, the unerring truth, has revealed them. Popery and Papists were the names by which the Roman Catholic religion and its professors were distinguished by the first reformers, and the law, in this country, designated them afterwards by the same names. But these appellations were considered by themselves as nick-names, or terms of reproach, intended to hold forth to popular odium their communion with the pope, as the fundamental article of their religion, and to obliterate that of Catholic, to which they claimed an exclusive right. In law, however, they are now called Roman Catholics. The Church of Rome has also been called the Latin Church, because the service is read in Latin.

Rise, Progress.—The pope is the supreme head of the Church of Rome. The appellation of pope was, anciently, given to all Christian bishops; but, about the latter end of the eleventh century, in the pontificate of Gregory VII. it was usurped by the bishop of Rome, whose peculiar title it has ever since continued.

The spiritual monarchy of Rome sprang up soon after the decline of the Roman empire; and one great, though remote, instrument, in promoting the increase of this monarchy, so pernicious to the supreme civil power, was the barbarity and ignorance, which from that time spread over the western parts. Rome was chosen for the place of residence of the ecclesiastical monarchy, because this city had the particular prerogative of being the capital city of the Roman empire, where the Christian religion had its first rise and increase. For what is related concerning St. Peter's chair, is nothing but a vain pretence, which may easily be seen from hence, that afterwards the bishop of Constantinople had the next place assigned him after the bishop of Rome, only because that city was then the place of the emperor's residence, and called New Rome. When afterwards the Western Empire was come to decay, and the city of Rome had lost its former lustre, the bishop of Constantinople disputed the precedence with the Roman bishop. It is true the emperor Phocas granted the right of precedence to Boniface III. then bishop of Rome, who, on that account, took upon him the title of Œcumenical Bishop; but this did not imply any power or jurisdiction over the rest; for the other patriarchs never acknowledged any. So that here are no marks of divine institution to be found, the Papal power being purely human, and an usurpation of the rights of other sees.

The bishops of Rome did not extend their power over the western parts all at once; but it was introduced from time to time, by degrees, by various artifices, and under various pretences. What chiefly contributed to its growth, was, first, the emperors choosing other places of residence besides Rome; for by their constant presence there, they might easily have kept under the ambitious design of the bishops. In the next place, the Western Empire was divided into several new kingdoms, erected by the several barbarous and Pagan nations; and these, having been converted to the Christian faith by the direction of the Church of Rome, thought themselves obliged to pay her the most profound respect.

In the fifth century, the bishops on this side the Alps began to go to Rome, to visit the sepulchres of St. Peter and St. Paul. This voluntary devotion insensibly grew into a necessity. Hence it was easy for the popes afterwards to pretend that the bishops ought to receive their confirmation from Rome. Besides, some other bishops and churches, that were novices in comparison with the ancient Roman church, used to refer themselves to, and ask the advice of, the Church of Rome, concerning matters of great consequence, and the true interpretation of the canons. Hence the bishops of Rome, perceiving their answers were received as decisions, began to send their decrees before they were demanded.

Hence, also, they set themselves up as judges of the differences arising between the bishops, and, encroaching on the right and jurisdiction of the metropolitans, proceeded to suspend and depose whom they thought fit. At the same time, by making void the decisions of the provincial synods, they so diminished their authority, that by degrees they were quite abolished. Add to this, that Gregory VII. forced the bishops to take an oath of fealty to the popes, and by a decree enacted that none should dare to condemn any one, who had appealed to the pope. Nor did they forget to send legates or nuncios to all places; whose business was to exercise, in the pope's name, the same authority, which had formerly belonged to the bishops, and provincial synods.

At length, the popes began to grow weary of the imperial protection, because the emperor's consent was required in the election of a pope, and, if they were mutinous, the emperors checked them, and sometimes turned them out of the chair. The popes, therefore, for a long time employed various artifices, to exempt themselves from the power of the emperors. To this end they frequently raised intestine commotions against them. But the reign of Henry IV. furnished them with an opportunity of putting their designs in execution. For pope Gregory VII. surnamed Hildebrand, had the boldness to excommunicate this emperor, on the pretence that he made traffic of church benefices, by selling them to all sorts of persons, whom he installed before they had taken orders. Not satisfied with this, he cited the emperor before him, to answer to the complaints of his subjects, and declared him to have forfeited all right and title to the empire. This obliged the emperor to renounce the right of constituting bishops. The succeeding emperors found so much work in Germany, that they were not in a condition to look after Italy; by which means the pope had sufficient leisure to render himself sovereign, not only over his own possessions, but over all possessions pertaining to the church.

But the pope, not satisfied with this degree of grandeur, quickly set on foot a pretension of far greater consequence. For now he pretended to an authority over princes themselves, to command a truce between such as were at war together, to take cognizance of their differences, to put their kingdom under an interdict, and, if they refused submission to the see of Rome, to absolve their subjects from their allegiance, and to deprive them of their crowns. For this abominable pretension they plead their fictitious Decretals, which grant to the popes an unlimited power over all Christians whatever. When, however, the ecclesiastical monarchy seemed to be arrived at the height of its grandeur, and all the western parts were either in communion with, or in obedience to the Church of Rome, a revolt took place from the papal chair, which, though at first commenced from a trifling occasion, arose to such a pitch, that a great part of Europe withdrew its obedience from the pope, who, by that means, was in danger of losing the whole. This was the schism of Luther, which gave rise to Protestantism.

Distinguishing Tenets.—The members of the Church of Rome are bound to believe that 'this church is always one, by all its members professing one faith, in one communion, under one chief pastor succeeding the apostle Peter, to whom Christ committed his flock.'

The best summary of the doctrines of this church is the famous creed of pope Pius IV. which may be considered as a true and unquestionable body of Popery. It consists of twenty-four articles. The first twelve are the articles of the Nicene Creed, universally admitted by all Christian churches. The last twelve are the additional doctrines, which the Church of Rome has added to the Christian faith, and which are as follow:—

13. 'I most steadfastly admit and embrace the apostolic and ecclesiastical traditions, and all other observances and constitutions of the same church.

14. 'I also admit the Holy Scriptures, according to that sense which our holy mother the church has held, and does hold, to which it belongs to judge of the true sense and interpretation of the Scriptures: neither will I ever take and interpret them otherwise, than according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers.

15. 'I also profess that there are truly and properly seven Sacraments of the new law instituted by Jesus Christ our Lord, and necessary for the salvation of mankind, though not all for every one, namely, Baptism, Confirmation, Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Unction, Orders, and Matrimony; and that they confer grace; and that of these Baptism, Confirmation, and Orders, cannot be reiterated without sacrilege. I also receive and admit the received and approved ceremonies of the Catholic church, used in the solemn administration of the aforesaid sacraments.

16. 'I embrace and receive all and every one of the things which have been defined and declared in the holy Council of Trent, concerning original sin and justification.

17. 'I profess likewise, that in the Mass, there is offered to God, a true, proper, and propitiatory sacrifice for the living and the dead; and that in the most holy sacrament of the Eucharist, there is truly, really, and substantially, the body and blood, together with the soul and divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ; and that there is made a conversion of the whole substance of the bread into the body, and of the whole substance of the wine into the blood, which conversion the Catholic church calls transubstantiation.

18. 'I also confess that under either kind alone, Christ whole and entire, and a true sacrament, is received.

19. 'I constantly hold that there is a purgatory, and that the souls therein detained, are helped by the suffrages of the faithful.

20. 'Likewise, that the saints reigning together with Christ are to be honoured and invoked; and that they offer prayers to God for us, and that their relics are to be had in veneration.

21. 'I most firmly assert, that the images of Christ, of the mother of God, ever Virgin, and also of the other saints, ought to be had and retained, and that due honour and veneration is to be given them.

22. 'I also affirm, that the power of indulgences was left by Christ in the church, and that the use of them is most wholesome to Christian people.

23. 'I acknowledge the holy, Catholic, Apostolic, Roman church, for the mother and mistress of all churches; and I promise true obedience to the bishop of Rome, successor to St. Peter, prince of the Apostles, and vicar of Jesus Christ.

24. 'I likewise undoubtedly receive and profess all other things delivered, defined, and declared, by the sacred Canons and General Councils, and particularly by the holy Council of Trent: and I condemn, reject, and anathematize, all things contrary thereto, and all heresies which the church has condemned, rejected, and anathematized.

'I, the same N. promise, vow, and swear, through God's help, to hold and confess most constantly, to my last breath, this true Catholic faith, entire and inviolable, which at present I willingly profess and truly hold, and out of which none can be saved; and that I will take care, in as far as I can, that the same shall be held, taught, and professed by those who are under me, or of whom I shall have charge by my office. So help me God, and these Gospels of God. Amen.'

The author of the Profession of Catholic faith, on the article of Scripture and tradition, asks, 'Q. What do you believe concerning the Scriptures?—A. That they are to be received by all Christians as the infallible word of God. Q. Do you look upon the Scriptures to be clear and plain in all points necessary to salvation?—A. No. Q. How then is the danger to be avoided?—A. By taking the meaning and interpretation of the Scripture from the church, and by apostolical and ecclesiastical tradition. Q. What do you mean by apostolical tradition?—A. All such points of faith or church discipline which were taught or established by the apostles. Q. What difference is there between apostolical and ecclesiastical traditions?—A. Apostolical traditions are those which had their origin or institution from the apostles, such as infant-baptism, the Lord's day (or first day of the week), receiving the sacrament, fasting, &c. Ecclesiastical traditions are such as received their institution from the church, such as holidays, feasts, and fasts. Q. How are we to know what traditions are apostolical, and what not?—A. In the same manner, and by the same authority, by which we know what Scriptures are apos-tolical, and what not : that is, by the authority of the apostolical church, guided by the unerring Spirit of God. Q. But why should not the Scripture alone be the rule of our faith, without having recourse to apostolical traditions ?—A. First, Because without the help of apostolical traditions we cannot so much as tell what is Scripture, and what not. Secondly, Because infant-baptism, and several other necessary articles, are either not at all contained in Scripture, or at least are not plain in the Scripture without the help of tradition. For Christ has left his church, and her pastors and teachers, to be our guides in all controversies relating to religion, and consequently of holy writ.’

Church-Government and Discipline.—The government of the Roman Catholic church is episcopal. A metropolitan bishop, besides the jurisdiction common to him with other bishops in his own diocese, has also a jurisdiction over all the bishops of his province; summons them every third year to a provincial synod; and the constitutions framed in it affect all the churches in the province. In like manner, primates and patriarchs have a jurisdiction over all the metropolitans, and other bishops of the kingdoms, or nations, where they hold their dignified rank.

Above all these is the Pope, who is said to have the power of feeding, ruling, and governing the whole church, and exercises his jurisdiction over all clergy as well as laity. His care and solicitude extend to all Roman Catholic churches throughout the world. He makes laws for what is called the universal church, dispenses with some of them when he sees proper, punishes those who do not obey them, passes sentence upon ecclesiastical causes referred to him, (which ought to be the case with all those of great importance,) and receives appeals from all Roman Catholic bishops in the world. It is he who convokes a general council; invites to it all the Roman Catholic bishops dispersed throughout the globe; presides in it personally, or by his legates, and confirms its decrees. The pope’s sentence, however, in certain cases is not definitive; but the party has a right of appeal to a General Council. He constitutes new bishopricks, and makes bishops; deprives bishops of their sees for their crimes; and those unjustly deprived of them he restores. The pope has a council composed of cardinals, who assist him in the government of the universal church.

Worship, Rites, &c.—The Roman Catholics say, that the worship of the church of Rome consists chiefly in the solemn oblation, consecration, and participation of the body and blood of Christ, by the ministers of the church, accompanied with the prayers appointed by her for that purpose; in her liturgy, commonly called the Mass, which the whole congregation present offer up to God with the priest. They say that, this sacrifice alone excepted, no other external act is used among Christians, which of its own nature expresses the divine worship due to the Supreme Being; for all other external acts are promiscuously used to signify natural, civil, religious, and divine worship; and the kind of worship or honour given by them, is determined only by the intention of the person who gives it. This public service of the church, which the Latins call the mass, is by the Greeks termed public ministry or service.

Besides the prayers which the people use to worship God in time of Mass, they have many others, some of which they practise daily for the same end; and the clergy, besides their other devotions, are obliged every day to recite the church office, consisting of psalms, prayers, portions of the Old and New Testament, with an abstract of the lives of the saints.

The members of this church profess that a vow of perpetual celibacy was required in the ancient church as a condition of ordination, even from the apostolic age. But Protestants insist that the contrary is evident, from numerous examples of bishops and archbishops, who lived in a state of matrimony, without any prejudice to their ordination or their function.

Besides the Lord’s day, Roman Catholics keep several holidays annually. Among these the feasts of our Saviour hold the first rank; and on them the principal mysteries of our redemption are publicly commemorated and explained to the faithful. St. Augustin says, that the feasts of Easter, Pentecost, and the Ascension, were kept by the apostles. On the feasts of the blessed Virgin, of the apostles, and other saints and martyrs, their heroic virtues and triumphs are pointed out by the church of Rome to her children for their imitation.

The grandeur of some of the churches and altars, with their ornaments, in Catholic countries, is great; and in the time of divine service, church music is occasionally used, incense burned, and candles lighted in token of joy; and it is the practice of the congregation to kneel almost all the time.

There are several orders of monks in Catholic countries in every quarter of the globe at this day. There are Basilians, Benedictines, Augustinians, Dominicans, Franciscans, Canon Regulars, and others. All these different orders take the solemn vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, and all hold the Roman Catholic faith. They differ only in their rules of discipline, in their dress, in the particular privileges granted by the pope to each order in their names, which they generally take from that of their founder, and such like distinctions pertaining merely to discipline. In general, they are exempt from the jurisdiction of the bishop, and are immediately under that of the pope.

Countries where found.—The greatest part of Europe continues to profess the Roman Catholic religion. In Italy, Spain, and Portugal, it is the established and only religion. In France it was, and now again is, the established, though not the only, religion. In several of the German States, and in Poland, the far greatest number of the inhabitants are Catholics, intermixed in the former country with a few Protestants and Jews; and, in the latter, some of the Greek church, as well as a few Protestants and Jews, are to be found. Even in those countries where the Protestant religion prevails, there are more or fewer Catholics to be found. A considerable portion of His Majesty's subjects in the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland are Catholics. From returns of the number of Roman Catholics in England and Wales, made to Parliament in 1767 and 1780, it appeared that there were 67,916 in 1767, and 69,317 in 1780. They had therefore increased 1401 in thirteen years. The discussions as to the relative numbers of the Protestants and Roman Catholics in Ireland, seem to be set at rest by the official statements in the report to the House of Lords, in June 1825. It there appears, that, of the 6,801,000 which constituted in 1821 the entire population, 4,980,000 were Catholics, and 1,769,000 Protestants; of which last there were 1,135,000 belonging to the Established Church. The proportion of Protestants to Catholics is, in Ulster, as 1 to 1; in Leinster, as 1 to 4½; in Munster, as 1 to 9½; in Connaught, as 1 to 7½; all over Ireland as 1 to 2½. Many Roman Catholics are to be found in Holland; a few in Denmark and Sweden; and a great majority will be found in some, and a part in all, the Protestant States in Germany. In the southern part of America, the whole of the inhabitants, both natives and colonists, are, like those of the mother country, Catholics: which is likewise the case with the Spanish settlements in North America. In the United States are some Catholics intermixed with the Protestants, in every province; and one of them, namely, Maryland, was originally Catholic. This is also the case in Canada; for though there are many Protestants settled there, since it became a British province, their number bears no proportion to that of the Roman Catholics, who there enjoy the privileges of an establishment.

Archbishop Tillotson says, that the Reformed, by which he means Protestants of all denominations, are 'not much unequal to the Romanists' in point of numbers; but this is far beyond the common calculation, which allows only from 44 to 50,000,000 to the number of Protestants, while the members of the church of Rome are reckoned at about twice that number. The truth, it is likely, may be found between these; and perhaps there might be no great mistake in supposing their numbers to stand nearly in the ratio of three to four; or in reckoning the Protestants to be about 65,000,000, and the Roman Catholics about 80,000,000.

Miscellaneous Remarks.—The laws which rendered the Roman Catholics incapable of filling offices in the State of this empire, have been repealed by a late Act of Parliament; and the Roman Catholics are now eligible to all civil offices, with the exception of the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, of the Lord High Chancellor, or Lord Keeper of England, and of His Majesty's High Commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. Whether this measure be prudent or not, time will develop. At any rate, the interests of the Protestant part of the community have been little regarded by this measure; and as little have the wishes and petitions of the Protestants been consulted, by the manner in which the fundamental laws of the State have been abrogated, and the measure in favour of the Roman Catholics carried into effect.

By the tenth of George the Fourth, cap. vii., the declaration against transubstantiation, and the invocation of saints, and the sacrifice of the mass, as practised in the Church of Rome, are now repealed; and instead of the oaths of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration, every Roman Catholic, before he can sit and vote in parliament, or exercise any civil office, must take and subscribe the following oath:

'I, A. B., do sincerely promise and swear, that I will be faithful, and bear true allegiance to His Majesty, King George the Fourth, and will defend him to the utmost of my power, against all conspiracies and attempts whatever, which shall be made against his person, crown, or dignity; and I will do my utmost endeavour to disclose and make known to His Majesty, his heirs, and successors, all treasons and traitorous conspiracies which may be formed against him or them; and I do faithfully promise to maintain, support, and defend, to the utmost of my power, the succession of the crown, which succession, by an Act, intitled, "An Act for the further limitation of the Crown, and better securing the rights and liberties of the Subject," is, and stands limited to the Princess Sophia, electress of Hanover, and the heirs of her body, being Protestants; hereby utterly renouncing and abjuring any obedience or allegiance unto any other person, claiming or pretending a right to the crown of this realm; and I do further declare, that it is not an article of my faith, and that I do renounce, reject, and abjure, the opinion that princes excommunicated, or deprived by the pope, or any other authority of the see of Rome, may be deposed or murdered by their subjects, or by any person whatsoever: and I do declare that I do not believe that the pope of Rome, or any other foreign prince, prelate, person, state, or potentate, hath or ought to have any temporal or civil jurisdiction, power, superiority or pre-eminence, directly or indirectly, within this realm. I do swear, that I will defend, to the utmost of my power, the settlement of property within this realm, as established by the laws; and I do hereby disclaim, disavow, and solemnly abjure, any intention to subvert the present church-establishment as settled by law within this realm: and I do solemnly swear, that I never will exercise any privilege to which I am or may become entitled, to disturb or weaken the Protestant religion, or Protestant government in the United Kingdom: and I do solemnly, in the presence of God, profess, testify, and declare, that I do make this declaration, and every part thereof, in the plain and ordinary sense of the words of this oath, without any evasion, equivocation, or mental reservation whatsoever. So help me God.' Adam's Religious World Displayed, vol. ii. pp. 1—80; Broughton's Historical Dictionary, vol. ii. pp. 258—260; Nightingale's Portraiture of the Roman Catholic Religion.

ROME, 'Ρώμη, signifies strength, power. The city of Rome was founded by Remus and Romulus, according to Usher, in the year of the world 3966 of the Julian period, in the year of the world 3256, towards the close of the reign of Hezekiah, king of Judah. This city is so well known, that it is needless to give any account of it here. The sacred authors of the Old Testament have never mentioned it, that we know of; but it is well known in the Books of the Maccabees, and in the New Testament. St. Peter, (1 Epist. v. 13.) has denoted it by the figurative name of Babylon: 'The church that is at Babylon elected together with you, saluteth you.' St. John in his Revelation, (xiv. 8.; xvi. 19.; xvii. 5.; xviii. 2. 10. 21.) points it out by the same name, and describes it in such a manner, as can only agree to Rome; 1. By its command over all nations; 2. By its cruelty towards the saints; and 3. By its situation upon seven hills. (Rev. xvii. 9.)

Jerome translates the Hebrew Tubal by Italy, (Isaiah xlv. 19.) which, according to some, signifies Spain, according to others, the Tiberians. He has also rendered the Hebrew Chittim by Romans, which in other places he has translated by Italy; and Bochart has displayed all his learning to support this opinion. See CHITTIM.

It is certain that the Jews had some knowledge of the Romans in early ages; that afterwards this people subdued Judea, and at last destroyed Jerusalem and the temple, A.D. 70. They reduced Judea into a province; that is, they took from it the privilege of being a kingdom, and of having kingly government: first, after the banishment of king Archelaus, son of Herod the Great, A.D. 16; and this state continued to A.D. 37. It was again reduced to a province after the death of king Agrippa, A.D. 43; and it remained in this condition till it was entirely overthrown.

EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS. This was placed before the other epistles of St. Paul, not because it was first in order of time, but, because of the dignity of the imperial city, to which it is directed, or because of the excellence of the matter which it contains; or, because of the magnificence and sublimity of the mysteries, which are in it treated of, and explained. It passes for the most exalted, and the most difficult, of all St. Paul's epistles. Jerome was of opinion, that not one book only, but many volumes were necessary, for a full explanation of it. And some have thought, that St. Peter had chiefly this epistle in his eye, when he said, (2 Pet. iii. 15, 16.) 'As our beloved brother Paul also, according to the wisdom given unto him, hath written unto you. As also in all his epistles, speaking in them of these things; in which are some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, unto their own destruction.' But others with good reason think St. Peter rather refers to St. Paul's Epistle to the Hebrews.

St. Paul's design in his epistle to the Romans, is to heal certain domestic disputes, which then prevailed among the believers at Rome, and divided the converted Jews and Gentiles. The Jews were opinionated concerning their birthright, and the promises made to their fathers; and because of this, they pretended to a certain priority or preference over the converted Gentiles, whom they looked on as foreigners and interlopers, out of pure favour admitted into the society of the faithful, and to the participation of the prerogatives of Christianity. The Gentiles, on the other hand, irritated by these reproaches of the Jews, maintained the merit of their sages and philosophers, the prudence of their legislators, the purity of their morality, and their exactness in following the law of nature. They accused the Jews of infidelity toward God, and of a violation of his laws. They aggravated their faults, and those of their fathers, which had excluded the greater part of them from the inheritance of the saints, and from the faith, &c.

To end these contentions, St. Paul applies himself to restrain the presumption of both parties. He shows that neither of them could pretend to any merits, or had any reason to glory, or boast of their vocation; which proceeded from the mere grace and mercy of God. He proves that all mankind, both Jews and Gentiles, were equally 'under sin,' and liable to the wrath and punishment of God; that therefore there was a necessity for an universal propitiation and redemption, which were now offered to the whole race of men without any preference or exception, by the mercy of him who is God of the Gentiles as well as of the Jews; that faith in Jesus Christ, the universal Redeemer, was the only means of obtaining this salvation, which the deeds of the law were wholly incompetent to procure; that as the sins of the whole world originated from the disobedience of Adam, so the justification from those sins was to be derived from the obedience of Christ; that all distinction between Jew and Gentile was now abolished, and the ceremonial law entirely abrogated; that the unbelieving Jews would be excluded from the benefits of the Gospel, while the believing Gentiles would be partakers of them; and that this rejection of the Jews, and call of the Gentiles, were predicted by the Jewish prophets Hosea and Isaiah. He then points out the superiority of the Christian over the Jewish religion, and earnestly exhorts the Romans to abandon every species of wickedness, and to practise the duties of holiness and righteousness, which were now enjoined upon higher sanctions, and enforced by more powerful motives. St. Paul, when he wrote this epistle, had not been at Rome (Rom. i. 13.; xv. 23.); but he had heard an account of the state of the church in that city from Aquila and Priscilla, two Christians, who were banished from thence by the edict of Claudius, and with whom he lived during his first visit to Corinth. Whether any other apostle had at this time preached the Gospel at Rome, cannot now be ascertained.

It was written from Corinth, A.D. 58, being the fourth year of the emperor Nero, just before St. Paul set out for Jerusalem with the contributions, which the Christians of Macedonia and Achaia had made for the relief of their poor brethren in Judæa. (Rom. xv. 25, 26. Acts xx. 1.) It was transcribed, or written as St. Paul dictated it, by Tertius (Rom. xvi. 22.); and the person who conveyed it to Rome was Phœbe, (Rom. xvi. 1.) a deaconess of the church at Cenchrea. Bishop Tomline's Elem. of Christian Theology, vol. i. pp. 385—389; Bishop Watson's Theolog. Tracts, vol. ii. p. 254.

ROSH, ראש, signifies the head, or the top, or the beginning. Rosh, or Ros, was son of Benjamin. (Gen. xlv. 21.) We find in the Hebrew of Ezekiel, (xxxviii. 2, 3.) the word Rosh, which several copies have retained, as signifying the name of a people: but the author of the Vulgate, as well as our translators of the Bible, has taken it in an appellative sense, to signify the head, or the prince. In Genesis (x. 2.) mention is made of Tubal and Meshech; we find also Tiras, which has some relation to Rosh. The Septuagint have followed the Hebrew in Ezekiel; and the best interpreters make no question, but that Rosh is the name of a people; but they are not agreed about the country they inhabited, nor their present name.

The Orientals hold that Japheth had an eighth son called Rous, who is not mentioned in Moses, and who peopled the Russia we now call Muscovy. They add that Rous was of a very uneasy and turbulent disposition. He possessed the country beyond the Esel or the Volga, and often made inroads into his brother's territories, called Khozar, who, to live in peace with him, was forced to make a cession of all the islands of this great river, which empties itself into the Caspian Sea.

RUTH, רוּת, signifies drunk, satisfied. Ruth, a Moabitess, having married Chilion, the son of Elimelech and Naomi, who had settled in Moab, dwelt some time with him without having children. Naomi having lost her husband and her two sons, and desiring to return to Bethlehem, her own country, her two daughters-in-law being, now widows, offered to attend her. But she assuring them of her inability to provide for them there, Orpah was persuaded to continue in the land of Moab, but Ruth would accompany Naomi to Bethlehem. This happened at the close of the time of the Judges, and under the government of Eli, if we may believe Josephus. The Rabbins pretend that Boaz, who married Ruth, was the same as Ibsan, judge of Israel, who governed seven years, about the year of the world 2823, between Jephthah and Elon. The greater chronology of the Hebrews places this history in the time of Ehud, and of the servitude of the Israelites under Eglon, king of Moab. Some place it under Barak and Deborah; some, under Gideon; others under Abimelech. Usher, whom we follow, places it under Shamgar, about one hundred and twenty years after Joshua.

When Naomi came to Bethlehem, Ruth went to glean for their support. By chance she entered the field of a rich citizen of Bethlehem, named Boaz, who was related to Elimelech her father-in-law. When Boaz came to see his harvesters, he found Ruth, commended her, and favoured her. Ruth returned home at evening, told Naomi of the civilities of Boaz, who had also bid her glean only in his field. Naomi blessed God, who had put such sentiments of humanity in Boaz's heart, and acquainted Ruth that this was their kinsman.

At the end of harvest, Naomi said to Ruth, Go this night, and lie at the feet of Boaz, who winnows his corn; and do what he advises you. Ruth went accordingly, in the night, and lay down at his feet. Boaz awaking, was alarmed. But Ruth said, 'I am Ruth thine handmaid; spread therefore thy skirt over thine handmaid, for thou art a near kinsman.' Boaz acknowledged that indeed he was a near kinsman, yet there was another nearer than himself; but if he should refuse to marry her, he himself would take her to wife. Rising very early, before it was day-light, he filled Ruth's kerchief with corn, and sent her to Naomi.

Boaz went to the gate of Bethlehem, and, before the elders of the city, cited him to appear, who was the nearest kinsman to Elimelech; that he might marry Ruth, the widow of Chilion, his son. This person declining it, Boaz then insisted that he should renounce his right to it. This he willingly did; and then Boaz declared that he intended to marry her himself. Thus Ruth became the wife of Boaz, by whom she had a son called Obed, who was father to Jesse, and grandfather to king David.

The book of Ruth, which contains this history, is placed, in our Bibles, between the book of Judges and the books of Samuel, as being the sequel of the former, and an introduction to the latter. The scope of the author of this book is to relate the genealogy of David; and, in all probability, he was the same author who composed the first book of Samuel; in which because he could not conveniently place this genealogy of David, he chose rather to give it by itself. The writer observes, at the beginning of his work, that the history he was going to relate, happened when the judges governed Israel; therefore they ceased to govern it when he wrote. He also speaks of David at the end of his book; which shows that, at soonest, it must have been written in the time of David. The canonicalness of this book has never been disputed. Ruth the Moabitess is in the genealogy of our Saviour. (Matt. i. 5.)

SAB

SAB'AOTH, צבאות, signifies armies, flocks, fights. Sabaoth, or rather Zabaoth, is an Hebrew word, signifying hosts or armies: whether we understand the host of heaven, or the angels and ministers of the Lord; or the stars and planets, which as an army, ranged in battle array, perform the will of God; or lastly, the people of the Lord, both of the old and new covenant, which is truly a great army, of which God is the general and commander.

SABBATARIANS are so called from their keeping the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath; whilst Christians in general keep the first day of the week, or Sunday, in memory of our Saviour's having risen that day from the dead. On the Continent they are generally, but improperly, called Israelites. It is uncertain when they first made their appearance in the Protestant church; but we learn from Fuller that there were Sabbatarians in 1633.

They object to the reasons which are generally alleged for keeping the first day; and they insist that the change of the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week did not take place till the beginning of the fourth century, when it was effected by the emperor Constantine, on his conversion to Christianity. A summary of their principles, as to this article of the Sabbath, by which they stand distinguished, is contained in the three following propositions:—1. That God hath required the observance of the seventh, or last day of every week, to be observed by mankind universally for the weekly sabbath. 2. That this command of God is perpetually binding on man till time shall be no more. And, 3. That this sacred rest of the seventh day Sabbath is not changed, by divine authority, from the seventh and last to the first day of the week; or, that the Scripture doth no where require the observation of any other day of the week, for the weekly Sabbath, but the seventh day only, which is still kept by the Jews, to whom the law on this subject was given.

The Sabbatarians are to be found chiefly, if not wholly, among the Baptists; whence they are sometimes called the Seventh-Day Baptists; and they hold, in other respects, the distinguishing doctrines of Christianity, in common with other Christians. Some of them keep our Sunday, or the first day of the week, as well as the Jewish Sabbath, or Saturday; and indeed both these days were days of assembling, and were long held in great veneration among the primitive Christians. The ancient canons seem to have made them equal, by equally prohibiting fasts on either of them.

The Sabbatarians are only few in number, but they deserve to be distinctly noticed, on account of their integrity and respectability. There are two congregations of them in London; one among the General Baptists, meeting in Mill-Yard, the other among the Particular Baptists, in Cripplegate. There is also a family or small society of them in the neighbourhood of Oxford, and a few to be found in some other parts of the kingdom. They are to be met with in various parts of the Continent; and it appears that our Saturday and Sunday are both kept holy by the Abyssinian Christians, and some members of the Greek church. We are told by Mr. Morse, in his 'American Geography,' that there are many Sabbatarians likewise in America, as in Rhode Island and New Jersey; and that their doctrine is held by the remains of the Keithian, or Quaker Baptists, and by the Dunkers, or one congregation of Dunkers, at Ephrata, in Pennsylvania. See SABBATH. Adam's Religious World Displayed, vol. iii. pp. 416—420.

SABBATH, שבת, śāḇṣarōv, signifies cessation from labour, rest, repose. This word, in Hebrew, signifies rest. God, having created the world in six days, rested on the seventh (Gen. ii. 2, 3.); that is, he ceased from producing new beings, in this creation; and because he had rested upon it, he blessed this day, that is, sanctified it, and appointed it in a peculiar manner for his worship. The Hebrews, afterwards, in consequence of this designation, and to preserve the memory of the creation, sanctified, by his order, the Sabbath-day, or the seventh day of the week, abstaining from all work, labour, and servile employments, and applying themselves to the service of the Lord, to the study of his law, and to prayer.

As to the institution of the Sabbath, a difference of opinion exists among learned men. Some refer its beginning to the promulgation of the law, or, at farthest, to the sending of manna to the Israelites; and they found their notion upon this, that till that time we do not read, in all the history of the patriarchs and first ages of the world, of any sabbath observed and sanctified by the fathers of those days, which would not have been neglected had any such command been given. Others, who to me seem nearer the truth, place its origin so high as the creation of the world, from these words, 'On the seventh day God ended his work which he had made; and God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it.' Here God is said to sanctify the day when he rested; which was precisely on the seventh day after the creation. Though we find no other mention of the Sabbath, till Moses had conducted the children of Israel in the wilderness, which was about 2450 years after the creation; yet it is not to be supposed, that among the people of God, who were very careful in observing the law, and delivering it to their posterity, the observance of keeping this day utterly ceased, but rather was continued among those who feared God, till again invigorated with new authority from Mount Sinai.

With good reason, and on good authority, the sabbath was changed from the last day of the week to the first; from Saturday to Sunday, called now the Lord's day, because it was the day of the week on which our Lord and Saviour rose from the dead. In memory of this, and as a thankful acknowledgment of the great mercy of our redemption, fully completed by his resurrection, the sabbath hath been translated to this day, on which it is now celebrated by all the churches of Christ. As the first institution of the sabbath was by divine authority, so was its change. For as God rested from his labour on the last day of the week, so did Christ from all his sorrows and afflictions on the first, when he had fully completed the work of our redemption. Christ not only sanctified this day by his resurrection; and the apostles confirmed the observance of it, by their writings and practice; but the apostles themselves required the first Christians to meet together on the first day of the week; which was at that time honoured with the name of the Lord's day, and has been ever since, in all ages of the Christian Church, observed as the day dedicated to the service and worship of God, and to the celebrating of our Lord's resurrection from the dead. It is evident that our Saviour favoured his disciples with his presence on that day more than once, when they were assembled for divine worship; and it may be reasonably presumed, that, if he had disapproved of their conduct in this particular, he would have reproved them for it. The most ancient Christian writers assure us that the observance of the first day of the week prevailed early, and constantly, in the church. Thus, Ignatius calls it the queen of days; and Melito wrote a book concerning it. Justin Martyr, and Tertullian, in their Apologies, speak very expressly of stated Christian assemblies held on this day, not to mention Clements Alexandrinus, and many more. Pliny likewise speaks of it as the sacred day of the Christians, a very few years after the death of St. John. Now, is it likely that such an observance should have so early and so universally prevailed (for it does not appear that it was then disputed), had not the apostles directed to it? Christians, therefore, perceive that their Sabbath has its foundation in Scripture, in the example and practice, if not command, of the apostles themselves; and they believe that the change of the day by them, from the seventh to the first, without any alteration that we know of, as to the main purpose and design of it, virtually implies, if not proves, a command for its continuance, as it has accordingly been continued and observed from the primitive times through all succeeding ages of the church, because the chief ends of its institution are always, and ever will be, the same.

The proper means of sanctifying the Sabbath are, first, the spending of some considerable portion of time in our secret meditations, prayers, and studies. We ought also to review the past week, and observe how far we have been endeavouring to do our duty to God, and our neighbour; to examine in what we have failed, of what sins or errors we have been guilty, what former vows and resolutions we have broken, into which of our former sins we have relapsed, or into what new ones we have fallen, and whom we have any way injured in word or deed. All these things we ought to call to mind, that we may humbly confess them before God, be truly grieved for them, sincerely repent of and forsake them. We ought also to observe what particular providences of God have occurred to us the past week, either such as tend to awaken and quicken us in our duty, or oblige us to offer up our prayers and thanksgivings to God. When a man has thus employed some part of the morning, in fitting himself to appear before God, he ought then to go to the house of prayer, remembering that the Scriptures join these two together: 'Ye shall keep my sabbaths, and reverence my sanctuary.' We ought to consider the prayers and praises of the church, as the public services which we offer up to God, and in which we must remember, what a terrible condemnation they fall under, who 'draw near to God with their mouth, and honour him with their lips, when their minds and hearts are far from him.' When the public worship is ended, every one of us ought, for some time, to recollect his thoughts, and renew his vows and good resolutions; and remembering what we have learned, either from the word of God, or the sermon, to raise in our minds a proper sense of things. Masters of families ought also to bring their families together to prayer, to the reading of some portions of Scripture, and of other good books; and we ought to edify and admonish one another, by singing psalms, and by serious godly discourses. It is also an act of charity, highly becoming this day, to 'visit the sick, the widows, and the fatherless, in their affliction,' to comfort the afflicted, to reconcile differences between neighbours, and to do such other acts of love and kindness, without disturbing too much our own devotion, as may tend to their good; by which peace, kindness, and love, may be preserved among friends, neighbours, and acquaintance. The neglect or profaning of the Sabbath is one great occasion of that forgetfulness of God, that immorality and impiety, which so much abound. For if men on this day do not regard their souls, and the concerns of religion, when they are at leisure, and not engaged about their ordinary affairs; how is it to be expected they should have much thoughts of religion, when their minds are distracted with their temporal concerns, and their bodies fatigued with labour? We ought then to think it one of the greatest blessings to a nation, that God gives them his Sabbaths: and those who neglect or despise this day, may provoke God to shut them out of his rest, even that rest, or 'keeping of the Sabbath, which remains for the people of God.' Warner's System of Divinity and Morality, vol. ii. pp. 29—31; Richardson's Divine and Moral Essays, pp. 111, 112; Adam's Religious World Displayed, vol. iii. pp. 417, 418.

SABELLIANS, were so called from Sabellius, a presbyter, or, according to others, a bishop, of Upper Egypt, who was the founder of the sect. As, from their doctrine, it follows that God the Father suffered, they were hence called, by their adversaries, Patripassians; and, as their idea of the Trinity was by some called a Modal Trinity, they have likewise been called Modalists. Sabellius having been a disciple of Noëtus, Noetians is another name by which his followers have sometimes been known; and as, from their fears of infringing on the fundamental doctrine of all true religion, the unity of God, they neglected all distinctions of persons, and taught the notion of one God with three names, they may hence be also considered as a species of Unitarians.

Sabellius flourished about the middle of the third century; and his doctrine seems to have had many followers for a short time. Its growth, however, was soon checked by the opposition made to it by Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, and the sentence of condemnation pronounced upon its author by pope Dionysius, in a council held at Rome, A.D. 263.

Sabellius taught, that there is but one Person in the Godhead; and, in confirmation of this doctrine, he made use of this comparison:—as man, though composed of body and soul, is but one person, so God, though he is Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, is but one Person. Hence the Sabellians reduced the Three Persons in the Trinity to three characters or relations, and maintained that the Word and Holy Spirit are only virtues, emanations, or functions, of the Deity; that he who is in heaven is the Father of all things;—that he descended into the Virgin, became a child, and was born of her as a Son; and that, having accomplished the mystery of our redemption, he diffused himself upon the apostles in tongues of fire, and was then denominated the Holy Ghost. This they explained by resembling God to the sun, the illuminative virtue or quality of which was the Word, and its warming virtue the Holy Spirit. The Word, according to their doctrine, was darted, like a Divine ray, to accomplish the work of redemption; and, having re-ascended to heaven, the influences of the Father were communicated, after a like manner, to the apostles. They also attempted to illustrate this mystery by one light kindled by another; by the fountain and stream, and by the stock and branch.

With respect to the sentiments of Sabellius himself, the accounts are various. According to some, he taught, that the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, were one substance, and one Person, with three names; and that, in the Old Testament, the Deity delivered the law as Father; in the New Testament dwelt among men as the Son; and descended on the apostles as the Holy Spirit; and this is said to be the opinion which gains ground among the Baptists in Wales. According to Mosheim, his sentiments differed from those of Noëtus, in this, that the latter was of opinion that the person of the Father had assumed the human nature of Christ; whereas Sabellius maintained 'that a certain energy only proceeding from the Supreme Parent, or a certain portion of the Divine nature, was united to the Son of God, the man Jesus; and he considered, in the same manner, the Holy Ghost as a portion of the everlasting Father.'

In proving the divinity and personality of the Son and Holy Ghost, against the Sabellians, Trinitarians argue thus:—There is nothing more certain, than that Christians have always adored Jesus Christ as their God. This is evident from the Apologies, the Acts of the Martyrs, and the testimonies of the heathens themselves, as Pliny's letter to Trajan, and the objections of Celsus, and Julian the Apostate. It is also certain, that the Christians never worshipped but one God only; so that Jesus Christ is the same God with the Father who created the universe. But it is further certain, that Jesus Christ is the Son of God; and the same cannot be Father and Son, with respect to himself, as Tertullian very well demonstrates against Praxeas; for in this case, what Jesus Christ says of himself, as that he proceeds from the Father, that the Father has sent him, and that he and the Father are one, would be wild and absurd. It were in effect to say, I proceed from myself,—have sent myself,—and I and I are one. Nor can sound reason admit any other interpretation of these, and such like expressions, than that which owns Jesus Christ as a person distinct from the Father, though he be the same God. Again, it is no less certain, that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father, and is sent by the Father as well as the Son, but distinct from the Son, since it is no where said that he is the Son, or begotten. He is equally named with them in the form of baptism,—'Go, &c. and baptize them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost : '—he is therefore a third Person, but the same God.

Between the system of Sabellianism, and what is termed the indwelling scheme, there appears to be a considerable resemblance, if it be not precisely the same, differently explained. The indwelling scheme is chiefly founded on that passage in the New Testament, where the Apostle, speaking of Christ, says,—'In him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily.' Dr. Watts, towards the close of his life, became a Sabellian, and wrote several pieces in its defence. His sentiments on the Trinity appear to have been, that 'the Godhead, the Deity itself, personally distinguished as the Father, was united to the man Christ Jesus, in consequence of which union or indwelling of the Godhead, he became properly God.' Mr. Palmer observes, that Dr. Watts conceived this union to have subsisted before the Saviour's appearance in the flesh, and that the human soul of Christ existed with the Father from before the foundation of the world: on which ground he maintains the real descent of Christ from heaven to earth, and the whole scene of his humiliation, which he thought incompatible with the common opinion concerning him. Dr. Doddridge is supposed to have entertained the same sentiments, and also Mr. Benjamin Fawcett, of Kidderminster, who published a valuable piece, entitled 'Candid Reflections concerning the Doctrine of the Trinity.' Evans's Sketch of the Denominations of the Christian World, pp. 54, 55; Adam's Religious World Displayed, vol. ii. pp. 115—122; Broughton's Historical Dictionary, vol. ii. pp. 348, 349.

SACRAMENT is an institution of Christ, in which some material thing is sanctified by the use of some form or words, in and by which federal acts of this religion do pass on both sides; on our's by stipulations, professions, or vows; and on God's by his secret assistances: by these we are also united to the body of Christ, which is the church. There is no word in the Old and New Testament which corresponds to the word Sacrament. It is a Latin word; and agreeably to its derivation it was applied by the early writers of the western church to any ceremony of our holy religion, especially if it were figurative or mystical. But a more confined signification of this word by degrees prevailed, and in that stricter sense it has been always used by the divines of our church. It is observable, that the true idea of sacraments is, that they are federal acts of religion. We, on our part, make certain professions and vows; and, if these be made in sincerity and truth, God promises to afford us his secret assistance in performing the great work of our salvation. It is evident, that ordinances of this high importance must be instituted by the Founder himself of our religion, or by his apostles in his name. Rites and ceremonies, for the more convenient and decent celebration of public worship, may be regulated by the church; but federal acts, which imply a signification of the divine will, and a communication of the divine grace, must be authorized by God himself. He only can prescribe the conditions upon which he will bestow his blessings, and point out the channels by which he thinks fit to convey them. This, therefore, is the test by which every pretended sacrament is to be tried; and if it be not found in the New Testament, under the character of an outward and visible sign, accompanied with the conditional promise of an inward spiritual grace, it is to be rejected, as having no claim to the title of a sacrament.

In the primitive ages of Christianity there was no dispute concerning the number of sacraments, properly so called. The Recognitions, which were written at the end of the second century, allow of only two sacraments; and Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Cyril of Jerusalem, Augustine, and Chrysostom, all mention two sacraments, namely, Baptism, and the Lord's Supper, and no more. That Christ, during his ministry, directed those who became his disciples to be baptized, is evident from a variety of passages (John iii. 22—26.; iv. 1.) in the Gospels; and after his resurrection he commanded his Apostles to 'go and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost;' and he added, 'Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world.' (Matt. xxviii. 20.) As by baptism, therefore, we enter into the Christian covenant, so by the Lord's Supper we profess our continuance in it. That our Saviour, the night before his crucifixion, instituted the Lord's Supper, we have the testimony of the first three Evangelists. (Matt. xxvi. Mark xiv. Luke xxii.)

Peter Lombard, a writer of the twelfth century, is the first that reckons seven sacraments, adding to the above two, these five, Confirmation, Penance, Orders, Matrimony, and Extreme Unction. Pope Eugenius IV. about the middle of the fifteenth century, pronounced, that these five, as well as the other two, ought to be considered as sacraments. In the following century, all seven were declared to be equally sacraments by the Council of Trent; and from that time they have always been acknowledged as such by the Church of Rome. It is, however, evident, that they are not to be reckoned sacraments, in the strict and proper sense of the word; they were not instituted as such by Christ or his apostles, nor were they known by that name in the primitive age in the church. Confirmation and Orders we allow to be holy functions derived from the apostles, though they want the essential qualities of a Sacrament. Penance, as practised by Papists, is a corruption of a part of ancient ecclesiastical discipline, and was perverted into its present form of a sacrament, by the management and contrivance of the clergy in the times of darkness and ignorance. Matrimony has no claim whatever to be considered as a Christian Sacrament, since it was not instituted by our Saviour, nor was its original character changed by the Gospel. It is indeed a divine institution, and a state of so much importance to the happiness of mankind, that it is very proper to be solemnized by prayer and other acts of religious worship. And lastly, we entirely reject Extreme Unction, as having no other foundation than that of a symbolical rite, incidentally mentioned in Scripture, as accompanying the miraculous healing of bodily diseases in the apostolic age. Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. ii. pp. 408—433; Burnet's Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles, pp. 332, 333.

SACRIFICE, an offering made to God on his altar, by the hand of a lawful minister. Sacrifice differs from oblation, in this; in a sacrifice there must be a real change or destruction of the thing offered, whereas an oblation is but a simple offering, or a gift. As men have always been under an obligation of acknowledging the supreme dominion of God over them, and over whatever belongs to them, and as there have always been persons who have conscientiously acquitted themselves of this duty, we may affirm, that there have always been sacrifices in the world.

Adam and his sons, Noah and his descendants, Abraham and his posterity, Job and Melchizedek, before the Mosaic law, offered to God real sacrifices. The law did nothing more than ascertain the quality, the number, and other circumstances of sacrifices. Before that, they offered the fruits of the earth, the fat, or the milk of animals; the fleeces of sheep; or the blood, and the flesh of victims. Every one pursued his own acknowledgment, his zeal, or his devotion: but among the Jews, the law appointed what they were to offer, and in what quantities. Before the law, every one was priest and minister of his own sacrifice; at least he was at liberty to choose what priest he pleased should offer his victim. Generally this honour belonged to the most ancient, or head of a family, to princes, or men of the greatest virtue and integrity. But after Moses, this was, among the Jews, confined to the family of Aaron.

It is very probable, that sacrifice was instituted immediately after God had revealed the covenant of grace, by means of the promised 'Seed of the woman,' in his denunciation to the serpent. (Gen. iii. 15.)

That promise was the first stone that was laid toward the erection of this glorious building, the work of Redemption, through Jesus Christ, 'the chief corner stone,' to crown and complete the whole at the consummation of all things. (Ephes. ii. 20.) The next stone laid upon that, was the institution of sacrifice, to be a type or significant emblem of the great atonement, or all-sufficient sacrifice of 'the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the repentant and believing world,' (John i. 29.) thus 'slain for us, from the foundation of the world.' (Rev. xiii. 8.) After God had pronounced sentence on all the offending parties, we are next told, that 'the Lord God made to Adam and his wife coats of skins, and clothed them.' Instead of the slight and imperfect covering they had made for themselves, God now taught them to make one more substantial, to protect them from the inclemency of the weather in their new abode, when excluded from Paradise. These coats are supposed, by the generality of divines, to have been made of the skins of beasts slain in sacrifice, by the divine appointment. They could not have been slain for food: because in Paradise man was allowed only to eat of its 'fruits,' and after his expulsion of 'the herb of the field,' the grant of flesh meat was not given till after the deluge, to Noah and his family. (Gen. ix. 3.) For it, therefore, no other reasonable cause can be assigned. What temptation could have induced our first parents to shed the blood of unoffending animals? a deed so revolting to their feelings and their reason; to which nothing short of a divine injunction would naturally have compelled them. In animal sacrifices, the blood, in which is the principle of life, was devoted to God, as an atonement for the forfeited life of the sacrificer. (Lev. xvii. 11.) But this symbolical atonement could only have been appointed by him with whom are 'the issues of life and death,' God himself, whose sole prerogative it is 'to kill and to make alive, to wound and to heal.' (Deut. xxxii. 39.) The death of the victim was also wisely appointed to be a mournful presage to our first parents, as often as they were required to sacrifice, of that death which they had incurred by their transgression, and to be inflicted on themselves, they knew not how soon. Sacrifice, therefore, furnished a useful memento of their own death.

Dr. Spencer observes, that 'sacrifices were looked upon as gifts, and that the general opinion was, that gifts would have the same effect with God as with man; would appease wrath, conciliate favour with the Deity, and testify the gratitude and affection of the sacrificer; and that from this principle proceeded expiatory, precatory, and eucharistical offerings. This is all that is pretended from natural light to countenance this practice. But, how well soever the comparison may be thought to hold between sacrifices and gifts, yet the opinion that sacrifices would prevail with God must proceed from an observation that gifts had prevailed with men; an observation this, which Cain and Abel had little opportunity of making. And if the coats of skins which God directed Adam to make were the remains of sacrifices, surely Adam could not sacrifice from this observation, when there were no subjects in the world upon which he could make these observations.'

The great objection to the Divine origin of sacrifices is drawn from the Scriptures themselves, particularly the following: 'I spake not to your fathers, nor commanded them, at the time that I brought them out of Egypt, concerning the matters of burnt-offerings or sacrifices; but only this very thing commanded I them, saying, Obey my voice, and I will be your God, and ye shall be my people.' (Jer. vii. 22, 23.) Dr. Kenicott explains this passage by referring to the transaction at Marah, (Exod. xv. 23—26.) at which time God spake nothing concerning sacrifices. It certainly cannot be intended to contradict the whole Book of Leviticus, which is full of such appointments. Bishop Lowth, to account for the above, and other similar passages, observes, 'The Jews were diligent in performing the external services of religion; in offering prayers, incense, sacrifices, oblations: but these prayers were not offered with faith; and their oblations were made more frequently to their idols than to the God of their fathers. The Hebrew idiom excludes with a general negative, in a comparative sense, one of two objects opposed to one another, thus: "I will have mercy and not sacrifice." (Hosea vi. 6.) "For I spake not to your fathers, nor commanded them, concerning burnt-offerings or sacrifices; but this thing I commanded them, saying, Obey my voice." ' Dr. Doddridge remarks, that, according to the genius of the Hebrew language, one thing seems to be forbidden, and another commanded, when the meaning only is, that the latter is greatly to be preferred to the former. The text before us is a remarkable instance of this; and many other passages are to be expounded in the same comparative sense. So that the whole may be resolved into the apophthegm of the wise man (Prov. xxi. 3.): 'To do justice and judgment is more acceptable to the Lord than sacrifice.'

The Hebrews had properly only three sorts of sacrifices; 1. The burnt-offering, or holocaust; 2. The sacrifice for sin, or sacrifice of expiation; 3. The pacific sacrifice, or sacrifice of thanksgiving. Besides these were several kinds of offerings, of corn, of meal, of cakes, of wine, of fruits; and one manner of sacrificing, which has no relation to any now mentioned, that is, the setting; at liberty one of the two sparrows offered for the purification of leprous persons (Levit. xiv. 4, 5, 6, 7. 51, 52, 53.); and the scape-goat, which was taken to a distant and steep place, from whence it was thrown (Levit. xvi. 10. 26.): these animals, thus left to themselves, were esteemed as victims of expiation, loaded with the sins of those who offered them.

The holocaust was offered and burnt up, on the altar of burnt-offerings, without any reserve to the person who gave the victim, or to the priest who killed and sacrificed it; only the priest had the skin: for, before the sacrifices were offered to the Lord, the skins were flayed off, and their feet and entrails were washed. (Levit. vii. 8.)

The sacrifice for sin, or for expiation, or the purification of a man who had fallen into any offence against the law, was not entirely consumed on the fire of the altar. No part of it returned to him who had given it, but the sacrificing priest had a share of it. If it were the high-priest who had offended through ignorance, he offered a calf without blemish: he brought it to the door of the tabernacle, put his hand on the head of the sacrifice, confessed his sin, asked pardon for it, killed the calf, &c. (Lev. iv. v.) If it were the whole people which had offended, they were to offer a calf, in like manner. The elders shall bring it to the altar of the tabernacle, shall put their hands upon its head, and confess their offence, &c. If it be a prince of the people, who had offended, he shall offer a goat, shall bring it to the door of the tabernacle, shall put his hands upon its head, and shall confess his sin, &c. It is probable, that though Moses orders a goat, it is to be understood that they might offer a ram. (Lev. vii. 1, 2, 3, 4.; v. 6, 7.) If it be a private person who has committed an offence, he shall offer a sheep, or a she-goat without blemish, shall present it to the priest at the door of the tabernacle, shall put his hands upon the head of the sacrifice. The priest shall sacrifice it, &c. (Lev. iv. v.) But if he is not of ability to offer a sheep, or a she-goat, he shall offer two turtles, or two young pigeons; one for his sin, the other for a burnt-offering. That which is for the burnt-offering shall be entirely consumed on the fire of the altar. That which shall be offered for his sin, shall be presented to the priest, who shall kill it, &c. If the person was extremely poor, he might offer the tenth part of an ephah of meal, that is a little more than a gallon of meal, without oil or spice. He presented it to the priest, who took a handful of it, and threw it on the fire; the rest was for himself. There are some other circumstances belonging to this subject, (Levit. v. 15, 16.; vi. 1, 2, 3.) concerning the faults in which, besides the sin-offering and sacrifice of expiation, there is a kind of amends to be made, or obligation of restitution to the Lord, or to the persons offended, according to the nature of the offence: for as to the rest, the ceremonies were always the same. As to the sacrifice for sin, when a ram was offered, his rump, or tail, was burnt also, which was very fat, along with the rest of the fat. But if it was a goat, the fat only was burnt. (Levit. vii. 2, 3.)

The peace-offering was offered, to return thanks to God for benefits; or to solicit favours from him; or to satisfy private devotion; or, lastly, for the honour of God, only. The Israelites offered this when they pleased, and no law obliged them to it. They were free to present what animals they would, provided they were such as were allowed to be sacrificed. In these sacrifices no distinction was observed, either of age, or sex, of the victim, as was required in the burnt-sacrifices, and the sacrifices for sin. (Levit. iii.) The law only required that the victim should be without blemish. He who presented them came to the door of the tabernacle, put his hand on the head of the victim, and killed it. The priest poured out the blood about the altar of burnt-sacrifices; he burnt on the fire of the altar the fat which is in the lower belly, that which covers the kidneys, the liver, and the bowels. And if it were a lamb, or a ram, he added to it the rump of the animal, which is very fat in that country. Before these things were set in order on the fire of the altar, the priest put them into the hands of the person who provided the victim, then made him lift them up on high, and wave them towards the four quarters of the world, the priest supporting and directing his hands. The breast and the right shoulder of the sacrifices belonged to the priest that performed the service; and it appears that each of them were put into the hands of him who offered them; though Moses mentions only the breast of the animal. After this, all the rest of the sacrifice belonged to him who presented it, and he might eat it with his family and friends, as any other meat. (Levit. viii. 30, 31, &c.)

The sacrifices or offerings of meal or liquors, which were offered for sin, were in favour of the poorer sort, who could not afford sacrifices of oxen, of goats, or of sheep. (Levit. vi. 14, 15, &c.) See OFFERINGS.

The sacrifices of birds were offered on three occasions. See BIRD.

For the sacrifice of the Paschal lamb, see PASSEVER.

The perpetual sacrifice, called in Hebrew thamid: the Lord had appointed, (Exod. xxix. 38, 39, 40. Numb. xxviii. 3.) that they should offer every day two lambs on the altar of burnt-offerings; one in the morning, the other in the evening. They were burnt as holocausts, but by a small fire, that they might continue burning the longer. The lamb of the morning was offered about sun-rise; after the incense was burnt on the golden altar, and before any other sacrifice. That in the evening was offered between the two evenings, that is, at the decline of day, and before night. With each of these victims were offered half a pint of wine, half a pint of the purest oil, and an assaron, or about three pints of the finest flour.

Human Sacrifices. The natural notion common to mankind, that we must offer to God whatever we most value, has prevailed on several nations so far, as to induce them to offer human sacrifices. It is not agreed who first introduced this custom. Philo insinuates that the custom of offering such sacrifices was known in Canaan before Abraham; and some learned men think that the example of these people took off much of that horror Abraham would otherwise have had at the intention of sacrificing his own son. But it is much more probable, that Abraham was the first that attempted to sacrifice his own son; and that his example misunderstood, and ill-applied, gave rise to this custom. Philo does not deny, indeed, that human sacrifices might obtain in Palestine before Abraham's time; but he maintains that this patriarch had no intention to imitate these people, whose manners and idolatry he abhorred. What motives could prompt him to this action? Was it fear, hope, vanity, ostentation, desire of praise, or of riches? Isaac was every thing to him.

Human sacrifices were customary in Palestine, Africa, Gaul, and in almost all parts of the world; it must be owned, too, they were very ancient, and that men really were sacrificed to their false gods. Some learned men have thought that, among the Canaanites and Moabites, they contented themselves with making the children to pass through the flames, or between two fires, which they called lustrare per ignem; and we doubt not but sometimes they did so. But often they really consumed them in the flames. Calmel's Dictionary of the Holy Bible; Kennicott's second Dissertation on the Oblations of Cain and Abel, pp. 153. 201. &c.; Bishop Lowth on Isaiah, xlii. 22. 24.; Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. pp. 23, 24.

SAD'DUCEES, a famous sect among the Jews. It is said that the principles of the Sadducees were derived from Antigonus Sochæus, president of the Sanhedrim, about 250 years B. C., who, rejecting the traditional doctrines of the Scribes, taught that man ought to serve God out of pure love, and not from hope of reward, or fear of punishment: and that they derived their name from Sadoc, one of his followers, who, mistaking or perverting this doctrine, maintained that there was no future state of rewards and punishments. Whatever foundation there may be for this account of the origin of the sect, it is certain that in the time of our Saviour the Sadducees denied the resurrection of the dead (Acts xxiii. 8.), and the existence of angels and spirits, or souls of departed men; though, Mr. Home observes, it is not easy to comprehend how they could at the same time admit the authority of the law of Moses. They carried their ideas of human freedom so far as to assert, that men were absolutely masters of their own actions, and at full liberty to do either good or evil. Josephus even says, that they denied the essential difference between good and evil; and though they believed that God created and preserved the world, they seem to have denied his particular providence. These tenets, which resemble the Epicurean philosophy, led, as might be expected, to great profligacy of life; and we find the licentious wickedness of the Sadducees frequently condemned in the New Testament: yet they professed themselves obliged to observe the Mosaic law, because of the temporal rewards and punishments annexed to such observance; and hence they were always severe in their punishment of any crimes which tended to disturb the public tranquillity.

The Sadducees rejected all tradition, and some authors have contended, that they admitted only the books of Moses; but there seems no ground for that opinion, either in the Scriptures, or in any ancient writer. Even Josephus, who was himself a Pharisee, and took every opportunity of reproaching the Sadducees, does not mention that they rejected any part of the Scriptures; he only says that 'the Pharisees have delivered to the people many institutions as received from the fathers, which are not written in the law of Moses. For this reason, the Sadducees reject these things, asserting that those things are binding which are written, but that the things received by tradition from the fathers are not to be observed.' Besides, it is generally believed that the Sadducees expected the Messiah with great impatience; which seems to imply their belief in the prophecies, though they misinterpreted their meaning. Confining all their hopes to this present world, enjoying its riches, and devoting themselves to its pleasures, they might well be particularly anxious that their lot of life should be cast in the splendid reign of this expected temporal king, with the hope of sharing in his conquests and glory: but this expectation was so contrary to the lowly appearance of our Saviour, that they joined their inveterate enemies, the Pharisees, in persecuting him and his religion. Josephus says, that 'the Sadducees were able to draw over to them the rich only, the people not following them;' and he elsewhere mentions, that 'this sect spread chiefly among the young.' The Sadducees were far less numerous than the Pharisees; but they were, in general, persons of greater opulence and dignity. The council before whom both our Saviour and St. Paul were carried, consisted partly of Pharisees and partly of Sadducees.

It is a question of some difficulty, how the Sadducees could disbelieve the existence of angels, and yet receive the five books of Moses as canonical Scripture, in which are so many narratives of the appearance of angels. Probably their opinion concerning angels was, that they were not permanent beings, but temporary phantoms, formed by the divine power for particular purposes, and again dissipated when these were answered. Jennings's Jewish Antiquities, book i. chap. xi.; Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. i. pp. 255—258.

SAINTS, INVOCATION OF. The Roman Catholics believe that the blessed saints in heaven, replenished with charity, pray for us their fellow-members here on earth; that they rejoice at our conversion; that seeing God, they see and know in him all things suitable to their happy state; that God is inclinable to hear their requests made in our behalf, and for their sakes granteth us many favours; that therefore it is good and profitable to desire their intercession; and that this manner of invocation is no more injurious to Christ our mediator, nor superabundant in itself, than it is for one Christian to beg the prayers and assistance of another in this world. Notwithstanding all this, Catholics are taught not so to rely on the prayers of others, as to neglect their own duty to God; in imploring his divine mercy and goodness; in mortifying the deeds of the flesh; in despising the world; in loving and serving God and their neighbour; in following the footsteps of Christ our Lord, who is 'the way, the truth, and the life.' 'We hold it,' say they, 'to be pious and profitable to apply ourselves to them, in the way of desiring them to pray to God for us; but not so as to address ourselves to them as if they were the authors or disposers of pardon, grace, or salvation, or as if they had any power to help us independently of God's good will and pleasure.'

It is, however, certain, that the practice of invoking saints was not known in the first three centuries, or in the middle of the fourth century; for the invocation of Christ is urged by Athanasius, Cyril, Basil, and other fathers of that time, as an argument for his divinity, because they did not pray to angels or other creatures; and Augustine, who died at the age of seventy-six, in the year 430, says, 'Let not the worship of dead men be any part of our religion; they ought to be so honoured that we may imitate them, but not worshipped.' This passage seems to refer to the invocation of martyrs, which probably began at the end of the fourth century. The primitive Christians commemorated the deaths of the first martyrs every year, on the day on which they suffered; and the invocations of saints probably originated from the orations pronounced upon those occasions; the earliest of which now extant are those of Gregory Nazianzen, who lived towards the end of the fourth century.

In these orations, which were written with all the latitude of declamatory eloquence, there was frequently a sort of rhetorical address to the dead person, who was considered as enjoying happiness in heaven, and a kind of petition to intercede with God in favour of those who were paying that honour to his memory. This was at first ventured upon doubtfully, and always with some such qualification as this:—'If there be any sense or knowledge of what we do below.' These qualifications were gradually omitted; the orators addressed the dead directly, and solicited their assistance without any reserve. In the fifth century, they prayed to God to listen to the intercessions of his saints and martyrs; not long afterwards litanies were appropriated to them; and, at length, by an easy transition, prayers were offered to them in the same manner as to God and Christ. Thus the invocation of saints became an established practice of the Christian church; it was continued through the dark ages; and the council of Trent decreed, that 'all men are to be condemned who do not own that the saints reigning with Christ offer their prayers to God for men; and that it is useful to invoke them to procure their assistance in asking God for blessings through Christ.'

It is sufficiently clear, that there is no foundation whatever for this doctrine in Scripture. We are commanded to offer our prayers to God through Christ alone:—'There is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus.' (1 Tim. ii. 5.)—'Through him we have access to the Father.' (Eph. ii. 18.) No other person is mentioned by whom we can approach the Father; and the silence of Scripture is decisive upon this subject: for we may rest assured, that every necessary direction is given to us relative to the important duty of prayer. The worshipping of angels is forbidden by St. Paul: 'Let no man beguile you of your reward in a voluntary humility, and worshipping of angels,' (Col. ii. 18.); it must therefore be unlawful to worship men, who were 'made lower than the angels.' (Heb. ii. 7.) Several of the apostles and first Christians, particularly St. James the Great and St. Stephen, had suffered martyrdom when the Epistles were written, but no mention is made of offering prayers to them, or through them. Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. ii. pp. 362—365; Nightingale's Por- traiture of the Roman Catholic Religion, pp. 292. 397.

SAL'AH, סלח, Σαλά, signifies mission, sending; otherwise, branches, or dart; according to the Syriac, that spoils, or is spoiled. Salah, the son of Arphaxad, was born in the thirty-fifth year of Arphaxad, and in the year of the world 1693. He begat Eber at thirty years old, and died aged 433 years. (Gen. xi. 12, &c.) A town near Susa, called Sala or Sela, is supposed to be named from him. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. p. 46.

SAL'AMIS, Σαλαμίς, signifies shaken, tost, beaten. Salamis was once a famous city in the isle of Cyprus, opposite to Seleucia, by the Syrian coast. Paul came hither with Barnabas, A. D. 45, and there converted Sergius Paulus. (Acts xiii. 5.) As it was the first place where the Gospel was preached, it was, in the primitive times, made the see of the primate or metropolitan of the whole island. In the reign of the emperor Trajan it was destroyed by the Jews, and rebuilt: but after that, being in the time of Herodius sacked and razed to the ground by the Saracens, it never recovered its former splendour. However, out of its ruins is said to have arisen Famagusta, which was the chief place of the isle when the Turks took it from the Venetians, in the year 1570. Dr. Wells's Geography of the Old and New Testament, vol. ii. p. 242.

SALA'THIEL, סלחיה, signifies I have asked of God, or loan of God. Salathiel was son of Jeconiah, and father of Zerubbabel. (1 Chron. iii. 17.) He died at Babylon during the captivity. Salathiel was also son of Neri, according to St. Luke. (iii. 27.) He descended from Solomon by Rehoboam, according to St. Matthew (i. 12.); and from Solomon by Nathan, according to St. Luke. In Salathiel were united the two branches of this illustrious genealogy; so that Salathiel was son to Jeconiah, according to the flesh, as appears from the Chronicles, which say, that Jeconiah had two sons, Assir and Salathiel, at Babylon. And he might be son of Neri by adoption, or by having married the heiress of Neri's family; or, as proceeding from the widow of Neri, he being dead without children. For in any one of these cases he would pass for the son of Neri according to the law. St. Luke does not tell us in what sense he was son to Neri. Dr. Hales says, that Salathiel must have been the grandson of Neri, by his mother's side.

Dr. Barrett has brought some satisfactory arguments to prove, that the wife of Jeconiah, and the mother of Salathiel, was the celebrated Susanna, the subject of the apocryphal book. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book ii. p. 700, and Note.

SALO'ME, Σαλώμη, signifies peaceable, 899 perfect; or, that rewards. Salome was the name of several Jewish women, and in particular of the daughter of Herodias, or Herod Philip, who is known in Scripture, though not by this name, to have, at the instigation of her mother, asked the head of John the Baptist of her uncle, Herod Antipas, who had promised to give her whatever she would ask. Salome married Herod the tetrarch, her uncle, the son of Herod the Great, and afterwards Aristobulus, the son of Herod king of Chalcis, by whom she had several children.

SALOME, wife of Zebedee, and mother of St. James the Great, and St. John the Evangelist. She was one of those holy women who attended our Saviour in his journeys, and ministered to him. (Matt. xxvii. 56.) She requested of Jesus, that her two sons, James and John, might sit one his right hand and the other on his left hand, when he should possess his kingdom. (Matt. xxvii. 56. Mark xv. 40.) But the Son of God answered her, and her two sons, Ye know not what ye ask: to sit on my right hand and on my left, is not mine to give, but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared of my Father.

Salome gave a great proof of her faith, when she followed Jesus Christ to Calvary, and did not forsake him even at the cross. (Mark xv. 40. Matt. xxvii. 55, 56.) She was also one of those holy women who brought perfumes to embalm him, and who came for this purpose to the sepulchre on Sunday morning early. (Mark xvi. 1, 2.) At the tomb they saw two angels, who informed them that Jesus was risen. Returning to Jerusalem, Jesus appeared to them on the way, and said to them, Be not afraid; go tell my brethren, that they go into Galilee, and there shall they see me. This is what the Scripture informs us of Salome, the mother of the sons of Zebedee.

Some give her the name of Mary Salome; but there is no good proof of her being called Mary.

SALVATION imports, in general, some great deliverance from any evil or danger. Thus God's conducting the Israelites through the Red Sea, and delivering them out of the hands of the Philistines, is called a great salvation. But salvation, by way of eminence, is applied to that wonderful deliverance, which our blessed Saviour procured for mankind, by saving them from the punishment of their sins; and in the New Testament is the same as our redemption by Christ. This is that salvation, referred to by St. Paul, 'How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?' The salvation which Christ purchased, and the Gospel tenders to every creature, comprehends the greatest blessings God can bestow; a deliverance from the most dreadful evils that mankind can suffer. It contains all that can make the nature of man perfect, or his life happy; and secures him from whatever can render his condition miserable. The blessings of it are inexpressible, and beyond imagination. 'Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive the things which God hath prepared for them that love him.' For, to be saved, as Christ saved the world, is to have all our innumerable sins and transgressions forgiven and blotted out; all those heavy loads of guilt, which oppressed our souls, perfectly removed from our minds. It is to be reconciled to God, and restored to his favour; so that he will be no longer angry, terrible, and revengeful; but a most kind, compassionate, and tender-hearted father. It is to be at peace with him, and with our consciences; to have a title to his peculiar love, care, and protection, all our days to be rescued from the bondage and dominion of sin, and the tyranny of the devil. It is to be translated from the power of darkness into the kingdom of our dear Lord; so that sin shall reign no longer in our mortal bodies, but we shall serve God in newness of spirit. It is to be placed in a state of true freedom and liberty, to be no longer under the control of blind passions, and hurried on by our impetuous lusts, to do what our reason condemns. It is to have a new principle of life infused in our souls, by which we shall be enabled to live up to the perfection of our nature, and in some degree partake of the divine. It is to have the Holy Spirit lodged in our hearts, whose comfortable influence will ever cheer and refresh us, and by whose wise counsels we shall be always advised, directed, and governed. It is to be transformed into the image of God; to be like him in wisdom, righteousness, and all other perfections, of which man's nature is capable.

To be saved as Christ came to save mankind, is to be delivered from the wrath to come, and from that dreadful vengeance which shall one day be inflicted on the whole world; when the heaven shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall be burnt up with fervent heat, the earth also, and the works that are in it, shall be burnt up. To be saved as Christ came to save the world, is to be translated, after this life is ended, into a state of eternal felicity; never more to die or suffer the uneasiness and infirmities of an earthly body; never more to know pain and sickness, grief and sorrow, labour and weariness, disquiet or vexation; but to live in perfect ease and peace, freedom and liberty; and to enjoy ourselves and the greatest good, after the most perfect manner for ever. It is to have our bodies, that sleep in the dust, raised again and re-united to our souls; and to be no longer gross, earthly, corruptible bodies, but spiritual, heavenly, immortal ones; fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body, in which he now sits at the right hand of God. It is to live in the city of the great King, the heavenly Jerusalem, where the glory of the Lord fills the place with perpetual light and bliss. It is to spend an eternity in the most noble and agreeable employments; in viewing and contemplating the wonderful works of God, admiring the wisdom of his providence, adoring his infinite love to the sons of men, reflecting on our own inexpressible happiness, and singing everlasting hymns of praise, joy, and triumph, to God and our Lord Jesus Christ, for vouchsafing all these blessings. It is to dwell for ever in a place, where no objects of pity or compassion, of anger or envy, of hatred or distrust, are to be found; but where all will increase the happiness of each other, by mutual love and kindness. It is to converse with the most delightful company, to be restored to the society of our dear friends and relations, who died in the faith of Christ. Lastly, it is to be with Jesus Christ, to behold his glory, to live for ever in seeing and enjoying the great God, in whose presence is fulness of joy, and at whose right hand are pleasures for evermore. This is the salvation that Christ hath purchased for us; this the salvation his Gospel offers to all mankind.

When the Lord only requires us, to do justice, love mercy, and walk humbly with our God, which is our case; what excuse can be made for those who will neglect a salvation that may be so easily attained? Certain it is, that the terms of our future happiness, as proposed by our Saviour, are in themselves most agreeable to the make and frame of our nature, highly conducive to the improvement and perfection of our faculties, and very necessary even to our temporal felicity, if there had been no promise annexed to them, of an eternal reward. And can we then think it severe treatment, to have all the glories of heaven offered us, upon such conditions as these; namely, that we live up to the dignity of our nature, and endeavour to make our abode here as happy as we can, by the practice of virtue and righteousness? These are the terms of salvation offered by the Gospel to mankind. The sensual and careless will be apt to take refuge, and say, What though heaven be a glorious place, and however easy and reasonable the course of life leading to it is represented, yet we find, by our own experience, that it is very hard for flesh and blood to live in so regular and exact a manner. The temptations to sin are every where so many and powerful, and our own strength to resist them so little and inconsiderable, that we know not how to undertake such an affair. But, alas! how vain are these pretences and suggestions; as if we had no supports against these discouragements, and as if the work of our salvation was left entirely to our own strength. If we only apply to our blessed Saviour for his gracious aid and assistance, were the difficulties with which we have to contend much more considerable than they are, yet they deserve not to be named, being so exceedingly overbalanced by those divine powers and aids, with which God will supply us, if we seriously engage in this work. Christ Jesus hath not only purchased a kingdom for us, and instructed us in the way to it; but he hath procured the Holy Spirit to be our continual assistant and guide thither. He hath not only given us a most excellent and glorious example, and bid us follow him; but he hath sent the Holy Ghost, as his vicegerent on earth, to conduct us to the blessed place where he is. We have the grace of God always ready, if we seriously pray for it, to strengthen our weakness, to assist our endeavours, to enlighten our minds, to fortify our wills, to excite our affections, to support us under all temptations; provided we are honest and sincere in the prosecution of that glorious warfare to which we are called. Warner's System of Divinity and Morality, vol. i. pp. 383—395.

SAMARIA, שַׁמְרֹן, Σαμαρῶν, Heb. Shomeron, signifies keepings; or otherwise, a diamond, or brambles, or thorns, or his dregs. Samaria was the capital city of the kingdom of Samaria, that is, of the ten tribes. It was built by Omri, king of Israel, who began to reign in the year of the world 3079, and died in 3086. (1 Kings xvi. 24.) He bought the hill Samaria of Shemer, or Shomeron, for two talents of silver, or £684. It took the name of Samaria from Shemer: though some think there were already some beginnings of a city, because, before the reign of Omri, mention is made of Samaria, (1 Kings xiii. 32.) in the year of the world 3030, and consequently forty-nine years before the reign of Omri. Others take this for a prolepsis, or an anticipation in the discourse of the man of God, who speaks of Samaria under the reign of Jeroboam.

However, Samaria was not considerable, and did not become the capital city of the kingdom of Israel, until after the reign of Omri. Before him the kings of Israel dwelt at Shechem, or at Tirzah. Samaria was built on an agreeable and fruitful hill, in an advantageous situation, twelve miles from Dothaim, twelve from Merrom, and four from Atharoth. Josephus says, it was a day's journey from Jerusalem. Besides, though built on an eminence, yet it must have had water in abundance; since we find medals struck in this city, whereon is represented the goddess Astarte, at whose feet is a river. Josephus observes, that when it was taken by John Hyrcanus, the prince of the Jews, he entirely demolished it, and caused even the brook to flow over its ruins, to obliterate all traces of it.

The kings of Samaria omitted nothing to render this city the strongest, the finest, and the richest, possible. Ahab built here a palace of ivory, that is, in which were many ornaments of ivory. (1 Kings xxii. 39.) Amos (iii. 15.; iv. 1, 2.) describes Samaria under Jeroboam II. as a city sunk into all excesses of luxury and effeminacy: 'I will smite (says he) the winter-house with the summer-house, and the houses of ivory shall perish, and the great houses shall have an end, saith the Lord. Hear this word, ye king of Bashan, that are in the mountain of Samaria, which oppress the poor, which crush the needy; which say to their masters, Bring, and let us drink, &c.'

Ben-hadad, king of Syria, built public places or streets in Samaria, probably for traffic where his people dwelt, to promote trade. (1 Kings xx. 34.) His son, Ben-hadad, besieged this place, under the reign of Ahab, in the year of the world 3103, but was defeated by a handful of young men. What is very remarkable, and yet very common, is, that the king of Syria's flatterers would ascribe the shame of their defeat, not to the pride and drunkenness of their king, but to the interposition of the gods of the Jews; 'their gods are gods of the hills, say they, therefore they were stronger than we; but let us fight against them in the plain, and surely we shall be stronger than they.' The following year Ben-hadad brought an army into the field, probably with design to march against Samaria; but his army was again destroyed. (1 Kings xx. 26, 27.) Some years after this, (2 Kings vi. 24.; vii. 1, 2, 3, 4.) in the year of the world 3119, Ben-hadad came again before Samaria, and reduced it to such necessities by famine, that a mother was forced to eat her own child; but the city was relieved by a sensible effect of divine Providence. It was besieged by Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, in the ninth year of Hoshea, king of Israel, which was the fourth of Hezekiah, king of Judah, in the year of the world 3280. It was taken three years after, in the year of the world 3283. (2 Kings xvii. 6, 7, &c.) The prophet Hosea (x. 4, 8, 9.; xiv. 1.) speaks of the cruelties exercised by Shalmaneser; and Micah says, (i. 6.) this city was reduced to a heap of stones. The Cuthites sent by Esarhaddon to inhabit the country of Samaria, did not think it worth their while to repair the ruins of this city; they dwelt at Shechem, which they made their capital. They were on this footing, when Alexander the Great came into Phœnicia and Judea.

However, the Cuthites had rebuilt some part of Samaria, from the time of the return from the captivity, since Ezra speaks of the inhabitants of Samaria. (Ezra iv. 17. Nehem. iv. 2.) The Samaritans, being jealous of the favours Alexander the Great conferred on the Jews, revolted from him while he was in Egypt, and burnt alive Andromachus, whom he had left governor.

Alexander took Samaria, and settled Macedonians to inhabit it, giving the country around it to the Jews; and, to encourage them to cultivate it, he granted them an exemption from tribute. The kings of Egypt and Syria, who succeeded Alexander, deprived them of this country.

But Alexander Balas, king of Syria, restored to Jonathan Maccabæus, the cities of Lydda, Ephrem, and Ramatha, which he separated from the country of Samaria. And the Jews resumed the full possession of it under John Hyrcanus, who took Samaria, and ruined it, according to Josephus, so that he made the river run through its ruins. It continued in this condition to the year of the world 3947, when Aulus Gabinius, pro-consul of Syria, rebuilt it, and named it Gabiniana. But it was very inconsiderable, till Herod the Great restored it to its ancient lustre, and gave it the Greek name of Sebaste (in Latin, Augusta,) in honour of the emperor Augustus, who had given him the propriety of this place.

The New Testament speaks but little of Samaria; and when it does mention it, it is rather in favour of the country round about it, than of the city. When it is said, (Luke xvii. 11. John iv. 4.) 'He passed through the midst of Samaria,' the meaning is, through the midst of the country about Samaria. And again, 'Then cometh he to a city of Samaria which is called Sychar.' Here Jesus had a conversation with a woman of Samaria, that is, with a Samaritan woman of the city of Sychar. After the death of Stephen, when the disciples were dispersed through the cities of Judea and Samaria, Philip the deacon withdrew into the city of Samaria, where he made converts. (Acts viii. 1, 2, 3.) When the apostles heard that this city had received the word of God, they sent Peter and John thither to communicate the Holy Ghost. Here Simon Magus offered money to the apostles, in hopes of buying this power of communicating the Holy Ghost. Samaria is never called Sebaste in the New Testament, though strangers hardly knew it by any other name. Jerome says, it was thought Obadiah was buried at Samaria. They also showed there the tombs of Elisha and St. John the Baptist. There are many ancient medals struck at Sebaste or Samaria.

SAMARITANS, שַׁמְרִי, people of Samaria. We have spoken of the Samaritans under the title Cuthites. The Samaritans are the inhabitants of the city of Samaria, and of that province of which Samaria was the capital. In this sense it should seem that we might give the name of Samaritans to the Israelites of the ten tribes, who lived in the city and territory of Samaria. However, the sacred authors commonly give the name of Samaritans only to those stranger people, the Cuthites, whom the kings of Assyria sent from beyond the Euphrates, to people the kingdom of Samaria, when they carried captive the Israelites who inhabited there before. Thus we may fix the epoch of the Samaritans, at the taking of Samaria, by Shalmaneser, in the year of the world 3283.

After Shalmaneser, Esar-haddon, being informed that the people sent to Samaria were infested by lions, which he imputed to their ignorance of the manner of worshipping the god of the country, sent a priest of the God of Israel to teach them the rites of the Hebrews. They thought they might blend this religion with that which they professed before; so they continued to worship their idols in conjunction with the God of Israel; not perceiving how incompatible these two religions were.

It is not known how long they continued in this state; but at the return from the captivity of Babylon, it appears they had quitted the worship of the idols; and when they asked permission of the Israelites to help them in rebuilding the temple of Jerusalem, they affirmed, that from the time that Esar-haddon had brought them into this country, they had always worshipped the Lord. (Esra iv. 1, 2, 3.) And, indeed, after the return from the captivity, the Scripture does not reproach them with idolatrous worship, though it does not dissemble either their jealousy against the Jews, or the ill offices they did them at the court of Persia, by their calumnies, or the stratagems they contrived to hinder the repairing of the walls of Jerusalem. (Nehem. ii. 10, 19.; iv. 2, 7, &c.; vi. 1, 2, &c.)

It does not appear that there was any temple in Samaria, common to all those people who came from beyond the Euphrates, before the coming of Alexander the Great into Judea. But every one had been left to his own discretion, and worshipped where he thought fit. They presently comprehended from the books of Moses, which they had in their hands, and from the example of the Jews their neighbours, that God was to be worshipped in that place only which he had chosen. Therefore, since they could not go to the temple of Jerusalem, from which the Jews forbade them, they thought of building a temple of their own upon Mount Gerizim, near Shechem, then their capital. Therefore Sanballat, governor of the Samaritans, applied to Alexander, and told him he had a son-in-law, called Manasses, son to Jaddus the high-priest of the Jews, who had retired to Samaria with many other persons of his own nation; that he desired to build a temple in his province, where he might exercise the high-priesthood; that this would be advantageous to the king's affairs, because by this means the nation of the Jews, who were a turbulent and seditious people, would be divided, and by such a division would be made weaker, &c. Alexander readily consented to Sanballat, and the Samaritans presently began building the temple of Gerizim, which from that time they have always frequented, and still frequent, as the place where the Lord intended to receive the adoration of his people. Of this mountain, and of this temple, the Samaritan woman of Sychar said to our Saviour, (John iv. 20.) 'Our fathers worshipped in this mountain, and ye say, that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship.' See GERIZIM.

The Samaritans revolted from Alexander the very next year: Alexander drove them out of Samaria, put Macedonians in their room, and gave the province of Samaria to the Jews. This contributed not a little to increase the hatred and animosity between these two people. When any Israelite had deserved punishment for the violation of some important point of the law, he presently took refuge in Samaria or Shechem, and embraced the worship at the temple of Gerizim. When the Jews' affairs were prosperous, the Samaritans did not fail to call themselves Hebrews, and of the race of Abraham. But were the Jews in discredit or persecution, the Samaritans immediately disowned them, and acknowledged themselves to be Phœnicians, originally, or descended from Joseph, and Manasseh his son. This was their practice in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes.

The Samaritans having received the Pentateuch, or the five books of Moses, from the priest sent by Esar-haddon, have preserved it to this day, in the same language and character as it was then, that is, in the old Hebrew or Phœnician character; which we call the Samaritan, to distinguish it from the modern Hebrew character, now used in the books of the Jews, which it is wrong to call the Hebrew character; for that can be said properly only of the Samaritan text. Critics have noticed some variations between the Pentateuch of the Jews and that of the Samaritans; but these chiefly regard the word Gerizim, which the Samaritans seem to have introduced, to favour their pretensions, that Mount Gerizim was the place in which the Lord was to be adored. The other various readings are of small importance.

The religion of this people was at first Pagan. Each worshipped the deity he had been used to in his own country. (2 Kings xvii. 25.) The Babylonians worshipped Succoth-benoth, the Cuthites, Nergal; the Hamathites, Ashima; the Avites, Nibhaz, and Tartak; the Sepharvites, Adrammelech, and Anammelech. If we would enumerate all the names of false gods, to whom the Samaritans paid a sacrilegious worship, we should have enough to do. This matter is sufficiently perplexed, on account of the different names by which they were adored among different nations, insomuch that it would be almost impossible to clear up this affair. Afterwards, to this profane worship the Samaritans added that of the Lord, the God of Israel. (2 Kings xvii. 29, 30, 31, 32.) They gave proof of their little regard to this worship, when under Antiochus Epiphanes. They consecrated their temple at Gerizim to Jupiter Argivus. In the time of Alexander the Great, they celebrated the sabbatical year, and consequently the year of Jubilee also: but we do not know whether they did it at the same time as the Jews. Under the kings of Syria they followed the epoch of the Greeks, or that of the Seleucidæ, as other people did who were under the government of the Seleucidæ. After Herod had re-established Samaria, and had given it the name of Sebaste, the inhabitants of this city, in their medals, and public acts, took the date of this new establishment. But these inhabitants of Samaria, of which the greater part were Pagans or Jews, were no rule to the other Samaritans, who, probably, reckoned their years according to the reigns of the emperors they were subject to, till they fell under the jurisdiction of the Mahometans, under which they live at this day; and they reckon their year by the Hegira, or, as they speak, according to the reign of Ishmael, or the Ishmaelites.

As to their belief, it is objected to them that they receive only the Pentateuch, and reject all the other books of Scripture, especially the prophets, who have more expressly declared the coming of the Messiah. However, they say, in their letter to Ludolph, that they admit the book of Joshua; but, probably, by this name they mean their own Chronicon.

The Samaritan woman, (John iv. 25.) is sufficient testimony that the Samaritans expected a Messiah, who, they hoped, would dissipate all doubts. Several of the inhabitants of Shechem believed at the preaching of Jesus Christ, and many of Samaria believed at that of St. Philip.

Towards the close of the Jewish polity, the Samaritans suffered much from the Romans; and though they received a little favourable treatment from one or two of the pagan emperors, yet they suffered considerably under some of the professing Christian emperors, especially Valentinian and Justinian. At present, the Samaritans are very much reduced in point of numbers. Their principal residence is at Sicheim or Shechem, now called Napolose or Naplouse. In 1823, there were between twenty and thirty houses, and about sixty males paid the capitation tax to the Mahometan government. They celebrated divine service every Saturday. Formerly they went four times a year to the temple upon Mount Gerizim; and on these occasions they ascended before sun-rise, and read the law till noon; but of late years, they have not been allowed to do this. The Samaritans have one school at Napolose, where their language is taught. The head of this sect is stated to reside at Paris. The Samaritans at Napolose are in possession of a very ancient manuscript, which they assert to be 3500 years old; but they reject the vowel points as a rabbinical invention. Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 377.

SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH. This is the five books of Moses written in Samaritan characters, or the Hebrew characters used before the captivity of Babylon. Copies of the Samaritan Pentateuch were unknown in Europe till the sixteenth century. Archbishop Usher was the first, or at least one of the first, that procured it out of the East. This learned man having observed that Eusebius of Cæsarea, Diodorus of Tarsus, Jerome, Cyril of Alexandria, Procopius of Gaza, Georgius Syncellus, and others, had quoted the Samaritan Pentateuch, he could not rest till he had procured five or six copies out of Syria or Palestine.

Pietro della Valle bought a very neat copy at Damascus, A.D. 1616, for M. de Sanci, then ambassador of France to Constantinople, and afterwards bishop of St. Maloes. This book was presented to the fathers of the Oratory, Rue St. Honoré, where it is preserved. From this copy Father Morinus printed the Samaritan Pentateuch in 1732, which is in M. le Jay's Polyglot, which was the first printed copy. It has been since printed more correctly in Walton's Polyglot, from three Samaritan manuscripts that belonged to Usher. A neat edition of this Pentateuch in Hebrew characters was published by Dr. Blayney in 1790.

The generality of divines believe that the Samaritan Pentateuch, and that of the Jews, are but one and the same work, written in the same language, but in different characters; and that the differences between them proceed only from the inadvertency or inaccuracy of copiers, or from the affectation of the Samaritans, who have added some things favourable to their own interests and pretensions; that the additions were inserted afterwards, but that, originally, these two copies were the same. According to this opinion, it must be allowed that the Pentateuch of the Jews is preferable to that of the Samaritans, as being exempt from the alterations made in the latter. But, on the contrary, others prefer the Samaritan Pentateuch, as an original, preserved in the same character, and the same condition, in which Moses composed it.

As to the variations, the additions, and transpositions, found in the Samaritan Pentateuch, when compared with the Hebrew, they are all carefully collected, with the utmost exactness, in the book written by Hottinger against Father Morinus, and in the confronting of the two texts, which is inserted in the last volume of the English Polyglot, or by inspecting Kennicott's edition on the Hebrew Bible, where the various readings are inserted. Of these interpolations, some are for the better understanding of the text; some are a kind of paraphrase, expressing at length, what was only hinted at in the original: some are such changes as the Samaritans have purposely made, to favour their pretensions against the Jews; as when, for example, they put Gerizim instead of Ebal. Other variations are only pure lapses of transcribers.

Beside the Hebrew Pentateuch in Phœnician characters, of which we have been speaking, the Samaritans have another in the language which they spoke at the time when Manasseh took shelter among them. This language is a mixture of the Chaldaic, the Syrian, and the Hebrew, or Phœnician. It is called the Samaritan version, which differs from the Jewish paraphrases, they being glosses and explications; whereas, the Samaritan version is literal, and expresses the text word for word: it is printed with the Samaritan text in the Polyglot of Paris, and also in that of London; and because of its great conformity with the text, they have given only one Latin version for both. Calmel's Dictionary.

SAMOS, Σάμος, signifies sand. Samos is an island in the Archipelago, on the coast of Asia Minor. The Romans wrote to the governor of Samos, in favour of the Jews, in the time of Simon Maccabæus, in the year of the world 3865. (1 Macc. xv. 23.) St. Paul went ashore in the same island, as he went to Jerusalem, A.D. 58. (Acts xx. 15.)

SAMOTHRACIA, Σαμοθράκη, an island so called because it was peopled by Samians and Thracians. (Acts xvi. 11.) It is an island in the Ægean Sea. St. Paul, departing from Troas for Macedonia, arrived first at Samothracia, and then landed in Macedonia. (Acts xvi. 12.)

SAM/SON, שמשון, signifies his sun; according to the Syriac, his service, or his ministry. Samson, son of Manoah, of the tribe of Dan, and of a mother whose name we do not find in Scripture, (Judg. xiii. 2, 3, 4, &c.) was born in the year of the world 2848. This woman had been long barren, and an angel of the Lord appeared to her, telling her she should have a son; but she must take care not to drink intoxicating liquor, or to eat any impure food: that she must take the same care with regard to her son, and must consecrate him to God from his infancy, as a Nazarite, and not let a razor come upon his head; For, says the angel, he shall begin to deliver Israel from the hands of the Philistines. Samson was born the year following, that is, in the year of the world 2848 ; and the Spirit of God gave him extraordinary strength of body. One day, as Samson went to Timnath, a city of the Philistines, he saw a young woman, whom he desired his father and mother to obtain for his wife. They remonstrated that she was not of their own nation, but he persevered ; and the young woman was agreed to be given in marriage to Samson.

As he was going to Timnath, Samson saw a young lion, which he seized and tore in pieces, as if he had been a kid. Some time after, returning thither, to celebrate his marriage there, he went to see the carcase of the lion. He found it dried up, and a swarm of bees lodged in it, which had there formed an honey-comb. When his wedding-feast was kept at Timnath, the inhabitants provided thirty young men for Samson to do him honour. Samson proposed to these companions a riddle, to this effect : ' out of the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong came forth sweetness.' They continued to the seventh day conjecturing the meaning of his riddle. Then, partly by threats, and partly by entreaties, they urged the bride to get the secret from her husband, which she told again to them. Before sunset they came to Samson, saying, ' What is sweeter than honey, and what is stronger than a lion?' He told them that if they had not ploughed with his heifer, they could never have expounded his riddle ; intimating, that they had abused him in their too great familiarity with his wife, and that she had been unfaithful to him. He paid the fine expected on account of the riddle, but left his wife, and returned to his father. Some time after, the woman married the bride-man of Samson at his wedding. Samson's anger being subsided, he returned to see his wife, bringing a kid with him. But her father would not let him go in, saying, I thought you had hated her, and therefore I have given her to another. Samson then went and caught three hundred foxes, or rather jackalls, which he tied tail to tail, and each pair had a fire-brand between. He set fire to the fire-brands, and turned them into the corn fields of the Philistines ; and the flame made a great havoc, not sparing even the vines and the olive trees. When the Philistines knew it was Samson who had done this, to revenge the affront received from his father-in-law at Timnath, they burned that man and his daughter. See Fox.

Samson slew a great number of the Philistines. The expression in our translation is, ' that he smote them hip and thigh with a great slaughter.' Hip under thigh, say some ; leg under thigh, say others ; or leg against thigh, or leg over, or upon thigh, as the words literally express ; horse and foot, say some ; that is the foot trusting to their legs are alluded to as leg men ; the horse-men sitting on their thighs, are alluded to as thigh men. A late writer observes, that certain travellers have mentioned a comical sort of wrestling among the Turks, in which the combatants challenge each other by clapping the palms of their hands first upon their own knees or thighs, then upon each other, and afterwards upon the palms of their respective antagonists ; that they both at once slap their hands on their thighs, and then clap together, and then lift them up as high as their shoulders, and cause the palms of their hands to meet, and with the same dash their heads one against another three times, so hard, that many times the blood runs down ; and that they will often come within five or six yards of each other, and clap their hands to each other, and then put forward the left leg, bowing their body, and leaning with the left elbow on the left knee, and after looking at one another for some time, the contest begins. This writer is of opinion that these challengers well deserve the name of leg-and-thigh-men ; or shoulder-and-thigh-men ; and that the Philistines assembled their best wrestlers and most notorious combatants, to engage Samson. Hence he renders the passage as follows : ' he smote the hip-and-thigh-men ; or, the arm-and-leg-men ; or the hip-and-shoulder-men ; that is, their best prize-fighters, with a great stroke.'

After this exploit Samson retired into the cave of Etam, in Judah. When the Philistines knew this, they came in great numbers into the land of Judah, and the people of Judah bound him, and brought him, by his sufferance, to the Philistines. No sooner did they see him thus bound, than they set up loud shouts, and were about to seize him. But the Spirit of the Lord animating Samson, he snapped the cords which bound him, and happening to find the jaw-bone of an ass, he, with this weapon, slew a thousand of the Philistines. Throwing away the jaw-bone, he gave that place the name of Ramath-lehi, that is, the lifting up of the jaw-bone. Being overcome with extreme thirst, and crying to the Lord, the Lord opened a rock which was in that place, called Maktesh, that is, the jaw-tooth, whence water gushed out to assuage his thirst.

After this, Samson went to Gaza, a city of the Philistines, and having there seen a harlot, or a woman who kept a public house, he went to lodge with her. The Philistines set a guard about this house, and another at the gates of the city, to kill him as he went out in the morning. But Samson, rising at midnight, went off, and took away the two gates of the city, and the gate-posts, bar and chain, and carried them up the hill which is near Hebron.

Some time afterwards he fell in love with a woman called Delilah, who dwelt in the valley of Sorek. Many of the ancients thought that Samson had taken her as his wife; but most maintain that she was never married to Samson, but was a public woman. The Philistines bribed this woman to discover in what his extraordinary strength consisted. He amused her for a considerable time, pretending his strength consisted sometimes in one thing, and sometimes in another; and when the Philistines were ready to seize him, he burst his bonds asunder. At last Delilah teased him so much, that he told her his strength lay in his hair, which had never been shorn, because he was a Nazarite from his mother's womb. Delilah then cut off his hair as he lay sleeping in her lap, and the Philistines fell upon him, bound him, and put out his eyes. They took him to Gaza, shut him up in prison, and made him grind at the mill, as a base and contemptible slave. 'Samson,' observes a late writer, 'being blind, yet of great strength, they made him grinder for the prison. Grinding was women's work, therefore severely degrading to the hero; it was simple work, requiring no art; it was laborious work, wherein his great strength was of service; and thus by drudging for them, in this menial employment, he earned a mortifying livelihood for himself. In this view Samson was worse used than Job (xxx. 10.) supposes his wife might be; "let my wife be so degraded, that instead of having her corn ground for her, she shall perform that servile office herself; not for herself, or for me, but let her grind for another." Samson, the hero! employed on women's work! a vilely fit employment for Delilah's deluded lover: he ground too for others! for those in prison with himself!'

It is inquired whether Samson's hair was the natural and physical cause of his strength; or whether it was only the moral cause, and, as it were, the pledge of the assistance of the Holy Spirit, who thought fit to endue him with this prodigious strength, as a permanent quality, so long as he should observe the laws of Nazariteship, and should keep his hair untouched, which was the visible token of it. The preservation of his hair was doubtless a sign of the obedience maintained on his part, and his constant compliance with the divine orders. Whilst his compliance remained unbroken, God's fulfilment of his part, that is, the communication of supernatural strength, continued unbroken also. But when Sampson had, by the loss of his hair, evidently betrayed his trust and forfeited his distinction, God thought proper to suspend his conditional donation, because the condition was broken by Samson; he had lost the visible pledge of it on his part, and had now nothing to show in proof of his obedience; and to allege, as any reason to expect, or to hope, for that reason, that gift should be continued to him. Samson's strength, therefore, was evidently miraculous, and was withdrawn when the Lord forsook him on account of his vices.

Samson continued in Gaza about a year. His hair growing again, and he becoming repentant, God restored him his strength. The princes of the Philistines met in a general assembly, in the temple of their god Dagon, to return him thanks for having delivered to them this their formidable enemy. After they had ended their feast, they ordered Samson to be sent for, that they might make sport with him, and be diverted by him. After they had insulted him as long as they thought fit, he desired the person who led him, to let him lean against the pillars that supported the temple, that he might rest himself. The temple was then full of people, both above and below the galleries. Samson, calling upon the name of the Lord, and laying hold of the two pillars by which the temple was supported, one in his right hand, and the other in his left, he said, Let me also die with the Philistines. Then violently shaking the pillars, the temple fell on the princes and people, and killed about three thousand persons. 'Samson, therefore,' observes a late writer, 'must have been in a court or area below them, and consequently the temple will be of the same kind with the ancient τεμένη, or sacred enclosures, surrounded only in part or altogether with some plain or cloistered buildings.' Samson lived about thirty-eight years; he was judge of Israel about twenty years, from the year of the world 2867 to 2887. (Judges xvi. 20.)

'The case of Samson,' says Dr. Hales, 'furnishes an instructive and awful example, that extraordinary gifts of the Spirit are not always accompanied with corresponding graces, or fruits of the Spirit. Manah and his wife appear to have been a pious couple, and likely to train up their son in the way that he should go, betimes, in the fear and nurture of the Lord; but so early as twenty years of age, against his parents' wishes and remonstrances, he seeks a wife amongst the uncircumcised, (as he himself contemptuously styled the Philistines,) and after his disappointment in her, he spent the rest of his life in the company of strange and lewd women, which must have been a great grief of mind to his parents and friends, who, from their solicitude to inter his dead body, could not have been inattentive to, nor unconcerned at, his conduct when living. But he was stubborn and self-willed, and vain of his prodigious strength, infinitely surpassing any of the Philistine giants or sons of Anak, (Josh. xi. 22.) who prided themselves on their strength and stature.' SAM'UEL, שמואל, signifies placed, or put, of God; otherwise, his name, which he has received of God; otherwise, who is of God. Samuel was son of Elkanah and Hannah, of the tribe of Levi, and of the family of Kohath; he was a prophet and judge of Israel for several years. (1 Sam. i. 1, 2, 3, &c. 1 Chron. vi. 23.) His father dwelt at Ramathaim-zophim, or the city of Ramah, inhabited by Levites of the family of Zophai, or Zuph, a descendant of Kohath.

Elkanah had two wives, Peninnah and Hannah. Peninnah had children, but Hannah was barren. Elkanah loved Hannah tenderly, and was much concerned that she had no children. One day when he went with his family to Shiloh, where the ark of the Lord then was, he there offered peace-offerings, and made an entertainment for his wives and children. Hannah seeing herself alone, while Peninnah was surrounded with a troop of children, began to lament; rising from table, she went to the tabernacle, where she poured out her heart before the Lord, and made a vow, that if God would give her a son, she would dedicate him to his service all his life; that she would make him a Nazarite, and would suffer no razor to come upon his head. Hannah, being returned to Ramah, conceived, and had a son, whom she named Samuel, saying, Because I have asked him of the Lord. When the child was somewhat grown, she brought him to Shiloh, to the house of the Lord, with an offering, &c. See HANNAH.

Young Samuel officiated in the temple, and was clothed with a linen ephod. (1 Sam. ii. 18, 19, 20.) Eli was now become very old, and his eye-sight was so dim that he could hardly see. He had heard of the irregularities of his two sons, Hophni and Phinehas, but had not courage to restrain them, nor power to remove the scandal they caused to Israel. One morning when Samuel was in bed, near the tabernacle of the Lord, he heard a voice, calling him by his name, very early. Samuel, thinking it was Eli, ran to him, and said Here am I. Eli bid him return, and lie down to sleep, for he had not called him. The same thing happened three times. The third time Eli, judging there must be something extraordinary in the matter, sent Samuel back, and said to him, Go and sleep, but if you are called any more, say, Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth. Samuel obeyed; and received a threatening prophecy against Eli and his house. When day was come, Eli called Samuel, and obliged him to discover what the Lord had said. Samuel told him the whole; to which Eli answered, 'It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good.'

After the death of Eli the high-priest, Samuel was acknowledged as judge and governor by all Israel. He insisted on the reformation of the people; and they renounced all their strange gods, and applied themselves wholly to serve the God of their fathers. Afterwards, Samuel convened another assembly at Mizpeh, where all the people met in arms. Samuel prayed for them: they fasted and prayed, poured out water before the Lord; confessed their sins, and Samuel judged them. The Philistines, hearing that Israel was assembled at Mizpeh, took the alarm, and came into the field against them, but were defeated so signally, that for a long time they durst not appear on the frontiers of Israel; but were obliged to restore such cities as they had taken.

Samuel was about forty years of age when he began to judge Israel. He judged them the rest of his life; for under the reign of Saul he preserved a great deal of authority, as well in respect of Saul himself, as of the whole people. He went yearly to Bethel, then to Gilgal, then to Mizpeh; afterwards he returned to his house at Ramah, and so distributed justice to all Israel. He also built an altar at Ramah, as well for his private devotion, as for the religion of the people, who flocked to him from all parts, to consult him, and to have their causes decided. When he grew old, he appointed his sons judges over Israel, and they discharged this office in Beersheba, a city lying on the southern limits of the land of Canaan. But they, instead of walking in the steps of their father, suffered themselves to be corrupted by bribery.

Then the elders of Israel came to Samuel, and said, Set a king over us, as all other nations have, who may judge us. This proposal was not agreeable to Samuel, and he addressed himself to God in prayer. The Lord said to him; Hear the voice of the people, and give them what they ask, for it is not you, but me, they have rejected, that I may not reign over them. But declare to them what they may expect under a king, that they may commit this folly after a full information.

A short time after, Saul the son of Kish, of the tribe of Benjamin, being sent by his father to seek some asses that were strayed, came to advise with Samuel about them; the prophet told him, that God had appointed him king over his people; and he gave Saul the royal unction. See SAUL. After this Samuel held an assembly of the people, at Mizpeh, that they might proceed to elect a king. The lot was cast, and fell upon Saul, the son of Kish. He was sought for immediately, but was not to be found. They ran therefore to where he had hid himself, and brought him forth among the people. Samuel then said, You see the man whom the Lord hath chosen. After this he wrote down the laws and constitutions of this new kingdom, and published them.

A month was scarcely passed after Saul's election, when a war broke out between the Ammonites and the city Jabesh, in Gilead. Saul, with all Israel, marched against the Ammonites, and relieved Jabesh. At their return from this expedition, Samuel said to the people, Let us go to Gilgal, and there confirm the election of the king. They did so; offered peace-offerings, and made great rejoicings. Then Samuel addressed himself to the people and asked them, whether they had any fault to find with his conduct? The people answered, No. Samuel proceeded, and said to them, The Lord is therefore my witness to-day, and so is also the king he has appointed, that you have nothing to reproach me with. To this the people answered, We are witnesses. Samuel then exhorted them to loyalty and to obedience. To this he added, Is it not now wheat-harvest (a season in which rain is very rare in Palestine)? Yet I shall call upon the Lord, and he will send out his thunder, and shower down his rain, that you may know how great an evil it is in the eyes of the Lord, that you have presumed to ask for a king. After this tempest every one returned to his own house.

In the second year after his election, Saul being in arms against the Philistines, stayed at Gilgal six days, expecting Samuel, but seeing he did not come on the seventh day, he had the victims brought to him, and offered a burnt-sacrifice. He had hardly completed his sacrifice, when Samuel came. Saul went out to meet him, and saluted him: Samuel inquired, What have you been doing? Saul replied, that, seeing himself pressed by the Philistines, and almost abandoned by his soldiers, he had offered a burnt-offering. Samuel told him, that he had committed folly. If, says he, you had obeyed the commandment of the Lord, the Lord would have confirmed your kingdom over Israel for ever; but now your reign will not long continue. From thence Samuel went to Gibeah, and Saul followed him.

After this Samuel came to Saul, by order from God, to bid him make war against the Amalekites. Spare none, says he, but destroy all; they are all devoted to the curse of extirpation, both man, woman, and child, even those that suck the breast; even their oxen, camels, sheep, and asses. Saul therefore marched against Amalek, destroyed them, and ravaged the whole country; but he thought fit to preserve the better part of their goods and cattle. Then God said to Samuel, I repent of having made Saul king. Samuel was much afflicted at this, and cried to the Lord all night. The day following he visited Saul at Gilgal, where he was offering a sacrifice of the flocks taken from Amalek. Saul saluted him, and told him he had performed the commands of the Lord. Whence, then, says Samuel, is this lowing of oxen, and bleating of sheep, in my ears? Saul answered him, The people brought away the prime, to offer in sacrifice to the Lord. Samuel upbraided him vehemently with his want of obedience, and Saul threw all the blame on the people.

Then says Saul to Samuel, I have sinned in having had too great complaisance for the people; but come with me, that we may worship the Lord. Samuel refused, and turned hastily away from him to be gone; and Saul taking hold of Samuel's garment, it tore in his hands. On this, Samuel said to him, Thus has the Lord torn the kingdom out of your hands, to give it to another, who is better than you. Saul replied, I confess I have sinned; but, however, do me the credit of appearing with me before the elders of the people, and before all Israel: and let us worship the Lord. Samuel complied, and they returned to the camp at Gilgal. There Samuel caused Agag, king of the Amalekites, whose life had been saved, to be brought out, and Samuel hewed him in pieces, telling him, that as his sword had made many mothers childless, so likewise should his mother be childless among women. Then Samuel returned to Ramah. From this time Samuel saw Saul no more; nevertheless he continually bewailed him.

Some years after this, the Lord said to Samuel, How long will you mourn for Saul? Arise and go to Bethlehem, and give the royal unction to one of the sons of Jesse, whom I have chosen to be king of my people. Samuel answered, How shall I go? Saul will be informed of it, and will put me to death. The Lord said to him, Go thither, as if to sacrifice; invite Jesse to partake of the sacrifice; and there I will show you him whom you are to anoint. Samuel went therefore to Bethlehem, and all the elders of the place came to show their respect to him, and he invited them to the solemnity of the sacrifice. When he went into Jesse's house, all the sons of this venerable old man came to salute him. Samuel, seeing Eliab the eldest, said within himself, Surely this is he whom the Lord has chosen as his anointed. But the Lord answered, Have no regard to a good appearance, or an advantageous stature; for this is not he whom I have chosen. Jesse caused his seven sons, one after another, to pay their respects; but Samuel found God had not chosen either of these. Jesse said he had still a younger son, but he was keeping the sheep. Send for him, says Samuel, for we will not sit down to table till he comes. The eighth son of Jesse was David, who was fetched out of the field; and when he came in, the Lord said to Samuel, Anoint him, for this is he. Samuel poured on his head the oil he had brought with him; and from that time the Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul, and rested on David.

Samuel returned to Ramah, and dwelt there the rest of his life, among the prophets, who lived under his conduct in a kind of community. Several years after, when David was in disgrace with Saul, and had with difficulty escaped out of his hands, he took refuge with Samuel at Ramah. He acquainted him with Saul's behaviour towards him; and they went together to Naioth. Saul had intelligence of this, and sent a party to surprise David. But the messengers finding Samuel, who was then prophesying in the midst of the prophets, they were also seized with the Spirit, and began to prophesy among them; that is, perhaps, finding these prophets at their devotion, they were seized by a spirit of devotion, and united their praises, &c. with those of the prophets. Saul sent a second, and a third, company of messengers, who were seized in like manner. Lastly, he went himself, and was seized with the spirit of devotion, during the time, and prophesied among the rest. This delay gave David an opportunity to escape.

Samuel died at the age of ninety-eight, about two years before Saul, in the year of the world 2947. All Israel mourned for him, and he was buried at his own house at Ramah. (1 Sam. xxv. 1.) The author of Ecclesiasticus has consecrated an eulogy to his memory. (Ecclus. xlv. 13. 17. 20.)

About two years, after the death of Samuel, the Philistines having invaded the territories of Israel with a powerful army, Saul, with his troops, took possession of the eminences of Gilboa. This prince, being in great consternation at the multitude of his enemies, resolved at last to consult some witch or sorceress, to foreknow the event of this war. He was informed of an enchantress at Endor, about two or three leagues from Mount Gilboa. He disguised himself, and visited her with few attendants, that the witch might not know him; because, some years before, he had driven all of her profession out of the country. This woman he desired to raise the ghost of Samuel. She had recourse to her charms and spells, and, when she saw Samuel appear, she made a great cry, and said to Saul, Why have you deceived me, for you are Saul? Saul encouraged her, and asked her, what she saw? I see, says she, gods [elohim, in the sense of a magistrate, or prince, &c.] coming out of the earth. Saul asked her what sort of a man? She said, An old man covered with a mantle. Saul knew it to be Samuel, and bowed himself to the earth. Samuel said, Why have you disturbed me? Saul answered, that being in great straits, and not knowing whom to address, because God gave him no answer, he found himself necessitated to have recourse to him, by magic. Samuel told him, that the Lord would deal with him as he had already predicted, that the kingdom should be taken from him, and given to David his son-in-law; that God would deliver Israel into the hands of their enemies the Philistines. To this he added, To-morrow you shall be with me, you and your sons, and the Lord shall abandon Israel to the Philistines.

Upon this history a question has been moved, that has divided both ancients and moderns, that is, whether the ghost of Samuel did really appear to Saul? or whether this was only a trick of the sorceress, who herself spoke to Saul, and feigned the voice of Samuel? It is asked also, whether this was done by the power of the devil, and by art magic; or, whether God permitted that Samuel should appear, by the miraculous effect of his power? 'Whatever' says Dr. Hales, 'might have been the nature of this woman's art, or her design in undertaking to raise Samuel; whether she meant to impose on Saul by getting some accomplice to personate Samuel, whom she must have often seen, and well known, during his long administration; or whether she expected to raise a dæmoniacal spirit, to give an answer; it is evident from the original, more closely translated and compared throughout with itself, that "Samuel himself," or his spirit, was actually raised immediately, and before the witch had time to utter any incantations, by the power of God, in a glorified form, and wearing the appearance of the ominous mantle, in which was the rent that signified the rending of the kingdom from Saul's family. This opinion is founded on the following reasons: 1. The woman herself was surprised at his unexpected appearance, and immediately concluded that the inquirer could be no other than Saul; for that the venerable prophet would not probably answer any one inferior to the king. 2. Saul acknowledged his reality, when he prostrated himself before him, and declared the cause of his evocation. 3. The very soul of Samuel seems to breathe in the keenness and severity of his reproaches,—“Why hast thou provoked me, to raise me?—And why dost thou enquire of me, since the Lord is departed from thee, and is with thy rival, David?”—whom he now expressly names, as “the neighbour,” meant in his former prophecy, of which this is the terrific sequel; foretelling the impending defeat of his army, and death of himself and his sons in the battle; and their going to join the prophet in Hades, or the region of departed spirits in general. 4. Saul gave the most unequivocal proof of the reality of the denunciation, which none surely but a prophet of the Lord could utter; for he fell down in a swoon, overwhelmed with anguish and despair, when he heard his doom, and the just reward of his sacrilegious impiety; and was with difficulty restored to his senses, and refreshed by the witch and his attendants; who might also have been witnesses of the awful scene. He returned that night to his camp, and on the fated "morrow" rushed on his doom, after he was sore wounded by the Philistine archers, falling on his own sword. 5. 'The reality of Samuel's appearance on this occasion, was the doctrine of the primitive Jewish church.' (Ecclus. xlv. 20.)

To Samuel are ascribed the book of Judges, that of Ruth, and the first book of Samuel. There is, indeed, great probability that he composed the first twenty-four chapters of the first of Samuel, since they contain nothing but what he might have written, and in which he had not a great share. However, in these twenty-four chapters there are some small additions, probably inserted after his death. We read, (1 Chron. ix. 22.) that he assisted in regulating the distribution of the Levites made by David for the service of the temple. This may be explained by saying, that David pursued the order settled by Samuel, during his administration, after the death of the high-priest Eli. We read also, (1 Chron. xxvi. 28.) that Samuel enriched the tabernacle of the Lord, by magnificent presents, and by rich spoils, taken from the enemies of Israel. It is also said, (1 Chron. xxix. 29.) that he wrote the history of David, in conjunction with the prophets Nathan and Gad. Probably, he might write the beginning of his history, and the other prophets might write the conclusion of it; for Samuel was dead before David came to the throne. The first two books of Kings bear the name of the books of Samuel; but it must be allowed that he could not be the author of the second of these books, which contains transactions after his death. Neither could he write the latter end of the first, since his death is mentioned in chap. xxv. It is said (x. 25) in the first book of Samuel, that this prophet wrote in a book the manner of the kingdom, which was the rights, prerogatives, and revenues of the king, and the limits of his power and authority; a repetition of that which he had proposed, vivâ voce, a little before to the people.

Samuel began the chain of the prophets, which was never broken from his time to that of Zechariah and Malachi. 'All the prophets from Samuel, and those that follow after, as many as have spoken, have likewise foretold of these days.' SANBAL/LAT, סנבלט, signifies bush in secret; or, according to the Hebrew and the Syriac, the enemy in secret. Sanballat was chief, or governor, of the Cuthites, or Samaritans; a great enemy to the Jews. He was a native of Horon, or Horonaim, a city beyond Jordan, in the country of Moab. When Nehemiah came from Shushan to Jerusalem, (Nehem. ii. 10. 19.) in the year of the world 3550, and began to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, Sanballat, Tobiah, and Geshem taunted him, and sent to know on what authority he undertook this enterprise, and whether this was not a revolt against the king, &c. But Nehemiah proceeding with vigour in his undertaking, Sanballat was extremely provoked, and said, What are these poor Jews a-doing? Will the people let them go on? Will they finish their work, and dedicate it one day? Will they build with these stones that the fire has destroyed and reduced to dust? Nevertheless, at last, the walls of Jerusalem were completed.

Then Sanballat, Tobiah, and Geshem, sent to Nehemiah, to desire him to meet them in the field, that they might make an alliance and swear inviolable friendship, in the year of the world 3550. But Nehemiah perceived that this was only a stratagem, and declined it. At last Sanballat wrote to him in such terms as these, There is a report spread among the people, and Geshem confidently affirms it, that you and the Jews intend a revolt, &c. Now, as all these things are to be represented to the king, it will be convenient for you to give us a meeting, that we may confer together about them. Sanballat also gained over to his interest a certain false prophet, called Shemaiah, who would have intimidated Nehemiah; but Nehemiah by prudent boldness avoided the snare.

Nehemiah being obliged to return to king Artaxerxes to Shushan, (Nehem. xiii. 6. 28.) in the year of the world 3563, in his absence, the high-priest Eliashib married his grandson Manasseh, the son of Joiada, to a daughter of Sanballat, and he allowed one Tobiah, a kinsman of Sanballat, an apartment in the temple. However, Nehemiah, at his return to Jerusalem, (the exact year of which is not known,) drove Tobiah out of the temple, and would not suffer Manasseh, the high-priest's grandson, to continue in the city, nor to perform the functions of the priesthood. Manasseh, being thus expelled, retired to his father-in-law Sanballat, who provided him the means of exercising his priestly office on Mount Gerizim, on the following occasion.

When Alexander the Great came into Phœnicia, and invested the city of Tyre, Sanballat quitted the interests of Darius, king of Persia, and went at the head of 8,000 men, to offer his service to Alexander. This prince readily entertained him, and gave him leave to erect a temple on Mount Gerizim, where he constituted his son-in-law Manasseh the high-priest. Sanballat must at this time be very old, for one hundred and twenty years before, in the year of the world 3550, he was governor of the Samaritans. Indeed, some have been of opinion, that the Sanballat who lived in the time of Alexander, was different from that Sanballat who so eagerly opposed Nehemiah; but we see no absolute necessity of admitting this. However, Josephus makes Sanballat a Cuthite originally, and makes no mention of him who withstood Nehemiah. The wife of Manasseh he calls by the name of Nicaso, and says, that Sanballat died nine months after he had submitted to Alexander.

Dr. Prideaux rejects the solution of this difficulty, by two Sanballats, and endeavours to reconcile the history to truth and probability, by showing it to be a mistake of Josephus. This author makes Sanballat to flourish in the time of Darius Codomannus, and to build his temple upon Mount Gerizim, by licence from Alexander the Great; whereas it was performed by leave from Darius Nothus, in the fifteenth year of his reign. This takes away the difficulty arising from the great age of Sanballat, and brings him to be contemporary with Nehemiah, as the Scripture history requires. Prideaux's Connection of the Histories of the Old and New Testament, part i. book v. pp. 435—438.

SANCTUARY. By this name was called that part of the temple of Jerusalem, which was the most secret and retired, in which was the ark of the covenant, and where none but the high-priest might enter, and he only once a year, on the day of solemn expiation. The same name was also given to the most sacred part of the tabernacle, set up in the wilderness, which remained till some time after the building of the temple. See TABERNACLE and TEMPLE.

Sometimes the word sanctuary is used generally for the temple or the holy place, the place appointed for the public worship of the Lord. It should seem also, that Moses uses it instead of the Holy Land: 'Thou shalt bring them in, and plant them in the mountain of thine inheritance, in the place, O Lord, which thou hast made for thee to dwell in; in the sanctuary, O Lord, which thy hands have established.' (Exod. xv. 17.) And he also says of those who offer their children to the god Moloch, they 'defile my sanctuary, and profane my holy name.' (Lev. xx. 3.) He forbids the high-priest to go out of the temple, to mourn for his relations (Lev. xxi. 12.): 'Neither shall he go out of the sanctuary, nor profane the sanctuary of his God.' The temple is here denoted by its principal part.

SANDALS, at first were only soles tied to the feet with strings or thongs; afterwards they were covered, and at last they called even shoes sandals. When Judith went to the camp of Holofernes, she put sandals on her feet (Judith x. 4.); and (xvi. 9.) her sandals ravished his eyes. They were a magnificent kind of buskins, proper only to ladies of condition, and such as dressed themselves for admiration. They had generally slaves to carry their sandals. But there were sandals also belonging to men, and of mean value. Jesus Christ allows the use of them to his disciples. (Mark vi. 9.)

We read, (Deut. xxv. 7.) 'If the man like not to take his brother's wife, then let his brother's wife go up to the gate unto the elders, and say, My husband's brother—will not perform the duty of a husband's brother—then shall his brother's wife come unto him, in the presence of the elders, and loose his shoe from off his foot, and spit in his face; and shall say, 'So shall it be done unto that man that will not build up his brother's house. And his name shall be called in Israel, the house of him who hath had his shoe loosed.' A late writer observes, that the word nol, rendered shoe, usually means sandal, that is, a mere sole fastened on the foot in a very simple manner; and that the primary and radical meaning of the word face is surface, the superficies of any thing. Hence he would submit, that the passage may be to the following purpose: the brother's wife shall loose the sandal from off the foot of her husband's brother; and shall spit upon its face or surface [that is, of the shoe] and shall say, &c. This ceremony is coincident with certain customs among the Turks. We are told that in a complaint against her own husband, for withholding himself from her intimacy, the wife when before the judge takes off her own shoe, and spits upon it; but in case of complaint against her husband's brother for refusing to be his locum tenens, and declining her intimacy, she takes off his shoe and spits upon it. Besides, the text does not say—she shall turn up the sole, and spit upon it, (such inversion signifying a very different matter, if Busbequius be correct) but she shall spit upon the face or upper part of it, as affirmation, and evidence, of his refusal 'to build up his brother's house.' It deserves notice that it is not said 'the house of him who had his shoe loosed, and was spit upon'—but the reference is to the loosing of the shoe only. This custom seems to be alluded to, with some variation, in the case of Ruth's kinsman (Ruth iv. 7.); and it seems clearly to have with it the force of an oath 'for to confirm all things.' Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary of the Holy Bible, No. ci. pp. 2, 3.

SANDEMANIANS, a name given in England to the followers of Mr. Robert Sandeman; but in Scotland they are denominated Glassites, from Mr. John Glas, their founder, who was a minister of the established kirk. About the year 1727, Mr. Glas, having offended some of his brethren by certain peculiar notions, both of justifying faith, and of the nature of Christ's kingdom, as being not of this world, was tabled as an offender, before the presbytery of which he was a member, and afterwards prosecuted before the provincial synod of Angus and Mearns; and having been in the course of that prosecution called on by the synod to answer certain queries in April 1728, he gave such answers as were by his judges deemed inconsistent with the standard of the national religion. Being interrogated, 'Is it your opinion, that there is no warrant for a national church under the New Testament?' He answered, 'It is my opinion: for I can see no churches instituted by Christ in the New Testament, beside the universal, but congregational churches. Neither do I see that a nation can be a church, unless it could be made a congregation, as was the nation of Israel,' &c. Being asked, 'Is it your opinion, that a single congregation of believers, with their pastor, are not under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction and authority of superior church judicatures, nor censurable by them, either as to doctrine, worship, or practice?' He answered, 'A congregation, or church of Jesus Christ, with its presbytery, is, in its discipline, subject to no jurisdiction under heaven.'—And being interrogated, 'Do you think yourself obliged, in conscience, to teach and publish these your opinions, differing from the received doctrine of this church, unto the people?'—He answered, 'I think myself obliged, in conscience, to declare every truth of Christ, and keep nothing back; but to speak all the words of this life; and to teach his people to observe all things whatsoever he commands, as far as I can understand: and that, notwithstanding of others differing from me, and my being exposed to hazard in the declaring of them.'

For these and other opinions of a similar nature and tendency, the synod suspended Mr. Glas from the exercise of his office, in April 1728; and in the same year he published 'An Explication of that Proposition,' contained in the foregoing answer, 'A congregation, or church of Jesus Christ, with its presbytery, is, in its discipline, subject to no jurisdiction under heaven.'

Mr. Glas having persisted, not only in the exercise of his office as a minister of Christ, notwithstanding the sentence of suspension, but also in the opinions expressed in his answers above referred to, the synod of Angus and Mearns, after a great deal of previous procedure, by a plurality of votes, but not without protests entered by some of their brethren, in October 1728, 'deposed him from the office of the holy ministry; prohibiting and discharging him to exercise the same, or any part thereof, in all time coming, under the pain of the highest censures of the church.' From this sentence Mr. Glas appealed to the General Assembly of the church of Scotland. That court, after hearing his speech in defence, affirmed the sentence of deposition pronounced by the synod, March 12, 1730.

Mr. Glas, after his deposition, continued the exercise of his ministry, though deprived of his stipend, and not only preached occasionally in most of the principal towns in Scotland at different periods, but erected churches, wherever he found a competent number of persons who adopted and coincided with his opinions. The most numerous of these was the congregation which assembled at Dundee, composed of such of the inhabitants of Tealing as adhered to Mr. Glas after his deposition, and some of the inhabitants of Dundee and its vicinity, who followed their example; all of whom, however, did not, for several years, amount to two hundred persons at any one time. But soon after the erection of that church at Dundee, smaller congregations were put into church order at different places; such as Edinburgh, Perth, Dunkeld, Arbroath, Montrose, Aberdeen, Glasgow, Paisley, Galashields, Newcastle, &c.

Mr. Glas published a variety of tracts and treatises at different periods, mostly in the polemical style; and a Mr. Robert Sandeman, originally educated and destined for the ministry of the established church, having embraced Mr. Glas's principles, was soon after ordained an elder of the church at Perth, from whence he afterward moved to Edinburgh. The writings of the late Mr. James Hervey, of Weston Favell, having attracted much attention, especially among those who held what are commonly called Calvinistic doctrines, and Mr. Sandeman considering some of Mr. Hervey's sentiments, as well as those of various authors whom he recommended both in his Meditations, and in his Dialogues between Theron and Aspasio, as erroneous and unscriptural; the former, in a series of letters, entitled Letters on Theron and Aspasio, combated not only the doctrines of Mr. Hervey, and other popular authors, but those of the more fashionable preachers, and even of some celebrated philosophers, as Locke, Hume, &c. These Letters, which Sandeman published under the signature of Palæmon, were written in a style more suited to attract general notice than that of Mr. Glas; though the peculiar doctrines and tenets of both are in perfect unison. Sandeman's attacks were so pointed, or, as some said, executed with so much acrimony, that they gave great offence, especially to the devout on both sides of the Tweed; and so generally displeasing were they considered, that the celebrated Mr. George Whitfield, when preaching at Edinburgh, about the time of the first publication of these Letters, it was said, observed, that 'the author of those Letters ought to be called Ishmael, because his hand is against every man, and therefore every man's hand ought to be against him.' Chiefly, as it was commonly said, in consequence of reading those Letters, some persons in London became proselytes to the principles and opinions of Sandeman, and were, for that reason, there denominated Sandemanians; and in the year 1762, a small congregation of those proselytes were put into church order, upon the principles of Glas and Sandeman; as were also, some years after, smaller congregations in different parts of Yorkshire, at Nottingham, Liverpool, Whitehaven, &c. all in communion upon the same principles, and after the same model of the congregations denominated Glassites in Scotland.

A summary of the faith of this sect may be taken from the following words of Sandeman, who, speaking of his Letters, says, 'The motto of the title-page of this work is One Thing is needful; which he calls the sole requisite to justification, or acceptance with God. By the sole requisite, he understands the work finished by Christ in his death, proved by his resurrection to be all-sufficient to justify the guilty; that the whole benefit of this event is conveyed to men, only by the apostolic report concerning it; that every one who understands this report to be true, or is persuaded that the event actually happened, as testified by the apostles, is justified, and finds relief to his guilty conscience; that he is relieved, not by finding any favourable symptom about his own heart, but by finding their report to be true; that the event itself, which is reported, becomes his relief, so soon as it stands true in his mind, and accordingly becomes his faith; that all the divine power which operates on the minds of men, either to give the first relief to their consciences, or to influence them in every part of their obedience to the Gospel, is persuasive power, or the forcible conviction of truth; that all men are equally fit for justification, or equally destitute of any plea for acceptance with God; that those called the stricter sort, cannot, by their utmost assiduity in devotion, contribute any more to this end, than the most notorious felons, ready to suffer for their crimes; that, in this respect, no one of mankind has the least room to glory over another; that man's impotency to do what is pleasing to God lies in the aversion of his will; and that all men are as able to please God as they are willing; that the supernatural facts recorded in the writings of the Apostles open to view a further discovery of the Divine character than can be learned from any thing observable in the course of nature; that in the work finished by Christ on the cross, this new discovery of the Divine character was made; that thence it appeared that God might be just in justifying the ungodly, or those who have nothing about them but what fits them for condemnation; that this is proved and demonstrated, with evidence sufficient to counterbalance all objections, by the resurrection of Christ from the dead; that every one who is persuaded of the fact of Christ's resurrection, as circumstanced in the Gospel History, even when he finds nothing about himself in the way of wish, desire, or otherwise, but what renders him obnoxious to the Divine displeasure, knows how God may be just in justifying him and receiving him into favour presently as he stands; so finds relief from the disquieting fear, for which no remedy can be found by any argument drawn from any appearance of God in the course of nature.

'That the great mistake of popular preachers, or the chief leaders in devotion, lies in this, that they cannot understand how God can appear to an unrighteous person, just in justifying him as he presently stands, without feeling some motion or tendency in his will towards a change to the better; whether this motion be called some faint desire to close with Christ, to trust in him, to put forth an act of faith, or by any other name; that, in effect, they make their acts of faith to stand, not only for the ground of acceptance with God, but also for the evidence and proof of one's being in favour with God; that, accordingly, they show their disaffection, not only to the justifying work of Christ, but also to the works of self-denied obedience, wherein his people are called to be conformed to him, as a proof of their being his disciples indeed; that the appropriation contended for in the popular doctrines is disagreeable to the Scripture, and productive of the worst consequences; that no man can warrantably be assured that he is a Christian, a believer in Christ, or an object of the peculiar favour of God, any other way than by being assured, on good grounds, that his practice, in obedience to the peculiar precepts of Christianity, is influenced by the love of that same truth which influenced the lives of the Apostles.'

In fine, the Sandemanians hold no kind of communion with any church or society, nor even with any individuals, but such as profess perfect agreement with them on the absolute and unlimited sovereignty of God, and on the all-sufficiency of the work of Christ, to justify the most guilty of mankind. But while they thus contend for justification through the righteousness of Christ, imputed to sinners without works, they no less strenuously contend for the strictest obedience of every one of their members to the peculiar precepts of Christianity, as practised in the churches planted by the Apostles.

Hence they maintain it to be indispensably necessary to pay the strictest attention to the exercise of the law of love, as laid down in Matthew (xviii.): 'If thy brother shall trespass against thee, go tell him his fault between thee and him alone,' &c.; and, therefore, when any one brother gives offence to another, either by word or deed, or says or does any thing which occasions uneasiness of mind, or tends to cool the affection or esteem which they ought to hold for one another, the person so offending, whatever be his rank or station in civil life, is to be immediately told his fault by the brother offended, whatever may be the rank or station of the latter. If, in the conference between the two, the brother offended be satisfied by the profession of repentance of the offender, the fault is to be forgiven, and no more heard of. If otherwise, the cause of offence is to be told to one or two other brethren, in presence of the offender; who, if his repentance satisfies them, is in like manner to be forgiven. But if the offender hear not them, or if they are dissatisfied with his profession of repentance, the cause of offence must be stated to the whole church; and if the church sustain the cause of offence, as supported by Scripture, the offender must be put away, or excommunicated by prayer. They also contend for the strict observance of the other rule of discipline prescribed by the Apostle (1 Cor. v.); which differs from the former rule in this respect, that where any one who is called a brother, turns out to be by character a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, or a drunkard, or an extortioner, the offence occasioned by his practice is not to be the subject of private dealing, between two or three brethren, but must be directly laid before the whole church; who, if the character be established, must put him away by excommunication, whatever may be his profession of repentance at the time. But in this, as well as in the former case, the offending brother is to be restored to communion with the church, and love confirmed towards him, whenever it shall appear, to the satisfaction of the church, that he repents, and is in danger of being swallowed up with over-much sorrow; according to the apostolic precept. (2 Cor. ii. 6—8.) In both cases, the whole church must be unanimous; nothing can be done by a majority or plurality of votes; for that these people think inconsistent with charity and brotherly love; and all their acts of discipline, whether in the reception, excommunication, or restoration of members, or indeed in any other matters which come under the consideration of the church, are preceded by prayer to God. It is rather by this strictness of discipline, than by any other peculiar tenet or usage, that this sect is to be distinguished from other dissenters; for various classes of the latter profess to hold both the faith and other tenets held by them.

The Sandemanians, or Glassites, hold it to be unlawful to have any familiar intercourse with persons excommunicated; or to eat or drink with such, in the same way as they may do with those of the world who never made their profession. Persons desirous to be admitted members of these churches, are received with prayer, and the imposition of the hands of the presbytery; whatever may have been their former practices and characters; but only in case of their profession of the faith, and of obedience to the laws of Christ, satisfying every member of the church. They not only maintain the lawfulness of baptizing the children of their members (as well as such professors as were not previously baptized), but refuse to hold communion with those who deny the lawfulness of infant baptism; and they believe that all children, without discrimination, who die in a state of infancy, will be found among the living in the New Jerusalem, or be subjects of the kingdom of heaven. (Mark x. 13—16. Acts ii. 39. xvi. 15. 31. Rom. v. 19—21. 1 Cor. xv. 22. Rev. xx. 12—15, &c.) They maintain the necessity of at least two bishops, pastors, or elders (which they hold to be different names for one and the same office) in each church; inasmuch that they cannot, according to their notions of the order of the churches planted by the apostles, either eat the Lord's Supper, or go about any act of discipline, in receiving, putting away, or restoring members, by prayer, without two or more elders being present. In calling persons to exercise the office of bishops or elders among them, this sect are guided by the instructions of Paul to Timothy and Titus, (1 Tim. iii. 1—7. Tit. i. 5—9.) according to the literal signification of the apostle's words, without regard to the literature, rank, or station of the persons to be called. Engagements in trade, if they do not distract or entangle the man with the affairs and cares of this life, afford no objection to one's being called to the office. Their elders are ordained by prayer, with fasting, and by the imposition of the hands of the presbytery; and with giving the right hand of fellowship.

They assemble every first day of the week, chiefly for the sake of breaking bread; that is, partaking of the Lord's Supper; of which every member, who can attend, must partake (Matt. xxvi. 26—28. Acts ii. 46. xx. 7. 1 Cor. xi. 23—29, &c.); and they hold it to be both the duty and the privilege of every male member, both to pray in the church when called on by the presiding elder, and to exhort his brethren, according to the gifts bestowed on him. Besides this service on the first day of every week, they meet on other days, according as circumstances will permit, for reading the Scriptures, exhortation, and discipline, &c. Every individual, desirous of being admitted as a member, must make a profession of his faith in presence of the church; and if, after having done so, and answered such questions as are put to him, for the purpose of ascertaining his oneness of mind with the church, all the members agree to his admission, he is received with prayer and the imposition of the hands of the presbytery (1 Tim. iv. 14.; v. 22.), and then the brethren salute him with the kiss of charity. They hold it to be unlawful to lay up treasure on earth, and profess to consider themselves, and all that they have or possess, as liable to the calls of the poor, and the concerns of the kingdom of heaven. They hold it to be their duty also, to abstain from eating blood, and things strangled; and, according to Acts (xv. 29. &c.), they allow of public and private diversions and amusements, so far as not connected with things really sinful, or as not incapacitating them to give to those who need (Gal. vi. 10.); but holding the lot to be sacred, and the casting of it an appeal to God, (Prov. xvi. 33. &c.) they abstain from lotteries, playing at cards, dice, and all chance games, as well as from every species of swearing, unless when called on by lawful authority, in order to the confirmation of truth, and to put an end to strife. Adam's Religious World Displayed, vol. iii. pp. 170—191.

SAN'HEDRIM; from συνέδριον, an assembly. Sanhedrim, or Sanhedria, is a corrupted word, from the Greek Synedrion, which signifies an assembly; such as those of a parliament, or a sovereign court, where many judges and counsellors meet, to consult on, and to determine, great affairs. This council consisted of seventy senators. The room in which they met was a rotunda, half of which was built without the temple, and half within; that is, one semicircle of the room was within the compass of the temple, and as it was never allowed to sit down in the temple, they tell us this part was for those who stood up; the other half, or semicircle, extended without the holy place, and here the judges sat. The Nasi, or prince, sat on a throne at the end of the hall, having his deputy at his right hand, and sub-deputy at his left. The other senators were ranged in order on each side.

The Rabbins pretend, that the Sanhedrim has always subsisted in their nation from the time of Moses down to the destruction of the temple by the Romans. They date the establishment of it from what happened in the wilderness, some time after the people departed from Sinai, (Numb. xi. 16.) when seventy men were chosen as judges of lesser matters. The Sanhedrim was composed of seventy counsellors, six out of each tribe, and Moses, as president, made up the number seventy-one. Six senators out of each tribe make in all seventy-two persons, which, with the president, constitute a council of seventy-three; and accordingly the Sanhedrim consisted of seventy-three counsellors, according to some. To prove the uninterrupted succession of the judges of the Sanhedrim, there is nothing unattempted by the partisans of this opinion. They find a proof, where others cannot so much as perceive any appearance or shadow of it.

As to the personal qualifications of the judges of this court, their birth was to be untainted; they were often of the race of the priests or Levites, or of the number of the inferior judges; or from the lesser Sanhedrim, which consisted of twenty-three judges. See JUDGES. They were to be skilful in the law, as well traditional as written. They were obliged to study magic, divination, fortune-telling, physic, astrology, arithmetic, and languages. The Jews say, they were to know to the number of seventy tongues; that is, they were to know all the tongues; for the Hebrews acknowledged but seventy in all; and perhaps this is too many. Eunuchs were excluded from the Sanhedrim, usurers, decrepid persons, players at games of chance, those who had any bodily deformity, those who had brought up pigeons to decoy others to their pigeon-houses, and those who made a gain of their fruits in the sabbatical year. Some also excluded the high-priest and the king, because of their too great power; but others insist that the king always presided in the Sanhedrim, while there was a king in Israel. Lastly, it was required that the members of the Sanhedrim should be of mature age, rich, of good countenance and body. Such are the notions of the Rabbins. We pretend not to warrant their opinions.

The authority of the great Sanhedrim was very extensive. This council decided causes brought before it by appeal from inferior courts. The king, the high-priest, the prophets, were under its jurisdiction. If the king offended against the law; for example, if he married above eighteen wives, if he kept too many horses, if he hoarded up too much gold and silver; the Sanhedrim had him stripped and whipped in their presence. But whipping, they say, among the Hebrews, was not ignominious; and the king bore this correction by way of penance, and himself made choice of the person who was to exercise this discipline. Also, the general affairs of the nation were brought before the Sanhedrim. The right of judging in capital cases belonged to this court; and this sentence could not be pronounced in any other place, but in the hall called Lishchathaggazith, or the hall paved with stones, supposed by some to be the Λιθόστρωτος, or pavement. (John xix. 13.) Whence it came to pass, that the Jews were forced to quit this hall, when the power of life and death was taken out of their hands, forty years before the destruction of their temple, and three years before the death of Jesus Christ.

In the time of Moses, this council was held at the door of the tabernacle of the testimony. As soon as the people were in possession of the Land of Promise, the Sanhedrim followed the tabernacle. It was kept successively at Gilgal, at Shiloh, at Kirjath-jearim, at Nob, at Gibeon in the house of Obed-edom, and, lastly, at Jerusalem, till the Babylonish captivity. During the captivity it was kept at Babylon. After the return from Babylon, it continued at Jerusalem, to the time of the sicarii, or assassins. Then, finding that these profligate wretches, whose number increased daily, sometimes escaped punishment by favour of the president or judges, it was removed to Hanoth; which were certain abodes situated, say the Rabbins, on the mountain of the temple. From thence they came down into the city of Jerusalem, withdrawing themselves by degrees from the temple. Afterwards they removed to Jamnia; thence to Jericho, to Uzzah, to Shepharvaim to Bethsanim, to Sephoris; last of all to Tiberias, where they continued till their utter extinction. This is the account the Jews give of their Sanhedrim.

But the learned do not agree with them. Father Petan fixes the beginning of the Sanhedrim not till Gabinius was governor of Judea; who erected tribunals in the five principal cities of Judea, at Jerusalem, at Gadara, at Amathus, at Jericho, at Sephora or Sephoris, a city of Galilee. Grotius places the beginning under Moses, as the Rabbins do; but he makes it determine at the beginning of Herod's reign. Mr. Basnage, in his History of the Jews, at first thought that the Sanhedrim began under Gabinius, but afterwards he places it under Judas Maccabæus, or under his brother Jonathan. We see, indeed, (1 Macc. xii. 6.) under Jonathan Maccabæus, in the year of the world 3860, that the senate, with the high-priest, sent an embassy to the Romans. The Rabbins say, that Alexander Janneus, king of the Jews, of the race of the Asmoneans, appeared before the Sanhedrim, and claimed a right of sitting there, whether the senators would or no. Josephus informs us, that when Herod was governor of Galilee, he was summoned before the senate, where he appeared. It must be therefore acknowledged, that the Sanhedrim was in being before the reign of Herod. It was in being afterwards, as we find from the Gospels and from the Acts. Jesus Christ (Matt. v. 22.) distinguishes two tribunals. 'Whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause, shall be in danger of the judgment;' that is, they say, the tribunal of the twenty-three judges: 'And whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council;' that is, of the great Sanhedrim, which had the right of life and death, at least generally, and before this right was taken away by the Romans. Some think that the jurisdiction of the council of twenty-three extended to life and death also; but it is certain that the Sanhedrim was superior to that council. See also Mark xiii. 9. xiv. 55. xv. 1. Luke xxii. 52. 66. John xi. 47. Acts iv. 15. 21. where mention is made of the Synedrion.

From all this it may be concluded, that the origin of the Sanhedrim is by no means to be depended on; for the council of the seventy elders established by

Moses, was not what the Hebrews understood by the name of Sanhedrim. Besides, we cannot perceive this establishment either under Joshua, the Judges, or the Kings. We find nothing of it after the captivity, till the time of Jonathan Maccabæus. The tribunals erected by Gabinius were very different from the Sanhedrim. This was the only one of its kind, and fixed at Jerusalem; but Gabinius established five tribunals at five different cities; which tribunals do not appear to be subordinate one to another. Lastly, it is certain that this senate was in being in the time of Jesus Christ, and when St. Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, wrote their Gospels; since it is mentioned in their writings. But the Jews inform us themselves, that they then had not the power of life and death. (John xviii. 31.)

SAPPHIRA, Σαφειρα, signifies that relates or tells: otherwise, that writes or composes books; otherwise, handsome. Sapphira was a Christian woman, and wife of Ananias. Having conjointly sold a field, which was their property, they brought a part of the price of the field, and laid it at the feet of the apostles, as if it had been the whole price, reserving the rest for their own use. For this prevarication they were both struck with sudden death. (Acts v. 1, 2, 3, &c.) See ANANIAS.

SARAH, שרה, signifies lady, or princess: שרה, lady of scent; otherwise, song; otherwise, the morning, the morning star. Sarah, or Sarai, or Sara, was wife of Abraham, daughter of Terah, father of Abraham, but by a mother different from Abraham's; since Abraham himself asserts, (Gen. xii. 13.; xx. 12.) that she was really his sister, the daughter of his father, but not the daughter of his mother. Terah might have had several wives at once, according to the custom of the country; or might have married again, after the death of Abraham's mother, by which last wife he might have had Sarai. This opinion seems to us better than that which makes Sarah the same as Iscah the daughter of Haran, the niece of Abraham, and grand-daughter of Terah. (Gen. xi. 29.) However, this is the opinion of Josephus, and of a great number of commentators.

Sarai was born in the year of the world 2018. She married Abraham before this patriarch left the city of Ur; and when Abraham quitted his country, he agreed with Sarah, that she should call herself his sister. For, being a woman of exquisite beauty, he was afraid she should be taken away from him, and that he might be put to death on her account, if she was known to be his wife. When the famine prevailed in Canaan, which was the year after Abraham came into this country, he was obliged to withdraw into Egypt, where the famine did not reach, (Gen. xii. 10, 11, 12, &c.) in the year of the world 2084. When Abraham came into that country, Sarah was taken from him, and carried to Pharaoh's palace. But the Lord visited this prince and all his family with great plagues, because of Sarah. And Pharaoh at length knowing that she was Abraham's wife, reproved him very sharply. He restored her to Abraham, and sent them out of Egypt. This conduct of Abraham and Sarah has occasioned many speculations among the learned. Abraham seems to expose Sarah to the danger of adultery; and she seems too easily to consent to it, by passing only for the sister of Abraham, and not his wife. In Abraham there seems to have been lying, disguise, and too great easiness in hazarding his wife's chastity; and in her, too great forwardness in consenting to it.

Sarah, knowing on the one hand, that God had promised a numerous posterity, and on the other, finding herself barren, thought that possibly the promises of God were to be performed by the medium of some other woman; she therefore desired Abraham to take her servant Hagar, that, by her means, she might see issue from Abraham. He complied, and took Hagar as a wife of the second order. But when Hagar found herself with child, she began to despise her mistress; who, in consequence, used her harshly. Hagar fled from her; but returned some time after.

Some years after, God appeared to Abraham, made a covenant with him, instituted circumcision; changed his name; and changed the name of Sarai, or My Princess, into that of Sarah, or Princess; and promised Abraham that he should have a son by Sarah. The same year three angels, whom he entertained in his tent, in the form of men, repeated to him the promise of the birth of a son, and assured him, that a full year should not expire, before he saw the completion of this promise. Sarah was behind the door of her tent, and hearing this, began to laugh within herself, saying, After I am become old, and my lord is old also, shall I receive pleasure? Then the Lord said to Abraham, Why did Sarah laugh? Is there any thing impossible to God? Sarah indeed shall have a son within a year's time. Sarah denied that she had laughed; but the Lord said to her, It is not so, for you surely did laugh.

A short time after, Abraham went to dwell at Gerar, a city of the Philistines; and Abimelech, king of this city, took away Sarah, who, though now fourscore and ten years old, and then with child of Isaac, was still a very handsome woman. But the Lord appeared to Abimelech in a dream, and threatened to punish him, if he did not restore her to her husband. The day after, early in the morning, this prince came to Abraham, and brought him his wife, reproaching his dissimulation, in pretending she was his sister. Abraham excused himself, by explaining that she was indeed his sister, being born from the same father, though not from the same mother. Abimelech made great presents to Abraham, and offered a thousand pieces of silver to Sarah, that she might purchase a veil to cover her face, and be no more exposed to similar dangers.

The year following she brought forth a son, to whom she gave the name of Isaac, that is, Laughter, in allusion to her laughing when God promised her a son, and to show the great joy that his birth produced in her: she suckled the child herself; and when it was to be weaned, about three years after, as the most probable opinion is, Abraham made a great feast for his friends. Sarah saw Ishmael at play with Isaac, or, according to St. Paul, (Gal. iv. 29.) Ishmael then persecuted or teased Isaac, and she said to Abraham, Cast out this servant, with her son, for Ishmael shall not inherit with Isaac. Abraham made some difficulty at this request, but God ordered him to comply.

The Scripture tells us no more of Sarah till her death, (Gen. xxiii. 1. 19.) which happened some years after the famous trial that God made of Abraham's faith, by commanding him to sacrifice Isaac. Sarah was an hundred and twenty-seven years old when she died. She was then in the valley of Hebron, and Abraham came to Beersheba to mourn for her.

SAR'DIS, Σάρδεεις, signifies the prince of joy, or song of joy; otherwise, that which remains, or is left; or, from the Syriac, a curtain. Sardis was a city of Asia Minor, formerly the capital of Cræsus, king of the Lydians. St. John (Rev. iii. 1, 2, 3, &c.) writes, in behalf of Jesus Christ, to the angel or bishop of Sardis.

This city being overthrown by a most terrible earthquake, it was rebuilt at the cost of Tiberius, and continued long to be the metropolis of the province of Lydia. Strabo tells us, that it was a great and ancient city; but of later date than the state of the Trojans. It had in his time a castle well fortified. The mountain Tmolus hangs over the city: upon the top of which was erected a high tower of white stone, built after the Persian manner; whence is a pleasing prospect over all the adjacent plains, and a view of the Cayster. Out of the Tmolus flows the Pactolus, whose stream anciently brought gold with its current; whence Cræsus and his ancestors amassed their riches; but these springs of gold have since failed. Whatever this city was in former days, it is now only a poor habitation of shepherds, who live in low and humble cottages; but the ancient pillars and ruins lift up their heads, as unwilling to lose the memory of their former glory. Indeed, considerable ruins still attest the ancient splendour of this once celebrated capital of Cræsus and the Lydian kings, which is now reduced to a wretched village called Sart, consisting of a few mud huts, occupied by Turkish herdsmen. No Christians reside on the spot; and in the year 1826, two Greek servants of a Turkish miller were the only representatives of the church at Sardis. Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 621; Hartley's Visit, *Miss. SAREP'TA. See ZAREPHATH.

SA'TAN, שָׂטָן, διάβολος, σατανᾶς, signifies an adversary, an enemy, an accuser. It is often translated adversary in our translation of the Bible, and also in the Septuagint and the Vulgate. The princes of the Philistines say to Achish, send back David, 'lest in the battle he be an adversary to us,' and turn his arms against us. (1 Sam. xxix. 4.) The Lord stirred up adversaries to Solomon in the persons of Hadad and Rezon. (1 Kings xi. 14, 23, &c.) Sometimes Satan is put for the devil; Satan presented himself among the sons of God. (Job i. 6, 7, &c.) 'Let Satan stand at his right hand.' (Ps. cix. 6.) It is said, 'Satan standing at his right hand to resist him. And the Lord said unto Satan, The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan.' (Zechariah iii. 1, 2.) In the New Testament, the word Satan is taken both in the sense of an adversary, and for the devil; Christ says to Peter, 'Get thee behind me, Satan; thou art an offence unto me;' (Matt. xvi. 23. Mark viii. 33.) that is, Begone, O my adversary, you that withstand what I most desire. But commonly Satan is taken for the devil. 'If Satan cast out Satan, he is divided against himself.' (Matt. xii. 26. Mark iii. 23.) And in the Revelation, (xx. 2.) 'He laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the devil and Satan, and bound him a thousand years.' See DEVIL.

To deliver up to Satan probably refers to the infliction of some bodily pains or diseases, in which Satan might act as the instrument of divine justice, and bring the guilty person to a sense of duty. St. Paul delivered up to Satan Hymeneus and Alexander, that they might learn not to blaspheme. (1 Tim. i. 20.) He also surrendered up to him the incestuous person of Corinth, 'for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.' (1 Cor. v. 5.) The passage is thus paraphrased by a late writer: 'As the design of punishment is reformation of the suffering party, I command you—not yourselves to molest the party, but—to deliver such a transgressor unto Satan, the proper angel of punishment, that he, by his castigations and afflictions, may bring the criminal to a sense of duty; even should those afflictions terminate in the destruction [of his person; perhaps, rather of his fleshly powers, or appetite] of the flesh, in order that the more important part of the man, the spirit, may be saved in the day of our Lord Jesus.'

By collecting all these passages where Satan [or the devil] is mentioned, it may be observed, that he fell from Heaven, with all his company; that God cast him down from thence for the punishment of his pride; and by his envy and malice, death and all other evils came into the world; that by the permission of God he exercises a sort of government in the world over his subordinates, over apostate angels like himself; that God makes use of him to prove good men, and to chastise bad ones; that it is he, or some of his, that torment, obsess, or possess men, that inspire them with evil designs, as he did David, when he suggested to him to number his people, and to Judas to betray Jesus Christ, and to Ananias and Sapphira to conceal the price of their field. That he roves about full of rage, like a roaring lion, to tempt, to betray, to destroy, and to involve us in guilt and wickedness. Calmet's Dictionary; Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary, No. cliii. p. 132.

SAVIOUR, a name appropriated to our Lord Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world, who was prefigured by all to whom the Old Testament gives the name of Saviour, as Joshua, the Judges of Israel, the kings David, Solomon, Josiah, and other great men raised up to deliver the people of God. The prophets had described Jesus Christ under the name of Saviour. 'The Lord shall send them a saviour, and a great one, and he shall deliver them.' (Isai. xix. 20.) 'I, even I, am the Lord, and beside me there is no saviour.' (Isai. xliii. 11.) The apostles and sacred writers of the New Testament generally give to Jesus Christ the name of Saviour, by way of eminence. When the angel foretold his birth, he said he should be called Jesus, that is, a Saviour; 'for he shall save his people from their sins.' (Matt. i. 21. John iv. 42. Acts xiii. 23. Philipp. iii. 20, &c.) See SALVATION.

SAUL, שָׂאֻל, signifies demanded, or lent, ditch, sepulchre, death, or hell. Saul, the son of Kish, of the tribe of Benjamin, was the first king of the Israelites. Kish, having lost his she-asses, sent his son Saul to seek them. After he had in vain travelled over a considerable country, and was on the point of returning to Gibeah to his father, a servant who was with him said, Here is a very famous prophet hard by, let us consult him: so they went to Ramah, where they learned that the prophet Samuel was. Saul asked him where the seer or prophet lived? Samuel answered, It is I who am the seer: and Samuel made Saul and his servant enter the room where the feast was kept, placed them at the head of the table, and, by way of distinction, served up to Saul the shoulder of a sacrifice. After supper, Samuel conducted Saul to his lodging on the terrace of the house, and on the morrow morning he brought him down, and came with him below the city of Ramah. Afterwards he anointed him, kissed him, and told him of the kingdom to which he was divinely appointed; of the certainty of which he gave him several signs. All that Samuel had foretold him was fulfilled that same day, and God changed him into another man. All those who saw him said with wonder, What has happened to the son of Kish? Is Saul also among the prophets? And this afterwards became a kind of proverb.

Some time after this, Samuel assembled the people at Mizpeh, to give them a king, as they had desired. He cast lots on all the tribes of Israel, and the lot fell on the tribe of Benjamin. He cast them on all the families of this tribe, and it fell on the family of Matri. Lastly, he cast them on the family of Kish, and the lot fell on the person of Saul. He was immediately sought for, but could not be found: they took him, however, from his concealment, and when he was among the people, he appeared taller than the rest by the whole head. The people shouted, and cried, God save the king! and Samuel declared before the people the laws and conditions of the kingdom, and then dismissed the assembly. Saul returned to Gibeah, accompanied by a part of the army, consisting of men whose hearts the Lord had inclined to his interests. Others despised Saul, and said, How shall this man save us? But Saul affected not to hear them.

About a month afterwards, Nahash, king of the Ammonites, besieged the city of Jabesh-Gilead; and messengers were sent from Jabesh to Gibeah, to acquaint the people, that the king of the Ammonites had attacked the city, and threatened to put out every man's right eye, and to make it a reproach to Israel. Saul happening to return from the field with his oxen, and seeing the people weep, he asked the reason of it. Then he took his oxen, and cut them in pieces, and sent them into all Israel, saying, Thus shall it be done to the oxen of whoever will not follow Saul and Samuel. Saul attacked the Ammonites in three places at once, killed a great number of them, and so dispersed them, that hardly two could be found together. After this, all the people returned to Gilgal, where they renewed the inauguration of king Saul. This happened in the first year of Saul. (1 Sam. xiii. 1, 2, 3, &c.)

Two years afterwards, Saul chose three thousand men out of Israel, of whom he gave one thousand to his son Jonathan, and kept two thousand about his person. Jonathan defeated the Philistines at Gibeah; on the news of which the people took courage, and thought of shaking off the yoke of the Philistines. They assembled therefore in great numbers, in arms, before Saul in Gilgal. The Philistines having intelligence of this, with a prodigious army, encamped at Michmash, east of Bethel. When the Israelites saw themselves thus enclosed, they began to withdraw themselves, some one way and some another. Saul continued seven days at Gilgal, expecting the arrival of the prophet Samuel: seeing he did not come, he began to offer sacrifices to God. But he had barely finished when Samuel arrived, and told him he had done ill; so that, added he, your reign will not continue long.

Samuel and Saul, and six hundred men with them, went from Gilgal to Gibeah; and the Philistines from Michmash came and encamped at Gibeah. One day as Jonathan and his armour-bearer went towards the camp of the Philistines, suddenly the camp of the enemy was in confusion, and the sentinels of the army of Saul saw the ground covered with dead bodies. Saul with his people then began to pursue the enemy; and the Israelites, who had fled away before, rallying, they killed a great number of the Philistines.

Saul on this day had denounced a malediction, and said, 'Cursed be he that shall eat any thing till evening.' Now Jonathan, being absent, knew not what had passed: as he went through a wood he found some honey, and taking some on the end of his staff he ate it. In the evening, when the people were gathered together after the victory, Saul discovered that God was offended by some crime committed among them, he ordered the lot to be cast on all the army; and the lot fell on Jonathan. Saul told him, that on this necessity he must die for his inadvertence; but the people opposed it, and delivered him.

When Saul had strengthened himself in the kingdom of Israel, he carried his arms abroad, among the enemies of his nation, against Moab, Ammon, Edom, against the kings of Zobah in Syria, and against the Philistines; and which way soever he turned himself he remained victorious. The times and circumstances of these wars are unknown.

After this, Samuel brought him orders from the Lord, that he should utterly exterminate the Amalekites, that he should spare neither man nor beast, nor any valuable thing whatever. Saul therefore took the field against the Amalekites, and defeated them; but he saved their king, and the best of the cattle, and the best of the booty. Afterwards, he returned to Gilgal; but as he passed Mount Carmel, (south of Judah, and very different from Carmel on the Mediterranean,) he there 'set him up a place,' as it is in our translation; or 'he erected a triumphal arch,' as it is generally interpreted. He constructed to himself, to his own honour, glory, &c. a trophy of his victory over Amalek, and a token of his own complacency in his success. It is probable that this erection of a trophy was a vain-glorious disobedience in Saul; he did not erect it to God, but to himself.

Samuel also coming to Gilgal, Saul went to meet him, and said, I have fulfilled the word of the Lord. Samuel answered, Whence then is this lowing of oxen and bleating of sheep, that sound in my ears? Saul answered him, The people have brought of the best of the flocks of Amalek, to offer sacrifices to the Lord. But Samuel told him, it is not sacrifice that the Lord requires, but implicit submission to his commands. Obedience is better than burnt-offerings, &c. Samuel was about to leave Saul, but Saul laying hold of his garment, it tore in his hands. Then Samuel said to him, 'The Lord hath rent the kingdom of Israel from thee this day, and hath given it to a neighbour of thine, that is better than thou.' However, Samuel returned with him to the camp at Gilgal.

Some years afterwards Samuel went, by order from the Lord, to give the royal unction to David; the Spirit of the Lord withdrew from Saul, and God suffered an evil spirit to take occasion, from the bad disposition of the humours of this prince, and his melancholy temperament, to move and agitate him, or possess him. Then his courtiers caused David to attend him, to soothe his distemper by the sound of musical instruments, on which David could play very skilfully. Saul took an affection for David, and made him his armour-bearer. About eight years afterwards, the Philistines came and encamped between Shocoh and Azekah; Saul with the army of Israel took their station in the vale of Elah. Now, in the army of the Philistines was a giant, by name Goliath, who came daily to insult the army of Israel, to challenge it. Saul had promised his daughter in marriage to any man who should overcome him. David, who had retired from court, and lived with his father at Bethlehem, was sent by him into the camp about this time; and being offended at these insults of Goliath, he undertook to fight with him; which he did, and slew him. See DAVID.

But Saul took a grudge against David, because, at his return, the women who sung and danced before the victorious army, chanted, that Saul had killed his thousands, and David his ten thousands. He several times attempted the life of David. He afterwards gave him the command of a thousand men, and promised him Merab, his eldest daughter; though at the same time he had no intention to let him have her. He only sought an occasion of putting him to death by the hands of the Philistines. He afterwards married his daughter Merab to another, and promised him his second daughter, Michal; then he acquainted David, that he required no other dowry for his daughter than a hundred foreskins of the Philistines. David soon performed this condition, and married Michal.

Saul, seeing that David by his valour acquired reputation every day, resolved to put him to death. Jonathan for a time diverted him from his purpose; but afterwards when Saul relapsed into his usual melancholy, he again attempted to pierce David with the lance he held in his hand. David escaped this also, and retired to his own house, which Saul ordered to be beset. In the night-time Michal let him down out of a window, by which means he escaped, and withdrew to Samuel at Naioth in Ramah. Saul sent messengers thither to apprehend him, but they were seized there with a prophetic spirit, and when Saul at last came thither himself, he also began to prophesy. See SAMUEL.

David then came to Nob, and received a sword and some refreshments from the high-priest Ahimelech. Saul was informed of this some time afterwards by Doeg, the Idumean, who happened to be at Nob when David came thither. Saul immediately sent to Nob, to fetch all the priests before him; he severely reproached them with having supported his enemy; and had them slaughtered before his face, to the number of fourscore and five persons. He went himself afterwards to Nob, and put all the inhabitants to the sword, man, woman, and child; not so much as sparing the sucking infants, nor the cattle.

Saul afterwards pursued David, who at length retired into the wilderness of Engedi, and Saul went after him with his troops, but finding himself constrained by a necessity of nature, he entered a cave, where David and his people were hid. David coming softly behind him cut off the lappet of his coat, without his perceiving it. When he went out, and was at a distance, David went after him, showed him the lappet of his coat, which he had cut off, and told him it had been in his power to have killed him, but that he would never lift his hand against the Lord's anointed. Saul, moved with the generosity of David, could not forbear shedding tears; acknowledging himself to be unjust. After this, he went back to his own house, and David retired into the wilderness of Ziph. When the Ziphites knew it, they went presently, and gave Saul notice, who came with his army on the hill of Hachilah. While he was encamped in this place, David went by night into his camp, and penetrated even into the king's tent, where having found every body asleep, he took the king's lance and cup, and then withdrew out of the camp: and thus he again reproved Saul, whom he forced to justify his integrity.

Some years after this, the Philistines invaded Israel. Saul and his troops took the field, and encamped on the mountains of Gilboa. But when Saul saw the army of the Philistines, which was very formidable, his heart began to fail. He consulted the Lord by his priests and prophets, but the Lord returned him no answer; not knowing whom to address, he found out a witch, or enchantress, at Endor.

Some time before, Saul had banished all wizards and magicians out of his dominions; and, that he might not be known by this witch, he disguised himself, and went with two servants. He desired her to raise up Samuel. Saul bid her fear nothing, and asked her whom she saw ascending? She answered, I see gods, or a great man, a prince, a judge of Israel. (1 Sam. xxviii. 13.) Saul fell down at his feet; and Samuel said to him, The Lord is withdrawn from you, and to-morrow you shall be with me, you and your sons, and the Lord will deliver Israel into the hands of the Philistines. Saul sunk immediately extended on the earth, for he had eaten nothing all that day. See SAMUEL.

The next day the battle was fought, in which Israel was put to flight before the Philistines; and the sons of Saul, Jonathan, Abinadab, and Melchi-shua, were slain. Saul himself was pressed very hard, the archers shooting at him, and wounding him dangerously. Seeing his state was desperate, he said to his armour-bearer, Draw your sword and kill me: but his armour-bearer refused. Saul then took his own sword and fell upon it, and his armour-bearer followed his example. Thus died Saul, the first king of Israel, after a reign of forty years.

An Amalekite, who by chance was near, took off his crown and bracelet, and brought them to David. He also told David that he himself had slain Saul.

The day after the battle, when the Philistines came to take the spoils of the dead, they found Saul and his three sons extended upon the plain. They cut off Saul's head, and took away his armour, which was carried to the temple of Ashtaroth; and they hung up his body against the walls of Beth-shan, which probably were opposite to the chief street, because it is said (2 Sam. xxi. 12.) that his body was hung up in the street of this city. And we read (1 Chron. x. 10.) that his head was fastened in the temple of Dagon. When the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead were informed of these indignities, they went by night and took down the bodies, and brought them into their city beyond Jordan, where they burnt the remains of the flesh, and buried the bones. They fasted and mourned for the king seven days, in commemoration of the service he had done their city at the beginning of his reign. Several years after, David had these bones removed from the grave of Jabesh, and put into the sepulchre of Kish, the father of Saul, at Gibeah. (2 Sam. xxi. 12, 13, 14.) Ishbosheth, the fourth son of Saul, succeeded him in the kingdom, and reigned at Mahanaim, beyond Jordan, over the eleven tribes; for David then began to reign over the tribe of Judah.

The disease of Saul (1 Sam. xvi. 14.) is thought by Dr. Mead to have been a true madness of the melancholic or atrabilious kind, as the ancient physicians termed it; the fits of which returned on the unhappy monarch at uncertain periods, as is frequently the case in this sort of malady. The remedy applied, namely, playing on the harp, was an extremely proper one, in the judgment of experienced physicians. On the contrary, Dr. Hales is of opinion, that the obstinate infatuation of Saul, in contending against God, while he persisted in persecuting David, savours of something more than common frenzy or madness. It strongly resembles Pharaoh's case, after he had resisted all the means of grace, when the Lord at length hardened his heart to his destruction. The evil spirit from the Lord, which actuated Saul, also strongly resembles the demoniacal possessions of the New Testament, in the foregoing symptoms; for they likewise raved and prophesied on several occasions. We may judge what manner of spirit Saul was of, when he cast a javelin to smite his most deservedly favourite son Jonathan, because he presumed to plead for David, and assert his innocence (1 Sam. xx. 30—34.); and when he afterwards committed that sacrilegious massacre at Nob, and slew Ahimelech the high-priest, and eighty-five priests of Eli's house, and cut off (1 Sam. xxii. 19.) 'and smote both men and women, children, and sucklings, and oxen, asses, and sheep, with the edge of the sword;' because Ahimelech, not knowing of Saul's hatred to David, inquired of the Lord for him, and gave him victuals, and the sword of Goliath. (1 Sam. xxi. 1—9.; xxii. 9—19.) Thus Saul showed less respect to God and his priests, and less mercy to his subjects, than he had done to Agag and the Amalekites, his devoted enemies. Hales's Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. p. 353; Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 514.

SCEPTRE, Sceptrum, in Greek, Skeptron, in Hebrew, Shebet. This word properly signifies, 1. a rod of command, a staff of authority, a sceptre which is placed in the hand of kings, of governors of a province, of the chief of a people. Jacob foretold to Judah (Gen. xlix. 10.) that 'the sceptre should not depart from Judah, nor a law-giver from between his feet, until Shiloh come, and unto him shall the gathering of the people be.' Balaam also, foretelling the coming of the Messiah, says (Numb. xxiv. 17.) 'A sceptre shall rise out of Israel.' They are given also to scribes, to commissaries, who keep a list of the troops. (Judg. v. 14.) The prophets also often speak of the sceptre of dominion, (Isa. xiv. 5.; Ezek. xix. 11. 14.) and Amos represents the sovereign power by him that holds the sceptre. (Amos i. 5. 8.) Ahasuerus carried in his hand a golden sceptre, &c. (Esther viii. 4.) It is observed by a late writer, that the word shebet, besides denoting a staff, a rod of authority, a sceptre, also signifies a pen, a reed to write with. 'As the possession of the sceptre,' says he, 'in the instance of lawful magistracy, means also the power of it, the power of ruling by it, the authority which attends it, so I conceive that the expression of the power, that is, authority—of the pen [the shebet] is as accurate and forcible an expression as the power of the sword, the power of the crown, of the sceptre, &c.'—'To apply this power of the pen to the instance of Cyrenius (Luke ii. 2.) who was not a native Jew, but a foreigner; who enrolled the Jews, not on account of, nor by authority from, their own king, but on account of, and by authority from, the Roman emperor; who meant to tax them, not for any purpose originating in their own nation, but to augment the treasury of Augustus; not with their good-will, but very much against it, and supported by Roman troops, and by Roman authority; such a person might well be said to possess the power of the pen, the shebet. He issues edicts, who dare disobey? Is not this officer in full possession of the power of the shebet? Is not then the power of the shebet departed from Judah, from the government of Judah, from its native or regular governors, to a foreign and domineering jurisdiction? If this be the true import of the expression, then, under these circumstances, amid this unusual, unnational, interference, we may expect the coming of the Shiloh foretold by Jacob. (Gen. xlix. 10.) It ought to be noticed that the government was not totally to depart from Judah, till the 'obedience of the peoples' had been rendered to Shiloh. Accordingly, the Romans did not entirely destroy the Jewish 'place and nation,' till after many parts of the Gentile world had yielded obedience to the name of Jesus; but, so soon as Gentile nations had had sufficient opportunities of accepting the Gospel, the shebet of justice, and the staff of dignity, were wrested from the hand, and from between the feet, or standards of Judah.' See CYRENIUS and SHILOH.

2. The sceptre is put for the rod of correction, for the sovereign authority that punishes and humbles. 'Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron,' or an iron sceptre. (Psalm ii. 9.) The wise man often uses the Hebrew word shebet to express the rod with which the disobedient son, and the intractable servant, are disciplined. (Prov. xxii. 15.)

3. The sceptre is very often taken for a tribe; probably, because the princes of each tribe carried a sceptre, or a wand of command, to show their dignity. The Septuagint and Vulgate, as well as our interpreters, generally translate this Hebrew word by tribe; but sometimes they preserve the sceptre. (1 Sam. ix. 21.; x. 19, 20, 21.; xv. 17. 1 Kings viii. 16.; xi. 13. 32. 35.; xii. 20, 21.)

4. The sceptre, or the Hebrew word shebet, signifies a shepherd's wand, (Lev. xxvii. 32.) the truncheon of a warrior, or any common staff, (2 Sam. xxiii. 21.) the dart, javelin, or lance of a soldier, (2 Sam. xviii. 14.) the rod or flail with which they thresh the smaller grain. (Isaiah xxviii. 27.) Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary of the Holy Bible, No. cxxiii. pp. 36, 37.

SCHWENKELDIANS, a denomination in the sixteenth century; so called from one Gaspar Schwenkfeldt, a Silesian knight. He differed from Luther in the three following points. The first of these points related to the doctrine concerning the eucharist. Schwenkfeldt inverted the following words of Christ, this is my body; and he insisted on their being thus understood: my body is this, that is, such as this bread which is broken and consumed, a true and real food, which nourisheth, satisfieth, and delighteth the soul. My blood is this; that is, such its effects, as the wine which strengthens and refresheth the heart. Secondly, he denied that the external word which is committed to writing in the holy Scriptures, was endowed with the power of healing, illuminating, and renewing the mind: and he ascribed this power to the internal word, which, according to his notion, was Christ himself. Thirdly, he would not allow Christ's human nature, in its exalted state, to be called a creature, or a created substance; as such a denomination appeared to him infinitely below its majestic dignity, united as it is in that glorious state with the divine essence. Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. iv. pp. 317—319.

SCHISM, σχίσμα is a 'division' or 'rent' in the church. It is either partial or total: partial, as in the disorderly mode of celebrating the eucharist among the Corinthians, reprehended by Paul (1 Cor. xi. 20—34.); or total, when it comes to the separating of congregations from the common rites and ordinances of religious worship, as of the reformed churches from the church of Rome. Schisms, therefore, may subsist in a true church as well as in a false; where they only involve secondary points of doctrine or discipline, without subverting the foundations of the Christian faith. Hence, Lutherans, Calvinists, Arminians, &c. and churchmen, ought not to separate from each other, nor break off communion, since they agree in fundamentals; no more than the different sects or parties in the church of Rome, Dominicans, Franciscans, Carthusians, Thomists, Molinists, Jansenists, Jesuits, &c. who, notwithstanding the diversity of their tenets, and their mutual controversies, all live in communion with each other.

Schism is a breach of that union which Christ has enjoined; an opposition to that method of promoting religious knowledge, and exercising religious affections, which is prescribed by the Gospel, and therefore is a crime against God. There may be just and proper reasons for separation; and it is our duty to entertain charitable sentiments towards those who do separate themselves from us, whether they have, or have not, a just reason for separation. But it is by no means a matter of indifference, whether a person adheres to the true religion plainly set forth in holy writ, or separates for the purpose of joining some newly-invented sect, whose opinions, or modes of worship, have nothing but the mere recommendation of novelty, or some such circumstance, and so happen to please his fancy. No one can depart from the religion of which he has been a member, without being guilty of the sin against which we are cautioned by the apostle, (1 Cor. i. 10.) unless he be previously convinced in his conscience, that the terms of communion required of him are unlawful, the doctrines unscriptural, and the whole establishment inferior to that he joins; being contrary to reason and the revealed will of God.

Concord and union among Christians is a duty strictly implied and prescribed by the Gospel. Of this no man conversant with the apostolic writings can doubt. The precepts of the Gospel plainly require an union of love and charity among its disciples; a tenderness of affection; a readiness to perform all offices of humanity and benevolence towards each other. They require also, as the distinguishing union of Christians, that we have one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, and one mediator, Jesus Christ; that we worship the same God, trust in the same Redeemer, profess the same belief, and acknowledge the same sacraments. There is also a still further union required of us; namely, a communication with each other in the outward offices and ordinances of the Christian religion. A careful perusal of the first four chapters of St. Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians will sufficiently show how much this last-mentioned union is a duty required by the Gospel.

Our own experience shows us how fatal a tendency divisions in religion have to alienate men's hearts from each other; how naturally they produce strife and variance; how much they put it in the power of artful men to divide us into worldly parties and uncharitable sects; how destructive they are of public peace and of private charity. Consequently, on the other hand, to be united in religious community is, in like proportion, an effectual means to prevent and cure these evils, and to promote that love and charity, that peace and happiness, which they destroy. If then it be our duty, by all lawful means to promote these good ends, we ought to be united in religious communion, 'if it be possible, and as far as lies in us.' Doubtless, Divine wisdom had these happy effects in view in commanding it. The duty, however, is incumbent on us, not only as the means to produce these good effects, but because it is enjoined us. For it is our duty to obey the commands of God, whether we can discover a reason for them or not. We may easily see, what is meant by that religious union, 'communion of saints,' which the Gospel commands, and the constitution of the Christian church enjoins its members. It is meant that all combinations of the church are bound, as members of the same body, to observe the common laws of Christian confederacy; to profess the same rule of faith; to acknowledge each other's administrations; to be mutually disposed to communicate in worship; and, for that end, to agree in the same general terms of communion, and submit to such rules of peace and order, as are fixed by the consent and authority of the whole body. If such a union as this be a duty founded on the plain precepts of the Gospel, every breach of that union, where it might be preserved, must be a sin. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book ii. pp. 1105, 1106.

SCORPION. The scorpion is a small animal which has a bladder full of a dangerous poison. The head appears to be joined and continued to the breast: it has two eyes in the middle of its head, and two towards its extremity, between which come out, as it were, two arms, like the claws of a lobster. It has eight legs proceeding from its breast, each divided into six parts, covered with hair, at the end of which are six talons or claws. The belly is divided into seven rings, from the last of which the tail proceeds, which is divided into seven little beads, of which the last is armed with a sting. Some have six eyes, others eight. The tail is long, and formed after the manner of a string of beads tied end to end, the last bigger than the others, and longer, at the end of which are, sometimes, two stings, which are hollow, and filled with a cold poison, which it ejects into the part which it stings.

The scorpion is of a blackish colour like soot; it waddles as it goes, and fixes violently with its snout, and by its feet, on such persons as it seizes, so that it cannot be plucked off but with difficulty. Some have wings like locusts, and fly from one region to another, and are something like bats, say Pliny and Strabo. They are also of several colours: the ancients mention black, yellow, ash-coloured, red, green, white, wine-coloured, of the colour of soot.

'In the tropical climates it is a foot in length. No animal in the creation seems endued with such an irascible nature. When taken, they exert their utmost rage against the glass which contains them; will attempt to sting a stick, when put near them; will sting animals confined with them, without provocation; are the cruellest enemies to each other. Maupertuis put 100 together in the same glass: instantly they vented their rage in mutual destruction, universal carnage! In a few days only fourteen remained, which had killed and devoured all the others. It is even asserted, that, when in extremity or despair, the scorpion will destroy itself. It is said to be a common experiment in Gibraltar [and Goldsmith says that he has been assured of such a fact, by many eye-witnesses] to take a scorpion newly caught, and surrounding him with burning charcoal, when he sees the impossibility of escaping, he stings himself on the back of the head, and instantly expires. Surely Moses very properly mentions scorpions among the dangers of the wilderness! (Deut. viii. 15.) And what shall we think of the hazardous situation of Ezekiel, who is said to dwell among scorpions? (ii. 6.)—people as irascible as this venomous insect. Could a fitter contrast be selected by our Lord—Will a father give a scorpion to his child instead of an egg? (Luke xi. 12.)

‘The passage most descriptive of the scorpion is Rev. ix. 3, 4, 5. 10. which mentions locusts, having power as scorpions; not to kill men but to torment them, during five months—with the torment of a scorpion when he striketh a man; they had tails like scorpions, and stings in their tails. Contrary to the nature of locusts, they were not to destroy vegetation, but to infest men. 1. These scorpions have the power of flying. The ancients certainly described an insect of some kind, as a flying scorpion. Lucian says, “There are two kinds of scorpions, one residing on the ground, large, having claws, and many articulations at the tail: the other flies in the air, and has inferior wings, like locusts, beetles, and bats.” Strabo reports that in Mauritania are found many flying scorpions; others without wings. Scheuzer mentions other testimonies. It is probable, therefore, that the ancients called that a “flying scorpion,” which the moderns know under another name. 2. They did not kill men, but only torment them. It is not every scorpion whose sting is fatal. In Europe they are seldom deadly, though always dangerous. In some of the towns of Italy, and in the south of France, it is one of the greatest pests that torment mankind; yet its malignancy in Europe is trifling, compared to its powers in Africa and the East. Maupertuis caused a dog to be stung—it died; another dog did not die, though more severely stung, in appearance; and it seems to be generally true, that the stings of the old ones are the most dangerous, and during the heat of summer. This agrees with 3. the five months of the Apocalypse: that this was known to the ancients we have the evidence of Tertullian, who says, “The ordinary time of danger is during the heats; the winds of south and south-west excite its fury:” and Macrobius says, “The scorpion slumbers during winter; but, when winter is over, its sting resumes its vigour, of which winter had not deprived it.” 4. As to the torment of a scorpion when he striketh a man, Dioscorides thus describes it: “When the scorpion has stung, the place becomes inflamed, and hardened; it reddens by tension, and is painful at intervals, being now chilly, now burning. The pain soon rises high, and rages, sometimes more, sometimes less. A sweating succeeds, attended by a shivering, and trembling; the extremities of the body become cold, the groin swells; the bowels expel their wind, the hair stands on end; the members become pale, and the skin feels throughout it the sensation of a perpetual pricking, as if by needles.” Such are the torments of a scorpion when he striketh a man! 5. As to the formation of the tail, and the sting at its point, the ancients had remarked this peculiarity. On the whole, we observe, that however metaphorical is the description of this depredator, by the apocalyptic writer, yet the foundation of his description may readily be discovered in nature.’ Scripture Illustrated.

SCORPIONS were also a kind of whip armed with points. When the Israelites complained to Rehoboam, of the weight of the yoke wherewith Solomon had loaded them, he returned them this answer, (1 Kings xii. 11. 14. 2 Chron. x. 11. 14.); ‘My father hath chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions,’ that is, with rods or whips armed with points, or pointed thorns, like the tail of a scorpion. ISIDOR.

SCORPIONS were also machines of war, from which arrows were thrown. (1 Macc. vi. 51.) The name of scorpion was also given to the arrows themselves.

SCOTLAND, CHURCH, OR KIRK OF. Name, Rise, Progress, &c.—The word kirk, which signifies church, is of Saxon origin, or may be considered as a contraction of the two Greek words Κυρίου οίκος, the house of God, and is still used in Scotland, where it is chiefly confined to the establishment, and the Relief Synod.

The most eminent Scottish reformer, John Knox, was a man of considerable abilities, of no less courage and resolution, a disciple of Calvin, and a warm admirer of the constitution and discipline established at Geneva. Almost from the era of the Reformation in Scotland, till that of the Revolution, a perpetual struggle existed between the court and the people, for the establishment of an episcopal or a presbyterian form of church-government. The former model of ecclesiastical polity was patronized by the House of Stuart, on account of the support which it gave to the prerogatives of the crown; the latter was favoured by a majority of the people, doubtless not so much on account of its superior claim to apostolical institution, as because the laity are there mixed with the clergy in church judicatories, and the two orders, which under episcopacy are kept so distinct, incorporated, as it were, into one body. John Knox and his brethren were violent reformers. They laid it down as a principle, that, in new modelling their church, they could not recede too far from the Church of Rome: but it is not much known, that those men were not, in the proper sense of the word, Presbyterians; for the first proposal of dividing the Church of Scotland into presbyteries, as it is now divided, was made in the General Assembly in 1579, though the reformation had been supported by the civil power from 1560. During these nineteen years, the Congregation, as the reformed church was then styled, seems to have resembled, in its constitution, the Lutheran churches in Germany. The kingdom was divided into districts, over which were placed superintendents with equal powers; but each superintendent was amenable to the jurisdiction of the synod, of which he was appointed permanent moderator. This constitution was so very defective, that it could not well subsist. Accordingly, the old ecclesiastical government by archbishops, bishops, &c. was restored in 1572, when the church assumed a more regular appearance of episcopacy. However, in 1581, the presbytery of Edinburgh was erected, the first in Scotland; but the courts called presbyteries were not generally agreed to by the king till 1586, nor ratified by an Act of Parliament till 1592, when presbyterianism became the establishment of Scotland. King James VI. obtained from the Scottish clergy an acknowledgment of the parliamentary jurisdiction of bishops; and, after his accession to the throne of England, he prevailed with them, in 1606, to receive those who were styled bishops, as perpetual presidents or moderators in their ecclesiastical synods. It was not, however, till 1610, that there was in Scotland, a reformed episcopacy, such as the Church of England has always enjoyed, and such as Cyprian and the other luminaries of the third century would have acknowledged as regular and apostolical. By the General Assembly which was that year held in Glasgow, Episcopacy was solemnly voted to be from that time the government of the Church of Scotland.

Presbyterianism, thus rejected, was again set up on the ruins of Episcopacy by the Covenanters in the reign of Charles I., and continued during the interregnum; but the episcopal form was re-established by his son and successor in 1661; and this constitution of the church remained till the Revolution in 1688, when Presbyterianism was finally established, and in 1690 ratified by Act of Parliament. Thus Scotland and England having been separate kingdoms at the time of the Reformation, a difference of circumstances in the two countries led to different sentiments on the subject of religion, and at last to different religious establishments. When they were incorporated into one kingdom by the Treaty of Union, the same regard to the inclinations of the commonalty of Scotland, to which Presbytery owed its first establishment in that country, produced a declaration, to which both kingdoms gave their assent, that 'Episcopacy shall continue in England, and that the Presbyterian church-government shall be the only government of Christ's church in that part of Great Britain called Scotland.' It is also guaranteed by the 5th Article of the Union with Ireland, not only 'that the churches of England and Ireland, as now established, be united into one Protestant Episcopal church, to be called, The United Church of England and Ireland;' but also that, 'in like manner, the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government of the Church of Scotland shall remain and be preserved, as the same are now established by law, and by the acts for the union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland.'

Distinguishing Tenets.—The only confession which appears to have been legally established before the Revolution, in 1688, is that published in the History of the Reformation in Scotland, and attributed to John Knox. It was compiled in 1560 by that reformer himself, aided by several of his friends, and was ratified by Parliament in 1567. It consists of twenty-five articles, and was the confession, as well of the Episcopal as of the Presbyterian church. The Covenanters, indeed, during the grand rebellion, adopted the Westminster Confession; in the compilation of which some delegates from their General Assembly had assisted. At the Revolution, this Confession was received as the standard of the national faith, and the same Acts of Parliament which settled Presbyterian church-government in Scotland, ordain, 'That no person be admitted or continued hereafter to be a minister or preacher within this church, unless that he subscribe the Confession of Faith, declaring the same to be the Confession of his Faith.' By the Act of Union in 1707, the same is required of all 'Professors, Principals, Regents, Masters, and others bearing office in any of the four Universities in Scotland. Hence the Westminster Confession of Faith, and what are called The Larger and Shorter Catechisms, contain the public and avowed doctrines of this church; and it is well known that these formularies are Calvinistic, if not Supralapsarian.

But it is generally believed that many of the ministers of the establishment in Scotland have departed widely from the national faith; at least the Church of Scotland is well known to have been long 'divided into two parties, the one differing widely from the other in their ideas of ecclesiastical management. The one have declared themselves abundantly zealous to confirm and even to extend the rights of patronage; while the other wish either to abridge these rights, or to confine their operation so as to extend the influence and secure the consent of the people in the settlement of ministers. The popular party are considered as more zealous for the doctrines of grace, and for the articles of religion in all their strictness, as contained in the national Confession of Faith. The opposing party again, who may be denominated the unpopular one, seem willing to allow a greater latitude of opinion, and generally preach in a style that seems less evangelical, and less fitted to affect the hearts and consciences of the hearers. They designate themselves moderate men, and therefore strenuously oppose what they call the wildness of orthodoxy, the madness of fanaticism, the frenzy of the people. To the conduct of their opposing moderate brethren, the popular clergy attribute most of the unhappy religious divisions which have taken place in Scotland; and could they be but persuaded to relinquish their unpopular measures, it is believed that most of the Sectaries would in time be brought back to the communion of the established church.'

Worship, Rites, and Ceremonies.—In this church the worship is extremely simple, and only few ceremonies are retained. John Knox, like Calvin, seems to have been less an enemy to liturgies and established forms, than his more modern followers; for, though he laid aside the Book of Common Prayer about the year 1562, he then introduced one of his own composition, which more strongly resembled the liturgy of the Church of Geneva. There is, however, now no liturgy or form in use in this church, and the minister's only guide is, The Directory for the Public Worship of God; nor is it thought necessary to adhere strictly to it; for, as in several other respects, what it enjoins with regard to reading the Holy Scriptures in public worship is, at this day, but seldom practised.

By the ecclesiastical laws, 'the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper should be dispensed in every parish four times in the year;' but this law is now seldom adhered to, unless in most chapels of ease. In country parishes it is often administered not above once a year, and in towns generally only twice a year. The people are prepared for that holy ordinance by a fast on some day of the preceding week, generally on Thursday, and by a sermon on the Saturday; and they meet again on the Monday morning for public thanksgiving. They have no altars in the kirks, and the communion tables are not fixed, but introduced for the occasion, and are sometimes two or more in number, and of considerable length.

In the exercise of public worship this church has no Creed—no Ten Commandments,—no Lord's Prayer,—no Doxology,—no reading of the Scriptures; nor does she observe any of the festivals of the church, that are so well calculated to refresh the minds, and to awaken the devotion of Christians. She has no instrumental music,—no consecration of churches, or of burying-grounds,—no funeral service or ceremony,—no sign of the cross in baptism,—and no administration of the Holy Communion in private houses, not even to the sick or dying.

The members of this church reject, but do not condemn, confirmation. 'We endeavour,' says Dr. Hill, 'to supply the want of it in a manner which appears to us to answer the same purpose. We account ourselves bound to exercise a continued inspection over the Christian education of those who have been baptized, that, as far as our authority and exertions can be of any avail, parents may not neglect to fulfil their vow; and when young persons partake, for the first time, of the Lord's Supper, we are careful, by private conference and public instruction, to impress upon their minds such a sense of the nature of that action, that they may consider themselves as then making that declaration of faith, and entering into those engagements, which would have accompanied their baptism had it been delayed till riper years?'

By the first book of Discipline, which was compiled by Knox and his associates, and ratified by an act of council in 1560, the apostolical rite of ordination by the imposition of hands was laid aside as superstitious; but it is now restored and practised as formerly in the Kirk of Scotland, where, as in other Presbyterian churches, ordination is vested in the presbytery.

Discipline and Church-government.—The discipline of the Church of Scotland, though now rather relaxed, was never so rigorous as that of Geneva, the church on whose model it was formed. It was formerly the practice to oblige fornicators to present themselves in the Kirk, for three different Sundays, on a bench, known by the name of the stool of repentance, when they were publicly rebuked by the minister, in the face of the congregation: but this punishment is now frequently changed into a pecuniary fine, though seldom by conscientious clergymen. For this change, however, there seems to be no law; and the old practice of publicly rebuking fornicators and adulterers, though very much disliked and cried down by the gentry, &c. is still continued in a great majority of the parishes of Scotland.

Of the societies at present formed upon the Presbyterian model, it may safely be affirmed, that the Church of Scotland is by much the most respectable. In this church, every regulation of public worship, every act of discipline, and every ecclesiastical censure, which in episcopal churches flows from the authority of a diocesan bishop, or from a convocation of the clergy, is the joint work of a certain number of ministers and laymen acting together with equal authority, and deciding every question by a plurality of voices. The laymen who thus form an essential part of the ecclesiastical courts of Scotland, are called elders, and ruling elders. See ELDERS.

The Kirk Session, which is the lowest ecclesiastical judicatory, or court, consists of the minister and those elders of the congregation. The minister is, ex officio, moderator, but has no negative voice over the decision of the session; nor indeed has he a right to vote at all, unless when the voices of the elders are equal and opposite. The next judicatory is the Presbytery, which consists of all the pastors, within a certain district, and one ruling elder from each parish, commissioned by his brethren to represent, in conjunction with the minister, the session of that parish. The Presbytery treats of such matters as concern the particular churches within its bounds; as the examination, admission, ordination, and censuring of ministers; the licensing of probationers, rebuking of gross or contumacious sinners, the directing of the sentence of excommunication, the deciding upon references and appeals from kirk sessions, resolving cases of conscience, explaining difficulties in doctrine or discipline, and censuring, according to the word of God, any heresy or erroneous doctrine, which hath either been publicly or privately maintained within the bounds of its jurisdiction. That part of the constitution of this church which gave an equal vote, in questions of heresy, to an illiterate mechanic and his learned pastor, has not been universally approved, but has been considered by some as having been the source of much trouble to many a pious clergyman, who, from the laudable desire of explaining the Scriptures, and declaring to his flock all the counsel of God, has employed a variety of expressions, of the same import, to illustrate those articles of faith, which may be obscurely expressed in the established standards. The number of Presbyteries in Scotland is 78.

From the judgment of the presbytery there lies an appeal to the Provincial Synod, which ordinarily meets twice in the year, and exercises over the presbyteries within the province a jurisdiction similar to that which is vested in each Presbytery over the several kirk sessions within its bounds. Of these Synods there are in the Church of Scotland fifteen, which are composed of the members of the several presbyteries within the respective provinces which give names to the Synods.

The highest ecclesiastical court is the General Assembly, which consists of a certain number of ministers and ruling elders, delegated from each presbytery, and of commissioners from the royal boroughs. By Act 5th of the Assembly, 1694, 'A presbytery in which there are fewer than twelve parishes sends to the General Assembly two ministers and one ruling elder; if it contain between twelve and eighteen ministers, it sends three of these, and one ruling elder; if it contain between eighteen and twenty-four ministers, it sends four ministers, and two ruling elders; and of twenty-four ministers, when it contains so many, it sends five, with two ruling elders. Every royal borough sends one ruling elder (and Edinburgh two,) whose election must be attested by the kirk sessions of their respective boroughs; and every university sends one commissioner from its own body. This Assembly is honoured with a representative of the sovereign, in the person of the Lord High Commissioner, who is always a nobleman, and presides, and has a salary of 1500*l.* per annum; but he has no voice in their deliberations. The Assembly continues to sit for ten days; at the end of which time it is dissolved, first by the moderator, who appoints another Assembly to be held upon a certain day of the month of May, in the following year; and then by the Lord High Commissioner, who, in his Majesty's name, appoints another Assembly to be held upon the day which had been mentioned by the moderator. Appeals are brought from all the other ecclesiastical courts in Scotland, to the General Assembly; and in questions purely religious, no appeal lies from its determinations. To the laws already made no new one can be added, till it has been proposed in one General Assembly, and by them transmitted to every presbytery for their consent. If this, or at least the consent of the majority, be obtained, the Assembly next year may pass it into an act, which henceforth must be regarded as a constitutional law of the Kirk.

In the subordination of these assemblies and courts of review, parochial, presbyterial, provincial, and national, the less unto the greater, consist the external order, strength, and stedfastness of the Church of Scotland.

Bounds, Numbers, Duties, &c.—This church is now confined to Scotland and the islands of Scotland, and contains within its bounds nearly 900 parishes. The number of ministers belonging to it who enjoy benefices, and possess ecclesiastical authority, is 936. Of this number seventy-seven are placed in collegiate charges, mostly in the proportion of two ministers for each of these charges; and the remaining eight hundred and fifty-nine ministers are settled in single charges, each of them having the superintendence of a whole parish. In very populous parishes, chapels of ease are erected with consent of the Kirk, and are supported by voluntary subscriptions; but the ministers who officiate in them are not included in this number, as they are not members of any ecclesiastical courts.

'The duties of the Scotch clergy are numerous and laborious. They officiate regularly in the public worship of God; and, in general, they must go through this duty twice every Sunday (exclusively of other occasional appearances), delivering every Sunday a lecture and a sermon, with prayers. It is also expected, throughout Scotland, that the prayers and discourses shall be of the minister's own composition; and the prayers, in all cases, and the discourses in most instances, are delivered without the use of papers.' 'They are expected to perform the alternate duties of examining their people from the Scriptures, and catechisms of the church, and of visiting them from house to house, with prayers and exhortations. This is done commonly once in the year, being omitted only in those cases in which the ministers deem it impracticable, or not acceptable, or at least not necessary.' 'The charge of the poor devolves in a very particular manner on the clergy, and in them also is vested the superintendence of all schools within their bounds.'

The provision made by the law of Scotland for the support of the established clergy consists in a stipend, payable in victual or money, or partly in each,—a small glebe of land, and in a manse (parsonage-house) and office-houses. The legislature intended the highest stipend to exceed the lowest, only as two to one; but the present state of the stipends paid to the clergy of this church is said to exhibit great inequalities. In some parishes, where there are plenty of teinds, or tithes of land, the stipends are much more liberal than in others where the valued teinds are scanty. In cities and towns, the stipends are generally paid in money; in 'landward' (that is, country) parishes, they are, for the most part, liquidated in money and victual. When the teinds are exhausted and surrendered, the stipend is exactly the whole of the valued teinds; when not exhausted, augmentations are granted from time to time by the Court of Session, which is the court of teinds. 'The clergy in Edinburgh have their stipends paid in money, and receive 300*l.* each, liable to a deduction of 10 per cent. for tax on income. In landward parishes, the stipends, at an average, may be stated at six chalders of victual, worth 16*l.* per chaldar, communibus annis, and 50*l.* in money; in all, 146*l.* sterling. Some of the clergy enjoy a more liberal provision, rising to about 200*l.* a-year, or thereabouts; but others are still far below the above-stated average, not a few of them being under 60*l.* and many below 100*l.* a-year of stipend. The average is, therefore, considered as hardly rising to 150*l.* a-year at the present time.'

The whole church establishment, 'as a burden on land, may be stated in one view, as follows, namely, a glebe, of perhaps about six or seven acres, out of nearly 21,000, and the grass, where it is allowed; a stipend of about 9*d.* in the pound of the land rents; and buildings and communion charges, amounting to 4*d.* or 5*d.* more in the pound of these land rents. All these, put together, constitute the burdens of the Scottish ecclesiastical establishment, in so far as proprietors of land are affected by them.'

The ministers of this church have long maintained a very respectable character for piety, learning, liberality of sentiment, and regularity of conduct; and those of the present day cannot well be said to yield in these respects to any of their predecessors. Among her more distinguished members, this church ranks the names of Robertson, Henry, Leechman, Blacklock, Gerard, M'Knight, Blair, and Campbell. But surely Dr. Campbell, however able a scholar, and however eminent and respectable in other respects, could not be much her friend, when he taught her sons that her constitution was at variance with the institution of Christ, and the practice of the apostles. Adam's Religious World Displayed, vol. iii. pp. 1—29.

SCOTLAND, EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN. This church holds spiritual communion with the United Church of England and Ireland, and also with the Episcopal church in America, but disclaiming all foreign jurisdiction: its members are united, in all matters of ecclesiastical concern, under the regular successors of those Scottish bishops, who, in consequence of the Revolution, in 1688, were deprived of their temporal honours and privileges, but still continued to exercise their spiritual powers for the benefit of that part of the Church of Christ which had been committed to their charge. The title of Non-jurors, by which they were chiefly known for about a century from the above era, and which was imposed on all those, both in Britain and Ireland, who refused to swear allegiance to King William and Queen Mary, and their successors, is now very justly dropt, the occasion of it having ceased, at least as far as this church is concerned. For, on the death of the last person who maintained his claim to the crown of Britain, in opposition to the reigning family and existing government, its members offered their dutiful allegiance to the then reigning sovereign.

This religious society has subsisted in various circumstances of prosperity and adversity; it has been blessed with good fortune, and fostered by the hand of earthly power; and, through the instability of human authority and grandeur, it has likewise been plunged into the very depth of adversity, there to learn the lesson of patient endurance for conscience' sake, and to give glory to God, by humbly acquiescing in the justice and righteousness of his judgments. Almost ever since the Reformation, and particularly for about a century from the era of the Revolution, its history, like the mystic scroll of the prophet, is inscribed, within and without, 'with lamentation, and mourning, and woe.' No portion, indeed, of the Catholic church of Christ, has undergone a greater variety of fortune; nor, perhaps, is there at this day any religious society that has been more conformed to primitive Christianity, either in its external or internal condition.

The Church of Scotland had no regular confession of faith, nor any articles of religion in the beginning of her Reformation; but, in 1561, John Knox, assisted by some other divines, drew up a Confession of Faith, which was adopted, and afterwards ratified in 1567; and it continued to be the uniform standard of her doctrine, under all her forms, for upwards of eighty years. This system differs little in essentials from the articles of most other reformed churches; in every thing unconnected with Popery, it is moderate, if not unexceptionable; and in those points that are disputed among Protestants, it is certainly less dogmatical than that of the Westminster Assembly which succeeded it, and which is now the legal standard in Scotland. It was indeed so well received by all parties, that it was constantly subscribed both by Episcopalians and Presbyterians, till 1645, when some of the Scotch members of the Westminster Assembly, who were violent in their tempers, and high in their notions, objected to it as favouring the Arminian scheme; but certainly without reason. The Westminster Confession was in consequence adopted, and was ratified by the Parliament of Scotland in 1649, but was rejected at the Restoration. When Episcopacy, however, was re-established in 1662, nothing was said concerning a system of articles, and yet this neglect was never called in question till 1682, when, after much debate, that of 1561, which was all along acknowledged by the Episcopalians, though not formally adopted and subscribed, was made choice of, and continued to be the public formulary till the Revolution.

From that period, which forms a memorable era in the history of this church, no subscription was required from her clergy to any regular system of Christian principles, for upwards of a century. They were only required at their ordinations solemnly to profess their belief of all the canonical books of the Old and New Testaments, and to declare their persuasion that those books contain every thing necessary to salvation, through faith in Christ.

This practice continued till 1792, when the Act of Parliament, which was passed in their favour, required them to subscribe the Thirty-nine Articles of the church of England; in dutiful compliance with which, as well as to exhibit a public testimony of their faith, and of their agreement in doctrine with the United church of England and Ireland, they unanimously and heartily subscribed them in a general convocation called for that purpose, and holden at Lawrence-kirk, in the county of Kincardine, on the 24th of October 1804.

Some of the bishops and clergy of this church are disposed to favour the peculiar doctrines of Mr. Hutchinson; but the distinguishing tenets of their society may be said to be the apostolical institution of Episcopacy, and the independency of the church upon the state in the exercise of those powers which are purely spiritual.

It cannot be supposed, that, in the infant state of the Reformed Church of Scotland, her form of worship could be regular; and yet we find that the first reformers made use of a Book of Common Prayer so early as 1557, which is generally thought to have been the Liturgy of the Church of England. A form of prayer compiled by Knox, and called John Knox's Liturgy, was adopted in 1564, and continued till 1580. But, notwithstanding this acknowledged form, it would appear that the ministers were not restricted, on ordinary occasions, to the use of it, and that public worship was performed, during that period, sometimes in one form, sometimes in another, and that confusion in the state occasioned confusion in the church. When Presbyterianism began to prevail in 1580, the form of worship adopted by the leaders of that party was plain and simple, and differed in some, but in few material points, from the former; and both the Presbyterians and Episcopalians complied with it, without making any objections till towards the latter end of the reign of king Charles I. By this time Andrew Melvil's abhorrence to every appearance of liturgical worship had been so widely extended, and become so deeply rooted in the minds of the people, that an attempt, in 1637, to introduce into this Church a book of Common Prayer, copied with some alterations from that of England, produced the 'Solemn League and Covenant,' which involved in one common ruin that unfortunate prince, with the constitution both of church and state. From 1645, till the Restoration in 1662, the Westminster Directory was adopted, but by no means strictly adhered to, in various instances, as in that of praying for the civil government; for though it enjoins that duty, no such prayers were put up during that long night of innovation and confusion. When Episcopacy was restored, together with the monarchy, it was not thought advisable to renew the attempt to introduce a public liturgy; and except at ordinations, when the English forms were used, as far as local circumstances would admit, no regular form of prayer was in general use while Episcopacy continued to be the established church. Many, indeed, of the Episcopal clergy compiled forms to be used by themselves in their particular congregations, with some petitions and collects taken out of the English book; and all of them uniformly concluded their prayers with the Lord's Prayer, and their singing with the Doxology, both of which the zealots of the other side decried as superstitious and formal. In this state the form of worship continued till 1712, when the Book of Common Prayer of the Church of England was adopted. This Liturgy, then introduced, has ever since been uniformly used, not only in the morning and evening services, but also in all other occasional offices, with as little variation as the difference of circumstances will admit, excepting in the celebration of the Holy Eucharist. This office, as adopted by this church, is not only agreeable to that authorized by king Charles I., which made part of the only reformed Liturgy that ever had the sanction of a legal establishment in Scotland, but is likewise formed on the model of the office in the first Liturgy of Edward VI., which was composed by the learned and venerable fathers of the English Reformation.

The late learned and pious bishop of Norwich, Dr. Horne, said, that if the great apostle of the Gentiles were upon earth, and it were put to his choice with what denomination of Christians he would communicate, the preference would probably be given to the Episcopalians of Scotland. Such commendation of this religious society, from such a man as Bishop Horne, is truly 'laudari a laudato viro;' is no small compensation, in the opinion of its members, for all the obloquy that has been cast upon it by its adversaries, whose cry, for many years, seems to have been, 'down with it, down with it; even to the ground.'

The Scottish Episcopalians now retain all the essence of Episcopacy, without its modern appendages; and while they maintain the independency of the church upon the state, in the exercise of those powers which are purely spiritual, they do by no means deny the propriety or the utility of a national establishment of religion. They believe that the Church of Christ is not a sect, but a society; in other words, that it is made up of a set of men, not merely professing the same Christian faith, but likewise united together by certain particular laws, and under a particular form of government; that all the benefits of Christ's death are appropriated, and all God's promises of mercy and grace to mankind are made, to them that are in the church. They insist that their opinions respecting the nature and constitution of the church, and the consequent necessity of church communion, however unfashionable in the present day, are primitive and apostolical.

The Episcopalians are the only society of dissenters from the establishment in Scotland that has as yet been recognised by law; and they have ever been most numerous on the east coast of Scotland, and particularly in the county of Aberdeen. There are now about sixty congregations in the communion of their church, and about the same number of clergy of all orders; and the number of Episcopalians in Scotland, including the eight or nine congregations that have not yet returned, together with their pastors, into the bosom of the church, perhaps does not exceed 25,000. But though they are not numerous, it will not be denied that they are highly respectable; for, in this number they can rank many of the most distinguished both of the nobility and gentry, who avail themselves of the Act of Parliament lately passed in favour of this church, and cordially join in her communion.

This church can produce a very respectable list of learned names, among which may be ranked those of Spotswood, Forbes, Leighton, Wishart, Keith, Guthrie, Scougal, Campbell, Sage, Rattray, Skinner, &c. &c. The education of the clergy of this church is not worse, and in several instances it is even better, than what the clergy of the establishment usually receive; and some of them would do credit to any church. As a body, they are certainly men of very distinguished learning, piety, and worth. Adam's Religious World Displayed, vol. ii. pp. 399—443.

SCOURGE, or whip. This punishment was very common among the Jews. Moses ordains, (Deut. xxv. 1, 2, 3.) that 'if there be a controversy between men, and they come unto judgment, that the judges may judge them; then they shall justify the righteous and condemn the wicked. And it shall be, if the wicked man be worthy to be beaten, that the judge shall cause him to lie down, and to be beaten before his face, according to his fault, by a certain number. Forty stripes he may give him, and not exceed; lest if he should exceed, and beat him above these with many stripes, then thy brother should seem vile unto thee.' There were two ways of giving the lash: one with thongs or whips made of rope's-ends, or straps of leather; the other with rods, twigs, or branches of some tree.

The Rabbins think that ordinary faults committed against the law, and scourged, were punished not with blows from a rod, but from a whip. They enumerate one hundred and sixty-eight faults liable to this penalty. They hold that all punishable faults, to which the law has not annexed the penalty of death, must be punished by the scourge. The offender was stripped from his shoulders to his middle; and he was tied by his arms to a pretty low pillar that he might lean forward, and the executioner might more easily come at his back. Some maintain that they never gave more nor less than thirty-nine strokes, but that in greater faults they struck with proportionate violence. Others think that, when the fault and circumstances required it, they might increase the number of blows. St. Paul informs us, (2 Cor. xi. 24.) that at five different times he received thirty-nine blows from the Jews: which would insinuate, that this was a fixed number, that they never exceeded.

The same apostle clearly shows in the same place, that the correction with rods was different from that with a whip; for he says 'thrice was I beaten with rods.' And when he was seized by the Jews in the temple, the tribune of the Roman soldiers ran, and took him out of the hands of the Jews; and desiring to know the reason of the tumult, he ordered him to be tied and stretched on the ground, to put him to the question, and to be beaten with rods, (Acts xxii. 24, 25.) ; for so commonly the Romans put to the question.

The bastinado is sometimes given on the back, and at this day, among the eastern people, is given on the soles of the feet raised aloft, while the patient lies down on his belly; this punishment is different from that of the scourge or the whip.

The Rabbins teach, that the penalty of the scourge was not ignominious; and that it could not be objected as a disgrace to those who had suffered it. They pretend that no Israelite, not even the king or high priest, was exempted from this law; but this must be understood of the punishment of whipping inflicted in their synagogues, which was rather a legal and particular penalty, than a public and shameful correction. Philo, speaking of the manner in which Flaccus treated the Jews of Alexandria, says, He made them suffer the punishment of the whip, which (says he) is not less insupportable to a free-man, than death itself. Our Saviour, speaking of the pains and ignominy of his passion, commonly puts his scourging in the second place. (Matt. xx. 19. Mark x. 34. Luke xviii. 33.)

SCRIBE, in Hebrew סֹפֵר, sepher; in Greek, Γραμματεὺς, Grammateus. The word scribe is very common in Scripture, and has several significations.

1. A clerk, writer, or secretary. This was a very considerable employment in the court of the kings of Judah; in which Scripture often mentions the secretaries, as the first officers of the crown. Seraiah was scribe or secretary to King David. (2 Sam. viii. 17.) Shevah and Shemaiah exercised the same office under the same prince. (1 Chron. xxiv. 6.) In Solomon's time we find Elihoreph and Ahiah secretaries to the king, (1 Kings iv. 3.); Shebna, under Hezekiah, (2 Kings xix. 2.); and Shaphan under Josiah, (2 Kings xxii. 8, 9, 10.) As there were but few in those times who could write well, the employment of a scribe, or writer, was very considerable.

2. A scribe is put for a commissary or muster-master of an army, who reviews the troops, keeps the list of roll, and calls them over. In the reign of Uzziah, king of Judah, is found Jeiel the scribe, who had under his hand the king's armies. (2 Chron. xxvi. 11.) At the time of the captivity, it is said, the captain of the guard, among other considerable persons, took the principal scribe of the host, or secretary at war, who mustered the people of the land. (2 Kings xxv. 19.)

3. Scribe, is put for an able and skilful man, a doctor of the law, a man of learning, one who understands affairs. Jonathan, David's uncle by the father's side, was a counsellor, a wise-man, and a scribe. (1 Chron. xxvii. 32.) Baruch, the disciple and secretary of Jeremiah, is also called a scribe; so is Gemariah, the son of Shaphan. (Jer. xxxvi. 26.) Ezra is celebrated as a skilful scribe in the law of God. (Ezra vii. 6.)

The scribes of the people, frequently mentioned in the Gospel, were public writers, and professed doctors of the law, which they read, and explained, to the people. Some place the origin of scribes under Moses; but their name does not appear till under the Judges. (Judg. v. 14.) Others think that David first instituted them, when he established the several classes of the priests and Levites. (1 Chron. xxiv. 6.) Epiphanius places their origin at the same time with the sect of the Sadducees. Mention is made in Acts, (xxiii. 9.) of scribes that were of the party of the Pharisees; which has made some believe that all the scribes were Pharisees. But they did not espouse any particular sect; there were some of all sects.

Scribes, and doctors of the law, in Scripture-phrases, mean the same thing. He that in Matthew (xxiii. 34.) is called a doctor of the law, in Mark (xii. 28.) is named a Scribe, or one of the Scribes. As the knowledge of the Jews, at that time, chiefly consisted in pharisaical traditions, and in the use of them to explain Scripture, the greater number of the doctors of the law, or of the Scribes, were Pharisees; and we almost always find them united in Scripture. They all valued themselves on their knowledge of the law, on their studying and teaching it: they had the key of knowledge, and sat in Moses's chair. (Luke xi. 52. Matt. xxiii. 2.) Epiphanius, and the author of the Recognitions, imputed to St. Clement, reckon the Scribes among the sects of the Jews; but it is certain, they made no sect by themselves; they were only distinguished by the study of the law.

SCRIPTURE is commonly used to denote the writings of the Old and New Testament, which are sometimes called the Scriptures, sometimes the sacred or holy Scriptures, and sometimes canonical Scripture. 'When we say that the sacred Scripture is the word of God, we do not mean that it was all spoken by him, or that it was written by him, or that all that is contained therein is the word of God; but a distinction is to be made between those precepts which inculcate justice, mercy, and holiness of life, and the historical parts which show the consequence of a life in opposition to those principles. The first are properly sacred, because they not only lead man to happiness, even in this life, but give him an 'evidence of things not seen,' in the life to come; and thus are called the word of God, as these perfections can only have their origin from the Fountain of all goodness. The last, though some are the words of good men—wicked men—the speeches of Satan; or, in other words, the personification of an evil spirit, and on this account cannot be called the word or words of God; yet even these parts have a similar tendency, as they show the malice, pride, and blasphemy of the spirit of wickedness; and, on the other hand, the beauty of that spirit of divine philanthropy, which, throughout the whole Bible, breathes nothing but 'peace on earth, and good-will towards men.'

'There is one argument to prove the authority of the word of God, which cannot be overturned by all the Deists in the world. If the Bible be not the word of God, it must have been written, or invented, either by good men, or wicked men; but if it can be proved that it was neither written nor invented, either by good men, or wicked men, it must be the word of God. That it was not written, or compiled by wicked men, will appear from its own evidence; for if it is to be judged, we must suffer that evidence to appear in its defence. Can any Deist be so weak as to suppose that wicked men, who were in the love and practice of evil, would frame laws to punish their own vices in this world, and condemn themselves to everlasting punishment by declaring, 'the wicked shall be turned into hell, with all the nations that forget God?' And again, 'Thou shalt not covet;' this reaches the thoughts and desires of the heart. These restrictions and declarations are opposite to those things which are contained in the religious books of the Mahometan and Pagan nations, which are the production of men, and in which permission is given to indulge in sensuality. This, so far, is a certain proof of the divine origin of the Bible. As evident it is, that good men could not be the authors of the Bible. For, had it been compiled by good men, the same good men neither could, nor would have given a lie to their profession, by calling it 'the word of God,' as it would only have been the word of men; consequently, the Bible must be the word of God, inspired by him, and thus given to man.

'It must be allowed, that God created the first of men; this being admitted, as it cannot be denied, we cannot doubt but he would give him a law, or knowledge to conduct himself in life. Now, whether the divine Author of our being condescended to speak it with an audible voice, to write it on the heart, as is said in Scripture, or whether he commissioned man by that spoken law, or from that writing on the heart, to write it in a book for the instruction of posterity, it amounts to the same; for the law, or word of God, first spoken, or written on the heart, and from thence written in a book, still remains to be the word of God, first given by him. The possibility of such inspiration must necessarily be allowed; for certainly it was no more wonderful for God to inspire man to write his will in a book, than it was to inspire him, or enable him to receive, by continual influx, a regular train of ideas.

'The question has long been asked by Deists, how shall we know that the Bible is the word of God? First, by being convinced from the Bible that the precepts therein contained are worthy of God; that the pure spirit which runs through the whole, inculcates nothing but love to God, and charity to all mankind, namely, 'thou shalt love the Lord thy God, with all thy heart.' (Deut. vi. 5.) 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.' (Levit. xix. 18. Matt. vii. 12. Luke x. 27.) These are the two great commandments which pervade every page of the Bible, which, on this account, is truly called sacred; these are sacred duties. For the recorded wickedness of the Jews, or of any other nation mentioned in the Bible, makes no part of the word of God, any farther than it shows that a departure from those precepts of true religion recorded therein, necessarily draws after it that train of fatal consequences, which is the result of that disobedience to the Divine command, when the whole sum and substance of true religion contained in those two great propositions, 'thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbour as thyself,' are not manifested in the life of man. Secondly, from the accomplishment of those things foretold by the prophets, beginning with Moses, and which, to the astonishment of every impartial man, have been fulfilling from their times to the present day. Now, as it must be evident that none but God could open to man those scenes of futurity, which have been realizing for the space of 3300 years, and as those precepts of morality contained in the Bible could never be gathered from the book of nature, as man must have been totally ignorant in a savage state; and as it is clear that he could not have been reformed, or civilized, without a knowledge of those precepts, they must have been given by the Creator; consequently, as far as demonstration can make truth appear, it is undeniably true that the sacred Scripture is the word of God.'

That the Scriptures were actually dictated by inspiration, may be inferred both from the reasonableness and from the necessity of the thing. It is reasonable that the sentiments and doctrines, developed in the Scriptures, should be suggested to the minds of the writers by the Supreme Being himself. They relate principally to matters concerning which the communicating of information to men is worthy of God; and the more important the information communicated, the more it is calculated to impress mankind, to preserve from moral error, to stimulate to holiness, to guide to happiness, the more reasonable it is to expect that God should make the communication in a manner free from every admixture or risk of error. Indeed, the notion of inspiration enters essentially into our ideas of a revelation from God; so that to deny inspiration, is tantamount to affirming there is no revelation. And why should it be denied? Is man out of the reach of Him who created him? Has He, who gave man his intellect, no means of enlarging or illuminating that intellect? And is it beyond His power to illuminate and inform, in an especial manner, the intellects of some chosen individuals,—or contrary to his wisdom, to preserve them from error when they communicate to others, either orally or by writing, the knowledge He imparted to them, not merely for their own benefit, but for that of the world at large, in all generations? But farther, the subjects of Scripture render inspiration necessary.—Some past facts recorded in the Bible could not possibly have been known, had not God revealed them. Many things are recorded there as future, that is, are predicted, which God alone could foreknow and foretell, which, notwithstanding, came to pass, and which, therefore, were foretold under Divine inspiration. Others, again, are far above human capacity, and could never have been discovered by men; these, therefore, must have been delivered by Divine inspiration. The authoritative language of Scripture, too, argues the necessity of inspiration, admitting the veracity of the writers. They propose things not as matters for consideration, but for adoption; they do not leave us the alternative of receiving or rejecting; do not present us with their own thoughts; but exclaim, 'Thus saith the Lord,' and on that ground demand our assent. They must, of necessity, therefore, speak and write as they 'were inspired by the Holy Ghost.'

A late writer recommends that the Scriptures be perused with the following dispositions: 'In the first place,' he observes, 'study them devoutly. Remember that they are the word of God; that they were written under the superintendence of his Spirit; and that their great purpose was to introduce and extend over the whole earth the Gospel and the kingdom of his Son. Remember, also, that they were written to conduct you to salvation through faith in Christ Jesus. Read them, therefore, with reverence and holy fear; and make it your earnest and constant prayer to Him, from whom alone cometh every good and perfect gift, that His grace may open your understanding, enable you clearly to comprehend the import of the Sacred Writings, and deeply impress it upon your heart. Secondly, study the Scriptures with humility; with a sincere desire to receive instruction from them, and to submit your own opinions to the declared will of your Maker and your Saviour. If we may judge, by the manner in which some persons speak concerning the Scriptures, of the temper and spirit with which they read them, we may almost conclude that they read them for the purpose of cavilling, finding fault, and raising difficulties and objections. Be not thus blind and presumptuous. If you take up your Bible with Christian humility, you will not say concerning any doctrine, "This is a strange and unreasonable doctrine, and I cannot receive it." Your language will be, "This doctrine is clearly contained in the word of God, and therefore must be true." You will not say, concerning any rule of practice, "This is a hard and grievous commandment, and I may be excused from regarding it very strictly." Your language will be, "This commandment is positively enjoined by my Lord and Judge, and I must obey it, if I would prove my love to him, or escape condemnation at the last day." Finally, read the Scriptures with a full purpose of heart, not merely to learn what they require of you, but faithfully to practise it, through God's blessed assistance, every day of your life. "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father." (Matt. vii. 21.) "Not the hearers of the law are just before God; but the doers of the law shall be justified." (Rom. ii. 13.) If you read the Scriptures carelessly, or merely from custom, or rather from a spirit of curiosity than from anxiety to profit by them, and to grow in grace; you do not read them as you ought to read the word of your Maker. You do not read them like a person solicitous above all things to obtain through Christ the kingdom of heaven; and conscious that it will be bestowed by Christ on those only, who strive according to their power to learn from the Scriptures the way of his commandments, and faithfully to walk in it, by his help, unto death.' SEA, in Latin, Mare; in Hebrew יָם, Jam; in Greek, θάλασσα, Thalassa. The Hebrews give the name of Sea to all great collections of water, to lakes, or pools. The Sea of Galilee, or of Tiberias, or of Cinnereth, is the Lake of Tiberias, or Gennesareth, in Galilee. The Red Sea, the Sea of the Wilderness, the Sea of the East, the Sea of Sodom, the Salt Sea, the Sea of Asphaltites, or of Bitumen, is the Lake Asphaltites, or the Lake of Sodom. The Sea of Semehon is the lake of that name. The Sea of Jazer is the lake near the city of Jazer, beyond Jordan. The Sea of Suph or Zuph, is the Red Sea. The Western Sea, or the Great Sea, or Hindermost Sea, is the Mediterranean.

Sea was also the name given to a very great brazen basin, that Solomon caused to be made for the temple, for the convenience of the priests, who there washed the feet and bowels of the sacrifices, and the instruments used in sacrificing.

The Arabians and Orientals sometimes give the name of Sea to the great rivers, as the Nile, the Euphrates, the Tigris, and others, which, by their magnitude, and by the extent of their overflowings, seem as little seas, or great lakes. There are several passages in Scripture, whose explication would be almost impossible without this principle. Isaiah (xi. 15.) says, 'The Lord shall utterly destroy the tongue of the Egyptian Sea, and with his mighty wind shall he shake his hand over the river, and shall smite it in the seven streams, and make men go over dry-shod.' The Nile is here called the Egyptian Sea, and the whole description of the prophet marks out the Nile, and its seven mouths.

The country of Babylon, which was watered by the Euphrates, is called by the same prophet, 'the desert of the sea.' (Isaiah xxi. 1.) Jeremiah (li. 36.) speaks of the city of Babylon in the same manner: 'I will dry up her sea, and make her springs dry.' Isaiah, (xxvii. 1.) speaking of the king of Babylon, calls him leviathan, or 'the dragon that is in the sea.' Ezekiel gives the same name to the king of Egypt, (xxxii. 2.): 'Thou art as a whale in the seas,' because his habitation was on the banks of the Nile.

The Great Sea, or the Western Sea, the Hindermost Sea, the Sea of the Philistines, generally expresses the Mediterranean, which lay west of the Land of Promise, and was considered as behind a man who should look toward the sun-rising, having his left hand to the north, and his right hand to the south. The sea is often put for the west, as the right is put for the south. On the Mediterranean Jonah embarked; and on this sea they floated the timber cut down from Mount Libanus, which was brought to Joppa, for building the temple.

The RED SEA, called by the ancients Sinus Arabicus, and now Gulfo de Mecca, is that part or branch of the Southern Sea which interposes itself between Egypt on the west, Arabia Felix and some part of Arabia Petræa on the east, while the northern bounds of it touch on Idumæa, or the coast of Edom. Edom, in the Hebrew tongue, signifies red, and was the name given to Esau for selling his birthright for a mess of pottage. This country, which his posterity possessed, was called after his name, and so was the sea which adjoined to it; but the Greeks, not understanding the reason of the appellation, translated it into their tongue, and called it ἰρυθρὰ θαλάσση; thence the Latins mare rubrum, and we the Red Sea.

It is called Yam Suph, 'the weedy sea,' in several passages, (Numb. xxxiii. 10. Psalm cvi. 9. &c.) which are improperly rendered 'the Red Sea.' Some learned authors have supposed that it was so named from the quantity of weeds in it. 'But, in contradiction to this,' says Bruce, 'I must confess, that I never in my life (and I have seen the whole extent of it) saw a weed of any sort in it. And, indeed, upon the slightest consideration, it will appear to any one, that a narrow gulf, under the immediate influence of monsoons, blowing from contrary points six months each year, would have too much agitation to produce such vegetables, seldom found but in stagnant water, and seldomer, if ever, found in salt ones. My opinion, then, is, that it is from the large trees, or plants, of white coral, perfectly in imitation of plants on land, that the sea has taken its name. I saw one of these, which, from a root nearly central, threw out ramifications in a nearly circular form, measuring twenty-six feet diameter every way.'

The Arabs at this day name it Bahrel Chalzem, that is, the Sea of Clysmā, from a town situated on its western coast, much about the place where the Israelites passed over from the Egyptian to the Arabian shore. But as the word Clysmā may denote a drowning or overflowing with water, it is not improbable that the town built in this place, as well as this part of the sea, might have such a name given it in memory of the fate of the Egyptians, who were drowned in it.

Every one knows the famous miracle of the passage over the Red Sea, when the Lord opened this sea, dried it up, and made the Israelites pass through it, dry-shod, to the number of 600,000, without reckoning old men, women, or children. Some ancient authors have advanced, that Moses, having lived long near the Red Sea, in the country of Midian, had observed that it kept its regular ebbing and flowing like the ocean; so that, taking advantage of the time of the ebb, he led the Hebrews over; but the Egyptians, not knowing the nature of the sea, and rashly entering it just before the return of the tide, were all swallowed up and drowned, as Moses relates. Thus the priests of Memphis explained it; and this opinion has been adopted by a great number of moderns. In the queries of Michaelis, sent to Niebuhr, when in Egypt, it was proposed to him to inquire upon the spot, 'whether there were not some ridges of rocks where the water was shallow, so that an army at particular times may pass over? Secondly, whether the Etesian winds, which blow strongly all summer from the north-west, could not blow so violently against the sea as to keep it back on a heap; so that the Israelites might have passed without a miracle?' A copy of these queries was left also for Mr. Bruce, the traveller, who justly observed as follows: 'I must confess, however learned the gentlemen were who proposed these doubts, I did not think they merited any attention to solve them. This passage is told us by Scripture to be a miraculous one; and if so, we have nothing to do with natural causes. If we do not believe Moses, we need not believe the transaction at all, seeing that it is from his authority alone we derive it. If we believe in God, that he made the sea, we must believe he could divide it when he sees proper reason; and of that he must be the only judge. It is no greater miracle to divide the Red Sea than to divide the river Jordan. If the Etesian wind, blowing from the north-west in summer, could keep up the sea as a wall on the right, or to the south, of fifty feet high; still the difficulty would remain of building the wall on the left hand, or to the north. Besides, water standing in that position for a day, must have lost the nature of fluid. Whence came that cohesion of particles which hindered that wall to escape at the sides? This is as great a miracle as that of Moses. If the Etesian winds had done this once, they must have repeated it many a time before and since, from the same causes.' It appears, however, from the accurate observations of Niebuhr and Bruce, that there is no ledge of rocks running across the gulf any where, to afford a shallow passage. The second query, about the Etesian, or northerly wind, is refuted by the express mention of a strong easterly wind blowing across, and scooping out a dry passage; not that it was necessary for Omnipotence to employ it there as an instrument, any more than at Jordan; but it seems to be introduced in the sacred history by way of anticipation, to exclude the natural agency that might in after times be employed for solving the miracle. It is remarkable, that the monsoon in the Red Sea blows the summer half of the year from the north, the winter half from the south; neither of which could produce the miracle in question. The tides in this sea are moderate. At Suez the difference between high and low water did not exceed from three to four feet, according to Niebuhr's observations on the tides in that gulf, during the years 1762 and 1763.

It is evident from the text of Moses, and other sacred authors, who have mentioned this miraculous passage, that no other account is supportable, than that which supposes the Hebrews to cross over the sea from shore to shore, in a vast space of dry ground, which was left void by the waters at their retiring. (Exod. xiv. 16, 17. &c.) In the canticle that Moses sang at their coming out of the Red Sea, he says, (Exod. xv. 8.) 'With the blast of thy nostrils (or, with the wind of thy fury), the waters were gathered together; the flood stood upright as an heap, and the depths were congealed in the heart of the sea.' The Psalmist says, (Psalm lxxviii. 13.), 'He divided the sea, and caused them to pass through, and he made the waters to stand as on a heap.' He says, in another place, that the sea fled at the sight of God, (Psalm cxiv. 3. 5.); that the Lord made himself a path in the sea; that he walked in the midst of the waters, (Psalm lxxvii. 19.) Isaiah (lxiii. 11, &c.) says, that the Lord divided the waves before his people; that he conducted them through the bottom of the abyss, as a horse is led through the midst of a field. Habakkuk (iii. 15.) says, that the Lord made himself a road to drive his chariot and horses across the sea, across the mud of great waters. Lastly, the author of the book of Wisdom (xix. 7, 8.; x. 17, 18.) says, that the dry land appeared all on a sudden in a place where water was before; that a free passage was opened in a moment through the midst of the Red Sea; and that a green field was seen in the midst of the abyss, &c.

It is thought that the place where the Hebrews passed the Red Sea is two or three leagues below its northern point, at the place called Kolsum, or Clysmā. Dr. Hales observes, that 'it sufficiently appears, even from Niebuhr's own statement, that the passage of the Israelites could not have taken place near Suez: for, 1. he evidently confounded the town of Kolsum, the ruins of which he places near Suez, and where he supposed the passage to be made, with the bay of Kolsum, which began about 45 miles lower down; as Bryant has satisfactorily proved from the astronomical observations of Ptolemy and Ulug Beigh, made at Heroum, the ancient head of the gulf. 2. Instead of crossing the sea at or near Etham, their second station, the Israelites "turned" southwards, along the western shore; and their third station at Pihahiroth or Bedea, was at least a full day's journey below Etham; as Bryant has satisfactorily proved from Scripture.' The Dead Sea, Salt Sea, Eastern Sea, Sea of Sodom, Sea of the Wilderness, or of the Plain. This is the lake Asphaltites, to which Josephus allows five hundred and fourscore furlongs in length, and one hundred and fifty furlongs in breadth, that is, about twenty-five leagues long, and five or six broad. See ASPHAR.

The brazen or molten Sea, that Solomon made for the temple, was ten cubits in diameter from side to side, and therefore about thirty cubits in circumference. Taking the Hebrew cubit at twenty inches and a half, the ten cubits make seventeen feet and an inch; and the thirty cubits make fifty-one feet and three inches. This vessel was round, and in depth five cubits. The brim was adorned with an edging, and embellished with lilies, and knobs, and oxens' heads in demi-relief. It contained three thousand baths, (2 Chron. iv. 5.) or two thousand baths, (1 Kings vii. 26.) This, says Calmet, may be reconciled, by saying, that the cup or bowl contained two thousand baths, and the foot, which was hollow, contained a thousand more. Thus this great vessel was but of one capacity within, though it seemed without to be double. This sea was supported by its foot now mentioned, which was a thick hollow column; besides which, it was supported by twelve oxen of brass, disposed into four groups, by three in a group, and leaving four passages between, by which the priests went to draw water by three cocks fixed to the foot of this vessel. (1 Kings vii. 23, &c. 2 Chron. iv. 2, 3, 4, 5. &c.)

In the Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary, another solution is offered. The writer observes that the Jerusalem Talmud and Maimonides agree, that a pipe of water came into the Brazen Sea out of the well or fountain Etam; and that the construction of a fountain implies pipes, &c. for forcing the water upwards, and corresponding pipes, for passing the water through (or at least among) the oxen, &c. around this basin. Hence he thinks that the author of Chronicles does not merely state the quantity of water which this basin held, but that also which was necessary to work it, to keep it flowing as a fountain; that which was necessary to fill the basin, and its accompaniments. 'I support this opinion,' says he, 'by observing the different phraseology used in the two passages: in 1 Kings vii. 26. "it contained—comprehended—held" (יָחַל, icil) 2,000 baths;" but in 2 Chron. iv. 5. we have two words used; one, as before, "it held," (icil),—the other (מָחַק, mechetzik), "it received." Now the writer would not have used two words, adding another word, merely to signify the same thing: there is, then, a difference between this receiving, and this holding. It received, when playing as a fountain; and when all its parts were filled for that purpose, they, together with the sea itself, received 3,000 baths; whereas it only held 2,000 baths, that is, the sea exclusively, and when its contents were restricted to those of the circular basin. It received—and held—three thousand baths.' Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary of the Holy Bible, No. ccliv. pp. 154, 155.

The Sea of Egypt (Isa. xi. 15.) means that part of the Mediterranean along the coasts of Egypt.

The tongue of the Sea. The Hebrews and Arabians call that a tongue of the sea which runs into the land; as we call that a tongue, or neck of land, which advances into the sea. (Josh. xv. 5.; xviii. 19. Isa. xi. 15.)

SEAH, a kind of measure among the Hebrews. Its capacity was about two gallons and a half, liquid measure; or about a peck, dry measure.

SEAL. The ancient Hebrews wore their seals, or signets, in rings on their fingers; or in bracelets on their arms (as is now the custom in the East). Haman sealed the decree of king Ahasuerus against the Jews with the king's seal. (Esth. iii. 12.) The priests of Bel desired the king to seal the door of their temple with his own seal. The spouse in the Canticles (viii. 6.) wishes that his spouse would wear him as a signet on her arm.

Pliny observes, that the use of seals, or signets, was rare at the time of the Trojan war, and that they were under the necessity of closing their letters with several knots. But among the Hebrews they are much more ancient. Judah left his seal as a pledge with Tamar. (Gen. xxxviii. 25.) Moses says, (Deut. xxxii. 34.) that God keeps sealed up in his treasuries, under his own seal, the instruments of his vengeance. Job says, (ix. 7.) that he keeps the stars as under his seal; and allows them to appear when he thinks proper. He says also, 'My transgression is sealed up in a bag.' (Job xiv. 17.)

When they intended to seal up a letter, or a book, they wrapped it round with flax, or thread, then applied the wax to it, and afterwards the seal. The Lord commanded Isaiah to tie up or wrap up the book in which his prophecies were written, and to seal them till the time he should bid him publish them. (Isaiah viii. 16, 17.)

He gives the same command to Daniel, (xii. 4.) The book that was shown to St. John the Evangelist, (Rev. v. 1.; vi. 1, 2, &c.) was sealed with seven seals. It was a rare thing to put such a number of seals; but that indicated the great importance and secrecy of the matter.

In civil contracts they generally made two originals; one continued open, and was kept by him for whose interest the contract was made; the other was sealed, and deposited in some public office. It was sealed up to prevent any fraud or falsification. Jeremiah (xxxii. 10, 11, 14.) bought a field in his country of Anathoth, of one called Hananeel; he himself wrote the contract, called witnesses, and sealed it up: he put it into the hands of his disciple Baruch, and said, 'Take these evidences, this evidence of the purchase, both which is sealed, and this evidence which is open; and put them in an earthen vessel, that they may continue many days.' A late writer asks, 'Was Jeremiah's earthen pot, which might last "without becoming rotten" many days, destined to inclose the purchase-deeds of this field, to be buried somewhere in the field itself, if possible, in order to be preserved for production at a future period, as evidence of the purchase? This seems to be strengthened by the consideration, that, at a future period likewise foretold, and ascertained by this prophet, the inhabitants should be restored to their own lands, and, in order to resume them, they should seek after such tokens of their forefathers' possession; at which time, being able to describe the contents of such vessels, the identity of their persons and families, and the truth of their claims, should appear undeniable. If this pot was buried in the city of Jerusalem, the same end would be answered (though not so completely), since Baruch might inform the proper heirs where to seek for it, and how to describe its contents. The method of sealing, and the word here rendered seal, does not restrictively imply a waxen seal, or a seal for evidence only, but to close up, to secure, by some solid or some glutinous matter. (Deut. xxxii. 34.) In Job (xxxviii. 14.) a seal is mentioned as being made of clay; which, indeed, is customary in the East. Suppose, then, this deed were enclosed in a roll of some strong substance, pitched over, to protect it from water, or surrounded with a coat of firm clay, for the same purpose, and placed at the bottom of an earthen vessel; while the writing not thus enclosed, or coated over, was laid among a quantity of dry matters, 'stones, bricks, or sea-sand,' at the top of the vessel. In this case, both, or very probably one of them, in an earthen vessel well closed up, and carefully buried, might last a much longer time than seventy years; and the peculiarity of its contents might be much longer remembered by those to whom it was communicated. As Jeremiah could not himself go out of his prison, he delivers these deeds to Baruch, for the purpose of their preservation from the general pillage, burning, &c. of the city, when taken; in which otherwise they had little chance of escaping total destruction; and, probably, for the purpose of being buried.'

That clay is still used for the purpose of sealing, the following from Norden is a proof: 'The doors are shut only with wooden locks; but the inspectors of this granary, after having shut the door, put on it their seal, on a handful of clay, which they make use of as wax.' Was this the kind of seal used to seal our Lord's sepulchre? (Matt. xxvii. 66.) 'Securing the sepulchre, by sealing the stone, and setting a watch.' (Dan. ix. 24.; xii. 4. 9. Job xiv. 17.) Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary, No. lxxx. pp. 138, 139.

SECEDERS. The appellation Seceder is derived from the Latin word secedo, to separate, or to withdraw from any body of men with which we have been united; and the Seceders are a numerous body of Presbyterians, whose predecessors first broke off from the established kirk in Scotland about the year 1733.

This secession arose from various circumstances, which the Seceders conceived to be great defections from the established constitution of the kirk. Among others, it was enacted by the General Assembly, that no notice should be taken, in their records, of any dissents or protests against their decisions; and in 1732, the Assembly had under their consideration an overture, which proposed to give the power of electing ministers for vacant parishes, when the patron should not exercise his right, to the majority of heritors and elders, on the simple condition of the heritors being Protestants; their non-residence, or their attachment to Episcopacy, and the exiled family, being considered as no disqualification. Many presbyteries opposed this overture; and remonstrances were presented against it, subscribed by forty-two ministers, and more than seventeen hundred private Christians. However, it was passed into an act: soon after which, Mr. Ebenezer

Erskine, minister at Stirling, in a sermon, preached at the opening of the synod of Perth and Stirling, testified against some things which he considered as public evils; particularly this act, and the conduct of church-courts in the mode of settling ministers. The synod pronounced him worthy of censure: upon which he, with several other ministers, protested and appealed to the General Assembly; which sustained the decision of the synod. Mr. E. then protested against this sentence also, as infringing on the right of ministers to testify against sinful courses, and as subjecting him to censure for what he conceived to be his duty. Three other ministers, namely, Messrs. William Wilson of Perth, Alexander Moncrieff of Abernethy, and James Fisher of Kinclaven, adhered to this protest. All the four were afterwards suspended, and eventually loosed from their relation to their respective charges, because they refused to withdraw their protest, and profess their sorrow for what they had done. In their protest against the latter decision, they declared, that 'they were laid under the necessity of making a secession, not from the principles of the Church of Scotland, as stated in her tests of orthodoxy, but from the prevailing party in that church, till they should see and amend their errors.' They accordingly, in 1733, formed themselves into a presbytery, to which they gave the name of Associate, that they might consistently adhere to their principles, and afford assistance to oppressed congregations.

They soon after published what they called 'A Testimony to the doctrine, worship, government, and discipline of the Church of Scotland,' in which they state their secession on the following grounds:—1. That the prevailing party were breaking down the Presbyterian constitution, by trampling on those fundamental rules of the church, which limit the mode of procedure in the framing of new acts; by their tyranny with respect to the settlement of vacant parishes; by their ejection of ministers, merely for protesting against an act of Assembly; and by their threatening with the highest censures those who should admit to communion such as could not in conscience acknowledge the ministry of intruders. 2. That their conduct had a direct tendency to corrupt the doctrine of the church; particularly, in dismissing Professor Simson of Glasgow, without any adequate censure; though it had been proved, that, besides several other dangerous errors, he had taught, that the Son is not God equal with the Father; and in caressing Professor Campbell of St. Andrews, though, in his writings, he had taught that self-love is the chief motive to all virtuous actions; and had ridiculed practical religion as enthusiasm. 3. That sinful silence was imposed upon ministers, as a term of communion, in direct opposition to their vows at ordination. 4. That they disregarded all means used for reclaiming them from their sinful courses. And, 5. That the brethren, who made this secession, found themselves otherwise precluded from maintaining a proper testimony against these and other evils.

In 1734, the General Assembly empowered the Synod of Perth and Stirling to restore these ministers to their parishes; and they have been blamed for not returning to the establishment on this occasion. But they judged that the principal grounds of their secession were yet remaining, as this appointment neither condemned the act of the preceding Assembly, nor the conduct of the commission; as there had been no sufficient testimony against intrusions, or against the corrupt doctrine taught in the church; and as there had been no vindication of the right of ministers to testify against defections. This appointment they therefore considered to be rather an act of grace than of justice; and, no proper preparation having been made for the injury done to truth, they conceived they could not return to the church-courts on this ground. They afterwards published what was called a Judicial Testimony, Act, Declaration, &c. more particularly expressing their adherence to former reformatations, and their condemnation of various courses of defection. This was enacted in 1736, and to this it has been the custom to require an accession from all those who are admitted to communion with the society.

The leaders in the establishment being greatly provoked by the plainness of this second Testimony, and the success with which it was attended; as it was followed by the accession of several ministers, and of a great body of private Christians; the seceding ministers were libelled, and cited to appear before the Assembly, in 1739. But when they appeared, as the Assembly chiefly consisted of intruders, and of others deeply engaged in defection, they declined its authority, as not being a rightly constituted court of Christ. In consequence of this, without any charge, either of error or of immorality, they were deposed by the next Assembly, in 1740, from the ministerial office, as to the exercise of it in the establishment. As they declared their adherence to the covenants of their ancestors, they proceeded in 1743, to renew them, in a bond, or engagement, suited to their circumstances. In this, they tell us, they did not intermeddle with civil matters, but entirely confined themselves to those that are sacred, or such things as are properly connected with religion. In 1745, the seceding ministers were become so numerous, that they divided themselves into three different presbyteries, under one synod.

In their synod every thing was conducted with the greatest harmony, till they entered on the consideration of the following clause contained in the Burgess-oath, administered in several of the royal boroughs of Scotland.—‘I protest before God, and your lordships, that I profess, and allow with my heart, the true religion, presently professed within this realm, and authorized by the laws thereof: I shall abide thereat, and defend the same to my life’s end, renouncing the Roman religion called Papistry.’—Messrs. Ebenezer and Ralph Erskine, James Fisher, and others, maintained that there was no inconsistency in Seceders swearing this oath, because the religion established in Scotland was still the true religion, notwithstanding all the faults in the manner of professing or settling it; and these, on account of their sentiments, were called Burghers. Messrs. Alexander Moncrieff, Thomas Mair, Adam Gib, and others, no less warmly contended that this clause could not be sworn by Seceders, without a renunciation of their Testimony; because swearing to the true religion presently professed and authorized by the laws, imported a swearing to it as professed and authorized; and, therefore, an approbation, under the solemnity of an oath, of those very corruptions which they had already condemned; and hence they were denominated Antiburghers.

This rupture took place in 1747, since which period they have met in different synods, and no attempts to effect a reunion have yet been successful. They still hold separate communion, although much of their former hostility has been laid aside; and each of the societies, thus divided, has still claimed to itself the lawful constitution of the Associate Synod. The Antiburghers consider the Burghers as too lax, and not sufficiently stedfast to their testimony. The Burghers, on the other hand, contend that the Antiburghers are too rigid, in that they have introduced new terms of communion into the society.

Both parties tell us that the established Kirk of Scotland still perseveres in a course of defection from her professed principles; and the grounds of secession, which at first were sufficient to justify a separation from her communion, have been increasing, say they, in number and in strength to the present day.

Both parties of Seceders avow their adherence to the Scriptures as the only rule of faith and practice; and as they believe that few deary confessions of faith for subordinate standards, but in order to vent some erroneous dream, they also avow their adherence to the Westminster Confession of Faith, the Assembly’s Catechisms, larger and shorter, and to the Directory for Worship, and Form of Presbyterian Church-government, thereto subjoined, and to the National Covenant of Scotland, and Solemn League of the Three Kingdoms. So that their church-government is presbyterian, and their tenets are strictly Calvinistic.

In the year 1742, the Associate Presbytery published An Act concerning the Doctrine of Grace, vindicating it against different acts of Assembly, passed in prejudice of it. Their form of worship is the same as in the established Kirk; and their discipline ‘is much the same as what was once universally practised in the Church of Scotland, but now almost generally disused. Hence sundry of the less conscientious Seceders falling into scandal, return to the established church, that they may altogether avoid, or only receive a very slight censure.’

SECEDERS, BURGHER.—For thirty years past the increase of both parties in the secession has been rapid and extensive, and the congregations belonging to both are now about two hundred, or more; some of which consist of upwards of one thousand members. Which party has the greatest number of followers, is not ascertained; but the Antiburghers have all along had the greatest number of ministers, though even in this respect the Burghers seem to gain ground. The supreme court among the Burghers is styled The Burgher Associate Synod, of which there is one in Scotland, and another in Ireland. The Synod in Scotland, which commonly meets in Edinburgh in May and September, is subdivided into ten, and that of Ireland into four presbyteries. They have also a presbytery in Nova Scotia. The number of their ministers in Britain, was, in 1802, almost an hundred, besides vacant charges, which were then upwards of twenty. They are legally tolerated in Ireland; and government lately granted 500*l.* per annum, and have now added other 500*l.* for their ministers; which, when divided among them, affords about 20*l.* to each, over and above the stipend which he receives from his hearers.

SECEDERS, ANTIBURGHER.—The constitution of the Antiburgher society differs very little from that of the Burghers. The supreme court among them is designated The General Associate or Antiburgher Synod; having under its jurisdiction three provincial synods in Scotland, and one in Ireland. They have also several presbyteries lately formed into a synod, within the bounds of the United States of North America; and a presbytery in Nova Scotia, immediately depending on the General Synod. The three Synods of Edinburgh, Perth, and Glasgow, in Scotland, consist of three presbyteries each; and besides these, those of Elgin and Aberdeen are in immediate subordination to the General Synod. The Synod of Ireland consists of five presbyteries, namely, Markethill, Belfast, Templepatrick, and Ahoghill, Derry, and Newton Limavady. They have also a few congregations in England, under the inspection of different presbyteries in Scotland.

In this branch of the secession, covenanting is practised in particular congregations occasionally, when a considerable number of individuals testify their desire of an opportunity to satisfy their ministers with respect to their knowledge of the nature and circumstances of the duty. It is not, however, imposed upon any; nor is it commonly repeated by the same persons. On the other hand, the Burghers acknowledge, that covenanting is a moral duty, and that the solemn vows of their ancestors are obligatory. But since the separation, they have never engaged in the work; and the reason they have assigned for not doing it, is, that this is not the proper season.

The General Associate Synod have published a display of their principles in a Testimony, and Narrative prefixed; in which they are exhibited in a more simple form than before, as they had till that time been dispersed through a variety of different publications. 'The simplification of her principles did not seem to be all that was necessary in the secession church. She had been charged by other societies with persecuting principles. Many of her members, both in public and private stations, had, for many years, found the difficulty even of satisfying their own minds on this head. Private Christians had often felt scruples with respect to the usual engagements at receiving baptism for their children. Candidates for the ministry had submitted to be licensed, or to be ordained, only in the way of having liberty granted them to express to the court in what sense only they could be viewed as giving their assent to some articles in the public profession.

'It was admitted, that, so far back as the year 1743, the Associate Presbytery had given such an account of the origin and nature of magistracy, as to secure the rights of conscience. For they taught, that the whole institution and end of the office of civil rulers, "lie within the compass of natural principles." But a variety of other assertions, in their public papers, did not seem perfectly to tally with this doctrine. Particularly, they were at a loss to reconcile with this a clause in what was commonly called The Judicial Act and Testimony, enacted in 1736, in which the presbytery condemn as sinful the toleration granted to Episcopalian Dissenters in Scotland, by the act of Queen Anne, 1712, calling it "an almost boundless toleration, by which the government and discipline of this church were exceedingly weakened, and a wide door was opened for laxness in principle; as a stroke and judgment upon this church and land." The same language was used in the former Acknowledgment of Sins, with this addition, that, "in consequence of this toleration, the superstitious and corrupt worship of the Church of England is set up in all the corners of the land."

'They also found it necessary to extend the limitation with which the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland had at first received the Westminster Confession of Faith, especially with respect to that article, in which it is declared, that though "the civil magistrate may not assume the power of the keys of the kingdom of heaven, yet he hath authority, and it is his duty, to take order that all blasphemies and heresies be suppressed," &c.; and that which declares, that those "who publish erroneous opinions, which are destructive to the external peace and order that Christ hath established in the church—may lawfully be called to account, and proceeded against," not only "by the censures of the church," but "by the power of the civil magistrate."

'As they acknowledge the obligation of the covenants of their ancestors, they also found it necessary to be more explicit than they had formerly been, in declaring in what sense they adhered to them; and particularly, as the term extirpation, used in the Solemn League, had been generally understood as implying a resolution to employ carnal power, they found it necessary to declare (as they have actually done in the New Display of their Testimony,) that "whatever means any persons, either in former or present times, might think themselves bound to employ for the extirpation of these evils (popery, prelacy, &c.); yet they, "in adhering to the religious reformation engaged to in this covenant, utterly disclaim all obligation to use any methods inconsistent with liberty of conscience in prosecuting the ends of it."

'As some seemed to have their minds warped with the idea of covenant-obligation arising from civil deeds and acts of parliaments, it seemed also necessary to rest it on its proper ground—the voluntary act of the Church of Christ.

'While the overture, containing a new statement of the principles of the secession, was before the supreme court, several members opposed the proposed alteration; although it is a well-known fact, that some of these had formerly the very same scruples with their brethren. Even when this overture was enacted, with very few dissenting voices, the General Synod wished to exercise all tenderness towards those who differed from them. They could not, indeed, admit the use of two Formulas, or of two Acknowledgments of Sins. But they were willing, as far as possible, to dispense with any concurrence on the part of their dissenting brethren, in giving licence or ordination. Nor did they enforce any procedure in covenanting on any of them. They carried their forbearance so far, indeed, as to allow their brethren to receive accessions to the former Testimony, if they did not reject those persons who preferred the other. Four ministers, however, protested against the synod, and afterwards formed themselves into a presbytery. In their protest, they assert, that the synod, because they prohibited the use of the former Acknowledgment and Formula, had excluded them from communion by the new terms and constitution which they had adopted. But the forbearance of the synod shows on what a slender foundation this charge is founded. They also affirmed, that the system of doctrine formerly held, "explicitly avows a right of private judgment competent to every man in all moral or religious concerns; so as not, however, to be incompatible with the right of rulers, civil or ecclesiastical, to judge and act in subordination to divine laws, natural or revealed, for promoting the public good." But it is obvious, that here the "right of private judgment" is so clogged, that there is reason to suspect that those who should claim the benefit of it might be permitted only to think for themselves; and that the free exercise of their religion might be reckoned inconsistent with the public good.

'They charged the General Synod with Independent and sectarian principles, for no other reason, as far as appeared, but because, in former times, the doctrine of toleration was accounted a sectarian error by too many who called themselves Presbyterians.

'The Synod were also represented as opposing public reformation, merely because they did not see the propriety of carrying on this by means of carnal weapons, or of blending civil and sacred things in the same covenant. It was also affirmed that the Synod had "raised a new partition wall between the secession and the established church, which would prevent a re-union, even although the corruptions were removed of which the Seceders at first complained."

The agitation of these and other questions respecting the connexion between Church and State, and national covenants, and the introduction of changes into the public formularies, occasioned a division in this branch also of the secession, and the establishment of a new presbytery, called the Constitutional Associate Presbytery, the name by which they wish to be distinguished. Adam's Religious World Displayed, vol. iii. pp. 192—212.

SEEKERS, a denomination which arose in the year 1645. They derived their name from maintaining that the true church, ministry, Scripture, and ordinances, were lost, for which they were seeking. They taught that the Scriptures were uncertain; that present miracles were necessary to faith; that our ministry is without authority; and that our worship and ordinances are unnecessary, or vain. Adam's View of all Religions, p. 281.

SE'IR, שַׁיִר, signifies rough, hairy; otherwise, a kid, or a dæmon; otherwise, barley-like, that is, bearded; or season. Seir, the Horite, whose dwelling was east and south of the Dead Sea, in the mountains of Seir, where at first reigned the descendants of Seir the Horite. (Gen. xxxvi. 20, 21—30. 1 Chron. i. 38, 39, &c.)

The posterity of Esau afterwards possessed the mountains of Seir, and Esau himself dwelt there when Jacob returned from Mesopotamia. (Gen. xxxii. 3.; xxxiii. 14.; xxxvi. 8, 9.) Moses acquaints us (Deut. ii. 12.) that Esau made war with the Horites, and destroyed them; but we know no particulars. Seir, the father of the Horites, must needs be very ancient, since his children were already a powerful and numerous people in the time of Abraham, before the birth of Isaac, when Chedorlaomer and his confederates came to make war against the kings of Pentapolis. (Gen. xiv. 6.) It is without good reason, what some have advanced, that Esau himself had borne the name of Seir, or the hairy; for he was never known by this name, though his country is often called the country of Seir, because of its original inhabitants.

SEIR, or the mountains of Seir, were east and south of the Dead Sea. Moses tells us, there were eleven days' journey between Horeb and Kadesh-barnea, by the way of Seir. (Deut. i. 2, 4, 5, 8, &c.) Deborah says, that the Lord is come forth from Seir. (Judges v. 4.) Moses affirms, that the Lord appeared to his people at Seir, at Sinai, and at Paran. (Deut. xxxiii. 2.) This proves, that the mountains of Seir were south of the Dead Sea, inclining toward Elath and Ezion-geber, on the Red Sea.

Jacob, at his return from his journey to Mesopotamia, (Gen. xxxii. 3.; xxxiii. 16.) fearing that Esau should injure his company, sent to him at Seir; and Esau came to meet him, between Peniel and Jordan, and returned the same day to Seir. Therefore he must have lived not far off, in the mountains east of the Dead Sea. Joshua (xi. 17.; xii. 7.) seems to say, that they stretched out still farther north, since he relates, that he made a conquest of all the country, from Seir, to Baal-gad, at the foot of Libanus, and of Mount Hermon, and that he distributed this country among the children of Israel. But it is known that the Israelites had no possessions beyond the country of Moab, east or south. (2 Chron. xx. 10, 22, 23. Ezek. xxv. 8.) Lastly, Moab and Mount Seir are frequently mentioned together; but Moab inhabited east of the Dead Sea. See IDUMEA.

SE'IRATH, שַׁיִרָת, σειραθ, signifies hairy, elevated. After Ehud had killed Eglon, king of Moab, who oppressed the Israelites, he fled to Seirath; which place is thought to be near Bethel or Gilgal.

SE'LAH. The Hebrew word סֵלָה, Selah, is found seventy-four times in the book of Psalms, and thrice in Habakkuk. The Septuagint read it still oftener, since they have put Διάψαλμα in some places where we do not find Selah in the Hebrew. The interpreters, Symmachus and Theodotus, generally translate selah by diapsalma, which signifies a rest or pause in singing.

We make no doubt, says Calmet, but Selah intimates the end, or a pause, and that this is its proper signification; but as we do not always find it at the end of the sense, or at the end of a canticle, we guess that the ancient musicians sometimes put Selah in the margin of their psalters, to show where a musical pause was to be made, and where the tune ended.

Rabbi Kimchi, the eminent Jewish teacher, whose opinion on the subject has been adopted by Grotius and others, says, that Selah is both a musical note, and a note of emphasis in the sense, by which we are called to observe something more than usually remarkable. It is derived from the Hebrew word salal, which signifies he raised, or elevated; and denotes the elevation of the voice in singing, and at the same time the lifting of the heart, the serious considering and meditating on the thing that is spoken.

Professor Wilson has announced the following ingenious conjecture respecting the derivation and import of the word Selah. The root of the word, he remarks, appears evidently to lie in the first two letters סל, which are in contraction for סלל, to raise, to exalt, to magnify. The ה he considers as an abbreviation for יהי; so that the word סלה (selah) is a contracted form of סליה, celebrate ye Jehovah, or exalt the Lord, namely, in songs of praise, accompanied with musical instruments, and is nearly of the same import with הלליה, in our characters Hallelujah, in Greek letters Ἀλληλούια, that is, 'Praise ye the Lord.' This conjecture receives strong confirmation from the latter part of the fourth verse of Psalm lxxviii. which is thus translated, Extol him that rideth upon the heavens by the name JAH. It is highly probable that the meaning here assigned to Selah is the true one, as it corresponds to the dignity and chief end of devotional music, in which the singers and players were frequently reminded of the sacred intention of their solemn prayers, praises, and adoration. All were designed to magnify the name, the nature, the perfections, the excellencies, and works of Jehovah, the only true God. In this sublime exercise the church on earth are fellow-worshippers, in perfect concord with the church in heaven. SELEUCIA, Σελεύκεια, signifies commotion, or shaken together; otherwise, fluctuating. Seleucia was a city of Syria, on the Mediterranean, near where the river Orontes falls into this sea. Paul and Barnabas arrived at Seleucia, where they embarked for Cyprus. (Acts xiii. 4.) This is the Seleucia which is mentioned in 1 Macc. xi. 8.

This city was built by Seleucus Nicator, who took an augury from thunder, and had it consecrated, and worshipped as a deity, with hymns and sacred ceremonies; in consequence, thunder was the titular deity of the city, and was symbolized on almost all its coins. However, it did not confine itself to this deity, but worshipped others also; among whom Jupiter Cassius is conspicuous, and was represented under the image of a rocky mountain. It is thought that there was a Mount Cassius in the neighbourhood. Sacred Geography.

SELEUCIANS, disciples of Seleucus, a philosopher of Galatia, who about the year 380 adopted the sentiments of Hermogenes, and those of Audæus. He taught, with the Valentinians, that Jesus Christ assumed a body only in appearance. He also maintained that the world was not made by God, but was co-eternal with him; that the soul was only an animated fire, created by the angels; that Christ does not sit at the right hand of the Father in a human body, but that he lodged his body in the sun, according to Psalm xix. 4.; and that the pleasures of beatitude consisted in corporeal delights. Broughton's Dictionary of all Religions, vol. ii. p. 559; Adam's View of all Religions, p. 281.

SELF-EXAMINATION is one of the noblest and most important employments in which the mind can be engaged. The most useful knowledge is the knowledge of ourselves; and this can be obtained only by attentively reflecting on what is passing within ourselves, on the state of our thoughts, our passions, and affections, our habits and our conduct. Such knowledge will give us a clear insight into our moral constitution; will show us its defects, and suggest the proper remedies; and will furnish the most effectual help to the execution of the most difficult undertaking, the government of ourselves.

Self-examination will supply the best cure to pride; for pride is generated by a mistaken opinion of ourselves, a false estimate of our ability or worth. Hence we are inclined to exact homage when none is due, and to demand a preference where others have a superior claim; for in proportion as we think of ourselves above what we ought to think, we are apt to think of others less worthily than they deserve. That knowledge of ourselves, which frequent and diligent self-examination will produce, not only tends to make us think humbly of ourselves, but to render us patient and resigned in the calamities and sufferings, which Providence inflicts. For, in such cases, our impatience and discontent are greatly aggravated by our pride. We think ourselves hardly dealt with, and that our conduct is requited with more evil or with less good than it deserves. But a more accurate acquaintance with our many imperfections and much unworthiness, will soothe this acrimony, and check this querulousness, and will teach us that the physical evil which we endure is not more than proportioned to the moral evil which we have committed; and that the severest chastisements of God originate in the sincerest tenderness and love. As that thorough acquaintance with ourselves, with our minds and hearts, which a diligent self-examination will supply, will prevent us from thinking too highly of ourselves, so it will prevent us from judging uncharitably, and speaking slightly and despitely, of our fellow-creatures. For the more sensible we are of our own defects, the less disposed we shall be to remark or to blame the defects of others. None are so quick in observing, or so bitter in reproving, the faults of their fellow-creatures, as those who are puffed up with a conceited opinion of themselves, and form a false estimate of their own integrity and worth. But, if we be conscious of our own manifold transgressions and infirmities, can we rigidly censure what others do amiss?

Self-examination, producing the knowledge of ourselves, will promote our security and success. The better we are acquainted with ourselves, the less likely shall we be to engage in undertakings which we have not strength to surmount, or to encounter temptations which we have not virtue to overcome. Men who have never studied their own minds and hearts, and know little of their own inward dispositions and affections, are ever the most inclined to engage in rash and hazardous enterprises, which involve them in ruin or disgrace. Their choice in any affair is not so much influenced by cool deliberation, as by the impulses of imagination; and they mistake the first fervours of desire for vigour of action, or constancy of resolution. Hence the same ignorance of our nature is apt to involve us in misery and crimes. It is the maxim of our Saviour, 'Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation;' but what can so strongly incite our vigilance, or animate our supplications, as a radical knowledge of ourselves, our thoughts and affections, the sins to which we are least, and those to which, from habit or temperament, we are most inclined? A man who knows not himself, who has never attentively considered the bearings and tendencies of his disposition to sensuality or pride, may make it his most ardent wish, and his most strenuous pursuit, to obtain the greatest degree of wealth which ever man possessed, while another, who is better acquainted with himself, and aware of the many lures to sin which there are in a prosperous fortune, which he distrusts his own ability to overcome, may pray with Agur, 'Give me neither poverty nor riches: feed me with food convenient for me.'

A frequent reflection on ourselves will, above all, be useful in bringing us acquainted with the true state of our souls. It will show us our errors in opinion and in practice, and it will point out not only the evil, but suggest the cure. Now, what can give us this insight into the moral state of our hearts and minds but diligent self-examination? When we know the lust, the appetite, the passion, which has the greatest sway over us, by which we are most easily subdued, and the times and circumstances in which it is most prevalent, we are enabled with the greater circumspection and chance of success to guard against its intrusion, and to defeat its wiles. There are temptations which are more potent, or which we find it more difficult to resist at some times than at others; and in some state of disposition than others; and against these temptations, a right acquaintance with ourselves, and a serious conviction of the danger of sin, will render us more particularly vigilant. The more thoroughly we know ourselves, the less willing shall we be to put ourselves in the way of temptation; and when temptations do assail us, the more vigilant shall we be, not to afford them any advantage over us by our own supineness or indifference.

Serious self-examination is likely to impress us with that sober conviction of our own unworthiness, which is seldom unaccompanied with humility and charity. For what has a stronger tendency to make us judge charitably of others than an humble opinion of ourselves? And the same lowliness of heart will correct our fretfulness and impatience, and render us meek and resigned under our affliction. For our impatience chiefly originates in an idea, that we are hardly dealt with, and that Providence shows us less favour than we deserve. But the study of ourselves will convince us that our nature is such as to require a rigid discipline; and that pain and suffering are, in the moral order of things, necessary to, and designed for, our improvement. Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. ii. pp. 101—118.

SEMI-ARIANS were thus denominated, because, in profession, they condemned the errors of the Arians, but in reality maintained their principles, only palliating and concealing them under softer and more moderate terms. They would not allow, with the orthodox, that the Son was ὁμοούσιος, of the same substance, but only ὁμοιούσιος, of a like substance with the Father; and thus, though in expression they differed from the orthodox in a single letter only, yet in effect they denied the divinity of Jesus Christ. The Semi-arianism of the moderns consists in their maintaining that the Son was, from all eternity, begotten by the will of the Father; contrary to the doctrine of those who teach that the eternal generation is necessary. Buck's Theolog. Dictionary, vol. ii. p. 424.

SEMI-PELAGIANS, a branch of the Pelagians in the fifth century. The monk Cassian was the leader of this denomination. In order to accommodate the difference between Augustine and Pelagius, he maintained the following doctrines:—1. That God did not dispense his grace to one more than to another, in consequence of predestination, that is, an eternal and absolute decree; but was willing to save all men, if they complied with the terms of the Gospel: 2. That Christ died for all men: 3. That the grace purchased by Christ, and necessary to salvation, was offered to all men: 4. That man, before he received grace, was capable of faith and holy desires: 5. That man, born free, was consequently capable of resisting the influences of grace, or complying with its suggestions.

The Pelagians, and Semi-Pelagians differ in this respect: the Pelagians assert that there is no necessity for inward grace; but the Semi-Pelagians maintain that none can advance in virtue without the assistance of divine grace, though they subject this inward grace to the freedom of the will. Adam's View of all Religions, pp. 281, 282.

SENNACHE'RIB, סנחריב, signifies bush of the destruction, of the sword, of solitude, of drought: otherwise, according to the Hebrew and Syriac, the sword, or the destruction of the enemy. This word is foreign to the Hebrew language. Sennacherib, king of Assyria, was son and successor of Shalmaneser; he began to reign in the year of the world 3290. He reigned only four years; being killed by his own sons, in the year of the world 3294. Hezekiah, king of Judah, having shaken off the yoke of the Assyrians, by which king Ahaz, his father, had suffered under Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria; Sennacherib, on notice of this revolt, marched against him, and took all the strong cities of Judah. Hezekiah, seeing he had nothing left but Jerusalem, which, perhaps, he found difficulty enough to secure, sent ambassadors to Sennacherib, then at the siege of Lachish, saying, I have committed a fault; but withdraw your army out of my territories, and I will bear whatever you shall impose upon me. Sennacherib demanded three hundred talents of silver, and thirty talents of gold; which Hezekiah remitted to him soon after; yet the king of Assyria would not leave his dominions.

He sent from Lachish to Jerusalem three of his chief officers, Tartan, Rab-saris, and Rab-shakeh, to summon Hezekiah. Rab-shakeh uttered many blasphemies against God, and many insults against Hezekiah.

In the mean time Sennacherib quitted the siege of Lachish, and applied himself to that of Libnah. Rab-shakeh having reported what he had said to Hezekiah, and that he returned no answer, Sennacherib wrote a letter to Hezekiah, urging him to return to his duty, and to follow the example of so many other nations that had submitted. At the same time he went with all his army to meet Tirhakah, king of Ethiopia, who was marching towards him. But the Lord sent a destroying angel against the army of Sennacherib, who slew in one night 185,000 men. (2 Kings xix. 35.) Sennacherib was forced to return with all speed to Nineveh; where, while he was paying his adorations to his god Nis-roch, in his temple, his two sons, Adram-melech and Sharezer slew him with their swords, and fled into Armenia. Esarhaddon his son reigned in his stead, in the year of the world 3294. (2 Chron. xxxii. 21.)

Herodotus, speaking of Sennacherib, relates his disaster in a very different manner. He quotes the Egyptian priests, who said that Sethon, king of Egypt, and priest of Vulcan, being attacked by Sennacherib, king of the Arabians and the Assyrians, and seeing himself deserted by his own soldiers, begged of Vulcan some speedy assistance. Vulcan appeared to him the night following, and promised help. Sethon, therefore, marching with a few troops, advanced to Pelusium. The same night a body of field-rats came into the camp of the Assyrians, and gnawed the thongs of their bucklers, and the strings of their bows; so that, next morning, they found themselves in no condition to use their arms, but fled.

Most commentators are of opinion, that the army of Sennacherib was destroyed before Jerusalem, preparing for the siege of that city. But it appears plainly from Isaiah (x. 24, 25, 26.) that Sennacherib did not form the siege of Jerusalem, and that in his march against Tirhakah this calamity befel him. Berosus tells us, that Sennacherib had carried the war into Egypt, and had subdued all Asia. Josephus relates that this prince, having spent a long time in the siege of Pelusium, when his works were advanced, and he was on the point of becoming master of the place, he was obliged to raise the siege, lest the king of Ethiopia should surprise him, who came with a vast army to assist the Egyptians.

It is generally thought, that the army of Sennacherib perished by means of the samiel, a hot wind, which God caused to blow against them, a wind very common in those parts, which makes great ravages there, stifling thousands of persons in a moment, as often happens to those great caravans of Mahometans, that go yearly pilgrimages to Mecca. Jeremiah (li. 1.) calls this wind a destroying wind. The threatening made by Isaiah (xxxvii. 7.) to Sennacherib: 'Behold I will send a blast upon him, and he shall hear a rumour,' seems also to insinuate this great wind. See HEZEKIAH.

SEPHAR, סֶפֶר, סֶפֶרָה, signifies book, or writing; otherwise history, or number: in Syriac, a door. Sefhar is a mountain of the East, probably about Armenia. The sons of Joktan had their dwelling from Mesha, 'as thou goest unto Sefhar, a mount of the East,' (Gen. x. 30.) Calmet believes these mountains to have been the dwelling of the Sepharvaim, and of the Saspire, of whom geographers speak. Dr. Wells places Sefhar west of the river Indus, and east of the Caspian Sea; and a late writer supposes it to be Mount Cassius, between Syria and Egypt. Sacred Geography.

SEPHARVA'IM, סֶפֶרְוֵימ, σερφαβιμ, signifies books, or writings; otherwise, narration, or numbers, or the book, or numbers of his sea; otherwise, from the Hebrew and Syriac, gate of the sea. When Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, carried away Israel from Samaria to beyond the Euphrates, he brought other people in their stead into Palestine, among whom were the Sepharvaim, (2 Kings xvii. 24. 31.); in the year of the world 3283. The place of their former habitation is not exactly known: some pretend they inhabited the city of Siphra, on the Euphrates. Calmet thinks their dwelling to have been in the mountains of Sefhar, (Gen. x. 30.); and that the Saspire, who, according to Herodotus, were the only people that inhabited between the Colchians and the Medes, are the Sepharvaim. Strabo places the Sarapares in Armenia.

The Scripture speaks (Isaiah xxxvii. 13. 2 Kings xix. 13.) of the king of the city of Sepharvaim, which, probably, was the capital of this people; and the king of Sepharvaim is, the god of these people. This appears pretty plainly, from comparing these passages (2 Kings xviii. 34.) 'Where are the gods of Hamath and of Arpad? Where are the gods of Sepharvaim, of Hena, and Ivah?' Lastly, (2 Kings xvii. 31.) the Sepharvites burnt their children in the fire to Adrammelech and Anammelech, the gods of Sepharvaim. There is, therefore, great probability, that Hena and Ivah are the same as Anammelech and Adrammelech, the gods of the Sepharvites. But Anammelech apparently stands for the moon, and Adrammelech for the sun.

SEPTUAGINT, the name given to a Greek version of the books of the Old Testament. It is so called, because the translation is supposed to have been made by seventy-two Jews, who are usually called the seventy interpreters; seventy being a round number. Aristæus relates the history of this translation as follows:

Demetrius Phalereus, librarian to king Ptolemy Philadelphus, who had erected a library at Alexandria, filled with the most curious and valuable collection of books, from all parts of the world, told the king one day, that he had been informed that the laws of the Jews, and the history of that people, deserved to have a place in his library; but that they ought first to be translated from the Hebrew into the Greek. The king replied, "that he would write to the high-priest of the Jews respecting it." Then Aristæus, author of this narrative, who was present, and who had the honour of being of the life-guard to this prince, thought of a matter which he had had a good while in his mind, and which he had communicated to Sosibius of Tarentum, and to Andreas, two of his friends, that were chief officers in the king's guards; which was, to procure the liberty of a great number of Jews, whom king Ptolemy, father of Ptolemy Philadelphus, had brought captive into Egypt. Aristæus, Sosibius, and Andreas, took therefore this opportunity to tell the king, that since he desired the translation of the sacred books of the Jews, it would become his liberality and magnificence, to free from servitude a great number of Jews now in his territories; that the whole nation, being obliged by this favour, might the more readily send him the books he desired. The king asking how many these captives might be? was answered, about one hundred thousand. This large number did not discourage Philadelphus, and he promised them liberty. At the same time, he gave orders that twenty drachmas a head should be distributed to all persons who had Jewish slaves, who were forthwith to be made free. He published an edict in their favour, in which he restored to liberty not only all the Jews which his father or himself had brought into Egypt, but all others who might happen to be in servitude there on any account. The king's expense, on this occasion, was above six hundred talents (136,875*l*.) taking the talent to be the Egyptian Attic, or Eubæan talent of silver of 228½ pound. After this, Philadelphus wrote to the high-priest Eleazer, to desire of him the books of the law, and translators capable of rendering them out of Hebrew into Greek. This letter was carried by ambassadors with rich presents, and Andreas and Aristæus were of the number. Eleazer readily complied with the king's request, and sent him the book of the law, together with seventy-two Jews, skilful in the Greek and Hebrew tongues, to translate those sacred books. He wrote also to the king, with thanks for his rich presents, and to commend his piety towards God, and his generosity to the Jews in his dominions. Philadelphus received Eleazer's commissioners with great humanity, expressed great respect for the holy books they had brought; worshipped them, and bowed himself before them seven times; admired the beauty of the vellum, and the writing in gold letters; also the variety of the colours, and embellishments of the leaves. He assured these deputies, that he should always look upon the day of their arrival as a festival. And, as this day fell on the same on which this prince had overcome Antigonus in a sea-fight, he did them the honour of making them eat with him. At dinner, he put several questions to them, to which they returned answers entirely to his satisfaction. And the king was so pleased with their conversation, that he treated them seven days together, that he might hear them all one after another. Three days after this Demetrius Phalereus took these seventy-two Hebrews into the isle of Pharos, and led them into a very fine house at the northern part of the island, on the sea-shore, and far from any noise, that they might, with the greater tranquillity, apply themselves to the translation of the holy books. They began, therefore, their work, and discussing among themselves what difficulties they might meet with, when they had fixed on any thing, and brought it to a condition of being entered fair, they reported it to Demetrius, who had it fairly writ down by his copyers. They laboured thus from morning to the ninth hour, that is, till three hours before the sun-set; they then returned into the city, where they were plentifully furnished with necessaries. This they continued for seventy or rather seventy-two days together. When the work was finished, they put it into the hands of Demetrius, who read it in an assembly of the Jews at Alexandria, that they might judge of its agreement with the original. They were much pleased with it, and generally extolled, as well Demetrius, who had procured this version, as the interpreters who had made it. After this, they pronounced an anathema against any one who should make an alteration in this version in any manner. The king, being informed of what had passed, expressed much satisfaction. He had the law of Moses read to him, and greatly admired the wisdom of it. He asked Demetrius, "why no historian, or poet, had made any mention of so divine a work?" Demetrius replied, it was from that respect which had always been paid to this divine book, that Theopompus, having inserted something of it in his history, had been struck with a disease which deprived him of his understanding; and that Theodotus, a tragic poet, endeavouring to put something of it in his poems, had been struck with blindness; but that both had been miraculously cured, after having acknowledged and confessed the fault. Philadelphus therefore received the work of the interpreters with great veneration, and caused it to be laid up in his library, to be kept with great care. He greatly caressed the seventy translators, invited them to come often to see him, and sent them back into Judea with ample rewards, and rich presents for Eleazer.' This is the substance of the history of Aristæas, which this author addresses to his brother Philocrates, to whom he gives an account of all this, as an eye-witness, and one who was perfectly well informed of every thing that passed. The same story we read in Josephus, who has taken it out of Aristæas. Philo also speaks of the version of the Septuagint, as having been performed by inspired writers: but he makes no mention either of Aristæas, or Demetrius Phalereus.

Justin Martyr's account is very different. He says that Ptolemy, king of Egypt, being informed that the Jews had ancient histories written in Hebrew, he sent for seventy men from Jerusalem to translate these works into Greek. He had these men put into the island of Pharos, into seventy different cells, that they might study without interruption, and without communicating with each other; so that he might be the more secure of the faithfulness of their translation. God himself ordered it so, that they should translate in so uniform a manner, as not only to use the same words, but also in the same number. This caused in the king so vast admiration, that he gave them great rewards, and sent them back with honour into their own country. Justin adds to this, that when he was at Alexandria, they showed him, in the isle of Pharos, the ruins of those cells in which these interpreters had been shut up. The same Justin, in his second apology, relates this in another manner.

Epiphanius says, that the king wrote to the Jews for a copy of their sacred books. The Jews sent him the two-and-twenty books of the Old Testament, written in golden letters; as also seventy-two Apocryphal books. But these works being in Hebrew, the king desired them to send him interpreters, to render them into Greek. They sent him seventy-two chosen men, six of each tribe; and in order that the translation might be as exact as possible, and that the interpreters might have no communication with each other, the king caused to be built, in the isle of Pharos, thirty-six cells, in each of which he shut up two translators, that they might study together. Each two interpreters had a book given them, and when they had translated it, it passed through the hands of those in the next cell, and so on till all the books were translated thirty-six times. When the whole work was finished, the king sat upon his throne, and had the work read to him. Thirty-six readers held the thirty-six copies of the translation, and a thirty-seventh held the Hebrew original. In confronting all these versions, it was found, they were so perfectly alike, that what one had added or retrenched, had also been added or retrenched by every one; and that what was retrenched was really useless and superfluous. This convinced all the assembly that the interpreters had been inspired by the Holy Ghost.

The Samaritans have also laid claim to the honour of this translation; they relate, that the king of Egypt having caused the high-priest of the Samaritans to come to him, and also that of the Jews, with other assistants on both sides to translate the Holy Scriptures into Greek, the translation of the Samaritans was preferred before that of the Jews, and laid up in the library of Alexandria.

The greatest part of modern critics undertake to show the falsity of what has been said concerning the manner in which the version of the Septuagint was made; and it must be owned, that their reasons have great appearance of truth. They show, first, the diversity of opinions, in this matter. Secondly, Aristæas, said to be the author of the oldest account we have of this matter, ill supports the part he acts. He would pass for a Pagan, yet he speaks and acts like a zealous Jew. Thirdly, he speaks of Ptolemy Philadelphus, as of a wise and religious prince, full of respect for the true God, for his temple, and his Scriptures; yet it is known from history that he was a very corrupt and wicked prince. Fourthly, he tells us, that Demetrius Phalereus was friend, and library-keeper to king Philadelphus; whereas it is known, that Demetrius having advised Ptolemy, son of Lagus, to exclude his son Ptolemy Philadelphus from the kingdom, Philadelphus was so provoked at this advice, that, when he came to the throne, he exiled Demetrius, till he should determine farther about him. But Demetrius, not being able to bear the tiresomeness of this banishment, put himself to death by the bite of an asp. Fifthly, they observe the same style, and that a style full of Hebraisms, throughout the history of the pretended Aristæas; and in the letters of Philadelphus to the high-priest Eleazer; and in those of Eleazer to the king; and in the petition of Demetrius to Philadelphus. Other remarks are made on the history of Aristæas, which render it very suspicious, and give reason to consider it as the work of some Jew, who has borrowed the name of Aristæas, the better to disguise the forgery.

What then are we to think of the ancient Greek version of the Bible, that we have in our hands, under the name of Septuagint? It is agreed that this must be an ancient version, and it might well have been made in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus. Aristobulus, Philo, and Josephus, all speak of this translation as made by seventy-two interpreters, under the care of Demetrius Phalereus, in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus. All Christian writers during the first fifteen centuries of the Christian era have admitted this account of the Septuagint as an undoubted fact: but, since the Reformation, critics have boldly called it in question. But whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the mode of translation, it is universally acknowledged that such a version, whole or in part, existed; and it is pretty evident that most of the books must have been translated before our Saviour's time, as they are quoted by him. 'Some learned men,' says Bishop Tomline, 'have supposed that it was called the Septuagint Translation, because it was approved by the Sanhedrim, whose number was seventy. But whatever was the origin of its name, it is certain that this version was made in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and that it was in great esteem among the Jews in the time of our Saviour. Most of the quotations in the New Testament are made from it, excepting in St. Matthew's Gospel.' It has been with great propriety observed, 'that there are many words and forms of speech in the New Testament, the true import of which cannot be known but by their use in the Septuagint. This version also preserves many important words, some sentences, and several whole verses, which originally made a part of the Hebrew text, but have long ago entirely disappeared. This is the version, and this only, which is constantly used and quoted in the Gospels, and by the apostles, and which has thereby received the highest sanction which any writings can possibly receive.' Archbishop Usher supposes the Septuagint translation to have been made 277 years before Christ.

There are four principal or cardinal editions of the Septuagint, from one or more of which all the other editions of the Septuagint have been copied; namely, the Complutensian, the Aldine, the Roman of Sixtus V., and Grabe's edition. The Complutensian Septuagint bears the date of 1515; it was printed from a collation of Greek manuscripts, which the editors highly extol, but of which we have no further knowledge. The Aldine edition was published at Venice in 1518, two years after the death of Aldus Manutius. The text of this edition was likewise formed from several Greek manuscripts, but was interpolated in various places from other Greek versions. The Roman edition of Sixtus V., which appeared in 1587, was copied from the celebrated Codex Vaticanus, with the exception of such words as the editors regarded in the light of errata. Grabe's edition was taken from the no less celebrated Codex Alexandrinus, and was printed at Oxford in four folio volumes, at different times, from 1707 to 1720. But though this edition has the Codex Alexandrinus for its basis, it is far from being a mere copy of that manuscript; for Grabe, and Lee who continued it after Grabe's death, adopted many readings partly from the Roman edition, partly from other manuscripts, where those readings were believed to be genuine. The most convenient edition is that of Breitinger, published at Zurich in 1730—1732, in four quarto volumes; for it contains the text of Grabe's edition, with the deviations of the Roman edition in the margin.

In 1788 Dr. Holmes, afterwards Dean of Winchester, published at Oxford proposals for a collation of all the known manuscripts of the Septuagint. The undertaking was promoted by the delegates of the Clarendon press; a subscription was made toward defraying the expense; literary men were engaged in various parts of the continent for the business of collation; and Dr. Holmes published annually an account of the progress which was made. In 1798 he published at Oxford the Book of Genesis, which was successively followed by the other books of the Pentateuch, making together one folio volume, with one title page, and one general preface. From this general preface it appears, that eleven Greek manuscripts in uncial letters, and more than a hundred manuscripts in small letters, containing either the whole or parts of the Pentateuch, were collated for this edition. As the text of this edition is a copy of the Roman edition of 1587, the deviations from it observable in the three other cardinal editions, the Complutensian, the Aldine, and Grabe's edition, are constantly noted. The quotations, which are found in the works of the Greek fathers, are likewise alleged; and finally, the various readings of the ancient versions, namely, of such as were made from the Septuagint; for versions made immediately from the Hebrew can furnish no various readings for the emendation of the Greek. The plan therefore of this edition is good. Nor is the execution of the plan to be less commended; it displays uncommon industry, and apparently great accuracy. The learned editor died in 1806; but shortly before his death he published the Book of Daniel, both according to the Septuagint version and that of Theodotus, the latter only having been printed in former editions, because the Septuagint version of this book is not contained in the common manuscripts, and was unknown till it was printed at Rome in 1772, from a manuscript belonging to Cardinal Chigi. After the death of Dr. Holmes, the continuation of this important work was undertaken by the Rev. J. Parsons, A.M. under whose editorial care the sacred volume was completed in 1818. This volume comprises all the historical books from Joshua to the Second Book of Chronicles inclusively; the several fasciculi of which were published in the following order, namely, Joshua in 1810, Judges and Ruth in 1812, 1 Kings in 1813, and the five remaining books in the four succeeding years, the whole being printed off in the early part of 1818. The third and fourth volumes, containing the Book of Job to the prophet Jeremiah inclusive, were published between the years 1819—1825; and the remaining or fifth volume, which contains the Apocryphal books, between the years 1825 and 1827. The plan laid down by Dr. Holmes was followed by his learned successor, who has proved himself well worthy of the task which had been committed to his care; and the whole of this magnificent undertaking, the honour of which belongs to the University of Oxford, has been executed in the most splendid and accurate manner. SEPULCHRE. The Hebrews were always very careful about the burial of their dead. Many of their sepulchres were hewn in rocks; for example, that bought by Abraham for the burying of Sarah, (Gen. xxiii. 4. 6.) those of the kings of Judah and Israel; and that in which our Saviour was laid in Mount Calvary. Sometimes, also, their graves were dug in the ground; and commonly without their towns, in burying-places set apart. Generally they put some hewn stone, or other preservative over a grave, to show it was a burying-place, that passengers might be warned to avoid it, that they might not be polluted.

Jesus Christ (Matt. xxiii. 27.) says, that the Pharisees were like whitened sepulchres, which appeared fine without, but inwardly were full of rottenness and corruption. Lightfoot shows, that every year, on the 15th of February, they whitened them anew. In Luke (xi. 44.) our Saviour compares the Pharisees to 'graves which appear not, and the men that walk over them are not aware of them;' or, know not that these places are unclean, so that they contract an involuntary impurity.

Sepulchre of Moses. After the death of this famous law-giver, the arch-angel Michael (Jude 9.) disputed with the devil about his body. What was the subject of this dispute has been much contested. Some have thought, that the devil withstood the burial of Moses, maintaining, that he had not deserved this honour, having unjustly killed an Egyptian in Egypt. Some have maintained, that Moses was buried by the hands of angels, without letting the Hebrews have any knowledge of it, for fear they should be tempted to pay him divine honours after his death. Some pretend that the devil would have had him be buried with solemnity, that the people might thence take occasion of frequenting his tomb, and worshipping him as a god. Some think he did not die like other men, but was translated out of this world into paradise. The text of Deuteronomy (xxxiv. 6.) says expressly, that no one knows the place of his burial to this day. Yet, for all this, it is pretended that in October, 1655, as some Maronite shepherds were feeding their goats in the mountains of Nebo and Abarim, they discovered it.

Sepulchre of David. This is a magnificent edifice, now without the walls of Jerusalem, but probably, anciently within the walls. You first enter a large court, about twenty-six feet square, cut out of the rock, which is marble. On the left-hand is a gallery cut out of the rock likewise, as also the pillars that support it. At the end of the gallery is a little opening, through which you pass, by creeping on the ground into a large chamber of about twenty-four feet square, round about which are other smaller chambers, which communicate one with the other, by doors of stone. The ceiling, the doors, as well as the rest, their hinges, their posts, their frames, &c. are all cut out of the same rock. In the sides of the small chambers are several niches, within which the bodies of the kings were deposited in stone coffins. This work is perhaps the only real one that now remains of ancient Jerusalem.

Sepulchre or Tomb of our Lord Jesus Christ. This was upon Mount Calvary, north-west of Jerusalem, and was hewn out of a rock, as Mark (xv. 46.) informs us. It is a kind of small chamber, almost square within: its height from bottom to top eight feet one inch, its length six feet one inch, its breadth five feet ten inches. The entrance, which looks towards the east, is but four feet high, and two feet four inches wide; this door was shut up by a stone of the same rock: to this stone the chief priests affixed their seal, (Matt xxvii. 66.) and on this stone the angel sat, after Jesus Christ was come out of the tomb. (Matt. xxviii. 2.) The place where the body of our Saviour was laid takes up one side of this cave; it is a stone raised from the ground to the height of two feet four inches; its length is five feet eleven inches, and its breadth two feet eight inches, placed lengthwise from east to west. It remains to this day, but is now incrustured with white marble.

The following account of the church of the Holy Sepulchre is extracted from the narrative of a late celebrated traveller who visited it.

‘The church of the Holy Sepulchre is very irregular, owing to the nature and situation of the places which it was designed to comprehend. It is nearly in the form of a cross, being one hundred and twenty paces in length, exclusive of the descent to the Discovery of the Holy Cross, and seventy in breadth. It has three domes, of which that covering the Holy Sepulchre serves for the nave of the church. It is thirty feet in diameter, and is uncovered at top like the rotunda at Rome. There is no cupola, it is true, the roof being supported only by large rafters, brought from Mount Lebanon. This church had formerly three entrances; but now there is but one door, the keys of which are cautiously kept by the Turks, lest the pilgrims should gain admittance without paying the nine sequins, or thirty-six livres, demanded for this indulgence. I allude to those from Christendom; for the Christian subjects of the Grand Signior pay no more than half that sum. The door is always shut, and there is only a small window crossed with an iron bar, through which the people without hand provisions to those within, who are of eight different nations.

‘On entering the church, you come to the Stone of Uncion, on which the body of our Lord was anointed with myrrh and aloes, before it was laid in the sepulchre. Some say that it is of the same rock as Mount Calvary; and others assert that it was brought to this place by Joseph and Nicodemus, secret disciples of Jesus Christ, who performed this pious office, and that it is of a greenish colour. Be this as it may, on account of the indiscretion of certain pilgrims, who broke off pieces, it was found necessary to cover it with white marble, and to surround it with an iron railing, lest people should walk over it. This stone is eight feet, wanting three inches, in length; and two feet, wanting one inch, in breadth; and above it, eight lamps are kept continually burning. The Holy Sepulchre is thirty paces from this stone, exactly in the centre of the great dome, of which I have already spoken; it resembles a small closet, hewn out of the solid rock. The entrance, which faces the east, is only four feet high, and two feet and a quarter broad, so that you are obliged to stoop very much when you go in. The interior of the sepulchre is nearly square. It is six feet, wanting an inch, in length; and six feet, wanting two inches, in breadth; and from the floor to the roof, eight feet one inch. There is a solid block of the same stone, which was left in excavating the other part. This is two feet four inches and a half high, and occupies half of the sepulchre; for it is six feet, wanting one inch, in length, and two feet and five-sixths wide. On this table the body of our Lord was laid, with the head towards the west, and the feet to the east: but on account of the superstitious devotion of the Orientals, who imagine that, if they leave their hair upon this stone, God will never forsake them, and also because the pilgrims broke off pieces, it has received a covering of white marble, on which mass is now celebrated. Forty-four lamps are constantly burning in this sacred place, and three holes have been made in the roof for the emission of the smoke. The exterior of the sepulchre is also faced with slabs of marble, and adorned with several columns, having a dome above. At the entrance of the sepulchre there is a stone about a foot and a half square, and a foot thick, which is of the same rock, and served to support the large stone which closed the access to the sepulchre. Upon this stone was seated the angel when he spake to the two Marys: and as well on account of this mystery, as to prevent the sepulchre from being entered, the first Christians erected before it a little chapel, which was called the Angel's Chapel. Twelve paces from the Holy Sepulchre, turning towards the north, you come to a large block of grey marble, about four feet in diameter, placed there to mark the spot where our Lord appeared to Mary Magdalene in the form of a gardener. Further on is the Chapel of the Apparition, where, as tradition asserts, our Lord first appeared to the Virgin Mary after his resurrection. This is the place where the Franciscans perform their devotions, and to which they retire; and hence they pass into chambers with which there is no other communication.

It is obvious, in the first place, that the Church of the Holy Sepulchre is composed of three churches: that of the Holy Sepulchre, properly so called; that of Calvary; and the church of the Discovery of the Holy Cross. The first is built in the valley at the foot of Calvary, on the spot where it is known the body of Christ was deposited. This church is in the form of a cross, the chapel of the Holy Sepulchre constituting in fact the nave of the edifice. It is circular, like the Pantheon at Rome, and is lighted only by a dome, beneath which is the sepulchre. Sixteen marble columns adorn the circumference of this rotunda: they are connected by seventeen arches, and support an upper gallery, likewise composed of sixteen columns and seventeen arches, of smaller dimensions than those of the lower range. Niches corresponding with the arches appear above the frieze of the second gallery, and the dome springs from the arch of these niches. The latter were formerly decorated with mosaics, representing the twelve apostles, St. Helena, the emperor Constantine, and three other portraits unknown. The choir of the church of the Holy Sepulchre is to the east of the nave of the tomb: it is double, as in the ancient cathedrals; that is to say, it has first a place with stalls for the priests, and beyond that a sanctuary raised two steps above it. Round this double sanctuary run the aisles of the choir, and in these aisles are situated the chapels. It is likewise in the aisle on the right, behind the choir, that we find the two flights of steps, leading, the one to the Church of Calvary, the other to the Church of the Discovery of the Holy Cross. The first ascends to the top of Calvary, the second conducts you down underneath it: for the cross was erected on the summit of Golgotha, and found again under that hill. To sum up, then, what we have already said, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre is built at the foot of Calvary; its eastern part adjoins that eminence, beneath and upon which have been constructed two other churches, connected by walls and vaulted staircases with the principal edifice.

Objections to the site of the Holy Sepulchre, and of Calvary, in which it is fixed, were urged, even by pious Christians, at a very early period, and Quaresmius undertook to answer them. These have again been renewed by Dr. Clarke, one of the latest, and, for a long time, the only Protestant traveller into the Holy Land, who had enough of the love of Scriptural illustration to think the topography of Jerusalem worth inquiring about. According to the opinion of some of the critics, he has succeeded in proving that the spot assumed for Calvary and the Holy Sepulchre, is not the one which they really occupied; while others think the matter still doubtful, and incline rather to the hypothesis which he has attempted to overturn. See JERUSALEM. Buckingham's Travels in Palestine, vol. ii. pp. 11, 12.; Chateaubriand's Travels in Greece, Palestine, Egypt, and Barbary, vol. ii. pp. 8—17.

SERAI'AH, שריה, σαρὶα, σαρεῖα, signifies prince of the Lord, or the Lord is my prince, or song of the Lord. Seraiah was son of Neriah, and brother of Baruch, the companion and secretary of Jeremiah. Seraiah was sent to Nebuchadnezzar at Babylon, in the fourth year of the reign of Zedekiah, in the year of the world 3409. Seraiah was head of the prophecy, according to some translations, or chief of the embassy, appointed to carry the denunciations against Babylon. Jer. li. 59. The Hebrew reads, 'prince of Menucha,' which may be understood of a city or district of Benjamin. (1 Chron. ii. 52. 54.; viii. 6.) Our English version renders the original, 'he was a quiet prince.' Others will have it to signify the prince of rest; or guard of the king's chamber or bed; or prince of the presents, distributor of the king's liberalities, his almoner, or intendant of the offerings the king made to the temple; or rather, in this deputation. Seraiah was charged with the tributes or presents that Zedekiah sent to Nebuchadnezzar; and this acceptance of the words corresponds with that of the Vulgate, princeps prophetiæ, head of the embassy, or deputation.

When therefore Seraiah went to Babylon with king Zedekiah, or was sent there by king Zedekiah, as some interpreters understand the original, Jeremiah sent a letter by him, which was to be read to the captives there. This letter contained a prophecy of the fall of Babylon; and after it was read, Seraiah was ordered to tie it to a stone, and to throw it into the Euphrates, and say; 'Thus shall Babylon sink, and shall not rise from the evil that I will bring upon her.' Baruch went with his brother Seraiah, upon this commission.

SERAPHIM, שרפים, signifies burning, full of fire. Seraphim (Isai. vi. 2.) denotes a kind of angels, who were around the throne of the Lord: each had six wings; with two of which he covered his face, with two he covered his feet, and flew with the two others. They cried to one another, and said; Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of hosts! the whole earth is full of his glory. In the distinction of angels, Seraphim is put first, above Cherubim.

SERGIUS, Σέργιος. The etymology is unknown. Sergius Paulus, proconsul, or governor, of the island of Cyprus, was converted by St. Paul, A.D. 45. (Acts xiii. 7.) This proconsul was a man of prudence, but had a magician about him, whom he considered as a man favoured by God. Having heard of the arrival of Paul and Barnabas in the island of Cyprus, he sent for them, and desired to hear the word of God. Elymas did what he could to hinder him from it, but was struck by Paul with blindness. When Sergius Paulus beheld this, he embraced the Christian faith.

SERPENT; serpens; in Greek ὄφις, Ophis; in Hebrew, נחש Nachash. Interpreters have much speculated concerning the nature of that serpent which tempted Eve. Some have thought, that then the serpent had feet. But there is no probability that this animal was otherwise than what it is now. And it cannot be doubted, but that under the name of serpent, (Nachash) we are to understand the devil, who made use of a real serpent to seduce the first woman. (Gen. iii. 13.)

Dr. Adam Clarke supposes that the creature which beguiled Eve, was a monkey, and of that species called the ouran outang. But, as Mr. Bellamy has observed on this subject, there are two things which decidedly make against Doctor Clarke's opinion. 'It is expressly said, that the serpent should go on its belly, "on thy belly shalt thou go;" now these words are more evidently against the monkey than the serpent, as an agent in this business. The Doctor informs us, that if it had been a serpent, it must, before the fall, have walked on its tail, and I contend, that if it had been a monkey, the divine command was not obeyed, for that animal does not go on its belly, any more than the whole race of quadrupeds: and as to the tale of its walking erect before the Fall, it walked no more erect then, than it does now; for the ouran outang monkey always goes erect, when it has occasion; he will frequently attack men, and has the power of rendering himself more formidable, by fighting with offensive weapons. The second, which this writer has forgot to notice with due effect, is concerning its speech. We are told that it conversed with Eve, and though it had not the power of walking, or going erect, which we are necessarily led to believe was the case if it were a literal serpent, or a monkey, the Scripture does not say that it should lose the gift of speech; though we might reasonably suppose, that if by this organ the fall of man had been brought about, God would have pronounced a curse on it, and would have taken away the gift of speech by a solemn denunciation to that effect; instead of condemning it to go on its belly. Therefore, whether it were the serpent or the monkey, the gift of speech must necessarily have remained, as that power was not by the divine command taken away. Dr. Clarke says, "God did not qualify the serpent with speech for the occasion,"—true; neither has he proved that God qualified the monkey "with speech for the occasion," but by supposing that this was the case; and supposition proves nothing.'

We are told that Eve was deceived and tempted to transgress the law of God by some moral agent, who could speak and argue, called by Moses Nachash, the serpent; which, he saith, was more subtil than any other beast of the field which the Lord God had made. But a beast of the field, how subtil or sagacious soever, could not speak and reason. Who then was the moral agent that deceived Eve? St. Paul (2 Cor. xi. 3.) speaks of this deceiver in the same manner as Moses doth: 'I fear, lest by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtilty, so your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ.' The apostle did not suppose the Corinthians might be corrupted by the subtilty of an irrational creature; consequently he did not suppose that Eve was beguiled by the subtilty of an irrational creature. But St. John comes nearer to the point, (Rev. xii. 9.; xx. 2.) where he speaks of the serpent as a 'deceiver,' and describes him after this manner;—'and the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent, called' otherwise in Scripture, 'the Devil, and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world.' A dragon is a huge overgrown serpent. That old serpent, means that serpent, which of old, at the beginning of the world, deceived Eve, and still was deceiving the world. And in several other places of Scripture, the Devil's temptation of Eve is plainly alluded to. Therefore this serpent, and the Devil, and Satan, are synonymous, and mean one and the same being. Hence divines have justly concluded, that it was the Devil or Satan, an evil or malignant spirit, which tempted Eve, in the body, or assuming the form and shape of a serpent; which then might be a very beautiful as well as sagacious animal, familiar with Adam and Eve, and much admired by them.

The craft, the wisdom, the subtilty of the serpent, are insisted on in Scripture, as qualities distinguishing this animal from others. Moses, intending to prepare the mind of his reader for the relation of Eve's temptation, begins with affirming, (Gen. iii. 1.) 'Now the serpent (Nachash) was more subtil than any beast of the field which the Lord God had made.' And Jesus Christ himself recommends to his apostles, the wisdom of the serpent. (Matt. x. 16.) They bring several proofs of this subtilty of the serpent. They tell us, that the Cerastes hides himself in the sand, in order to bite the horse's foot, that he may throw the rider. Jacob alludes to this in the blessing of Dan: (Gen. xlix. 17.) 'Dan shall be a serpent by the way, an adder in the path, that biteth the horse's heels, so that his rider shall fall backward.'

Epiphanius brings several proofs of the wisdom of the serpent; among which is that property of stopping up its ears, that it may not hear the voice of the charmer or enchanter. The Psalmist takes notice of this piece of subtilty of the adder: (Psalm lviii. 4, 5.) 'Like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear, which will not hearken to the voice of the charmers, charming never so wisely.'

Among the kinds of serpents mentioned in Scripture, are those fiery flying serpents, that made so great a destruction among the Israelites, and were the death of so many people in the desert. (Numb. xxi. 6.) The Hebrew word here used for serpent is saraph, which properly signifies to burn; and it is thought, that this name was given it, either because of its colour, or because of that heat and thirst it creates by its biting. Herodotus, who had seen these serpents, says, they had great resemblance to those which the Greeks and Latins called hydræ. Bochart endeavours to prove they were real hydræ. The same Herodotus tells us, he went on purpose to the city of Butus, to see those flying serpents of which he had heard. He saw near this city great heaps of bones, and the spines of those animals that had been killed and devoured by the Ibis. The place, says he, is a narrow neck of ground that widens towards Egypt. When, therefore, at the beginning of spring, these serpents come out of Arabia into Egypt, the Ibis attacks them, and destroys great numbers of them. The wings of these serpents are not feathers, like the wings of birds, but membranes rather like those of bats.

He also says, that these serpents are not large; they are speckled, or of several colours; and are in such great quantities in Arabia, that the inhabitants could not subsist for them, if Providence had allowed them to multiply according to the usual laws of nature. But the Arabians affirm, that the female puts the male to death when they engender; and that the young ones at their birth kill their mother.

BRAZEN SERPENT (Numb. xxi. 9.) was a figure of the serpent saraph, which Moses elevated on the top of a pike, promising the Hebrews, that all who were bitten by serpents, and who should look towards this image, should be healed; as the event proved. Our Saviour (John iii. 14.) informs us, that this serpent was a representation of his crucifixion. This brazen serpent was preserved in Israel to the time of Hezekiah, who, being informed that the people paid a superstitious worship to it, had it broken in pieces, and in contempt gave it the name of Nehushtan [a play on the word Nachash] a brazen bawble, or trifle. (2 Kings xviii. 4.)

The worship of the serpent is observed through all Pagan antiquity. The devil, who tempted the first woman under the shape of a serpent, takes a pleasure to deify this animal, as a trophy of his victory over mankind. The Babylonians, in Daniel's time worshipped a dragon, which was demolished by this prophet 'This species of idolatry,' says a late writer, 'in its origin did not consist in the unmeaning adoration of the image, or figure, but was introduced to represent the passions and affections in man; such was the principle of circumspection, subtilty, or prudence of the sensual principle. For which qualities it was then, and is allowed now by the best writers on those subjects, to be more famous than any other animal: and therefore a more proper subject could not have been chosen in outward nature to represent those qualities in man. This was the custom of the first race of men, as is obvious from the Scriptures, where we find that clean and unclean beasts are introduced by the inspired writers, to signify the pure and impure affections; agreeing with the natural propensities of the animals mentioned. Thus, as the serpent among the primeval people signified in a good sense the principle of circumspection, or prudence, to watch over the appearance of evil; so in an opposite sense it also was meant by them to represent the subtilty of the sensual principle in those who were perpetually watching to commit evil, by the gratification of that passion to the injury of others; for perpetual watching is a peculiar property of this creature,' Bellamy's History of all Religions, pp. 92, 93; Bellamy's Ophion, pp. 6—8.; Watson's Theological Tracts, vol. i. p. 49; Calmet's Dictionary of the Holy Bible.

SERVANT. This word generally signifies a slave: because formerly among the Hebrews, and the neighbouring nations, the greater part of servants were slaves; they belonged absolutely to their masters, who had a right to dispose of their persons, their bodies, goods, and even of their lives in some cases.

2. The Hebrews had two sorts of servants, or slaves. (Lev. xxv. 44, 45, &c.) Some were strangers, bought, or taken in war, and their masters kept them, exchanged them, or sold them, as their goods. The others were Hebrew slaves, who, being poor, sold themselves, or were sold, to pay their debts; or were delivered for slaves by their parents in cases of necessity. This sort of Hebrew slaves continued in slavery only to the year of Jubilee, when they might return to liberty, and their masters could not detain them against their wills. If they desired to continue with their masters, they were brought before the judges; here they made a declaration, that for this time they disclaimed the privilege of the law, and had their ears bored with an awl against the door posts of their master's house; after which they had no longer any power of recovering their liberty, till the next year of Jubilee after nine and forty years. (Exod. xxi. 2, 5, 6, 7, &c.)

3. Servant, a man who dedicates himself to the service of another, by his own choice, will, and inclination. Thus, Joshua was the servant of Moses, Elisha of Elijah, Gehazi of Elisha; St. Peter, St. Andrew, St. Philip, &c., were servants of Jesus Christ.

4. Servants, the subjects [rather the officers] of a prince. The servants of Pharaoh, the servants of Saul, of David, that is, their subjects in general; and their domestics in particular. In like manner the Philistines, the Syrians, and other nations, were servants of David; that is, they obeyed him, they paid him tribute.

5. Servants of God, the servants of the Lord, the priests, the prophets, those who make profession of a particular piety. The name, man of God, and servant of God, is often given to Moses by way of eminence; and St. Paul often takes the same character. He gives excellent rules of morality to Christian slaves. (1 Cor. vii. 21, 22, &c. Ephes. vi. 5, 6, 7. Coloss. iii. 22. 2 Tim. ii. 9.)

6. Servants, or slaves; as opposed to those who are free, and to the Children of the Promises, represents the Jews, in contradistinction from the Christians. The Jews were the slaves represented by Hagar and Ishmael; Christians are the children of liberty, represented by Sarah and Isaac.

SE/RUG, שרר, signifies branch, layer; otherwise twining. Serug was son of Reu, and father of Nahor. (Gen. xi. 20, 21, 22. 1 Chron. i. 26.) It is pretended that Serug was the first after the deluge that began to worship creatures. In his time men formed a multitude of idols, by which the devil performed many prodigies. Serug thought he might adore the images of men who had distinguished themselves by their virtues, and by their good deeds performed for mankind. This introduced the worship of the dead, and by consequence, idolatry and polytheism. 'From him, Bochart conjectures, that the town of Sarug was named, which was near Charræ in Mesopotamia.' Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. p. 53.

SETH, שֵׁט, signifies put, or who puts. Seth, son of Adam and Eve, was born in the year of the world 130. (Gen. v. 3. 6. 10, 11.) Seth, at the age of one hundred and five years, begat Enos, in the year of the world 235. He lived after this eight hundred and seven years; in all, nine hundred and twelve years: and he died in the year of the world 1042. Seth was the chief of the race of the saints, and of the sons of God, as the Scripture calls them, (Gen. vi. 2.); who preserved the true religion and piety, when the descendants of Cain had abandoned themselves to wickedness.

SHAKERS, the name of a sect which first appeared in North America, in 1774, and which seems to be a branch of the Welsh Jumpers. The enthusiasm of this sect is vented in jumping, dancing, and violent exertions of the body, which causing shaking, or shuddering, as if under an ague, occasioned their being termed Shakers. Anna Leese, or Lecos, whom they styled the Elect Lady, was the founder and head of their first society, at Harvard, Massachusetts; or, according to Hannah Adams, at Nisqueneia, above Albany, in the state of New York, 'whence they have spread their doctrine, and increased to a considerable number.' A. Leese died in 1784, when her power devolved on James Whitaker, who was succeeded by Joseph Meacham, whom they look up to, not only as their head, but also as a prophet. The chief elders are his deputies and substitutes in their different settlements.

The Shakers assert that A. Leese was the woman spoken of in the twelfth chapter of the Revelation;—that she spoke seventy-two tongues, and that though those tongues were unintelligible to the living, she conversed with the dead, who understood her language. They further add, that she was the mother of all the elect; that she travailed for the whole world; and that no blessing can descend to any person, but only by and through her, and that in the way of her being possessed of their sins, by confessing and repenting of them, one by one, according to her direction.

The tenets which peculiarly distinguish the Shakers are comprised in seven articles. 1. They assert that the first resurrection is already come; that now is the time to judge themselves; and that, under this new dispensation, the people of God are not to be guided by the written word, but by the immediate influence of the Holy Ghost. 2. They believe that they have power to heal the sick, to raise the dead, and to cast out devils. This, they say, is performed by the preaching of the word of God, when it is attended with the divine power—the wonderful energy and operation of the Holy Spirit, which performs those things, by healing the broken-hearted—raising up those who are dead in trespasses and sins to a life of holiness and righteousness, which causes the devils to be cast out. (Matt. x. 8.) 3. That they have a correspondence with angels, the spirits of the saints, and their departed friends. This they attempt to prove from 1 Cor. xii. 8—10. 4. That they speak with divers kinds of tongues in their public assemblies. This they think is done by the divine power and influence of the Holy Spirit. 5. That it is lawful to practise vocal music, with dancing, in the Christian churches, if it be practised in praising the Lord. 6. That they, being the children of the resurrection, must neither marry nor be given in marriage; but that their church is come out of the order of natural generation to be as Christ was; and that those who have wives ought to be as though they had none;—that, by these means, heaven begins upon earth, &c. They suppose that some of their people are of the number of the 144,000, who were redeemed from the earth, that were not defiled with women. 7. That the word everlasting, when applied to the punishment of the wicked, refers only to a limited space of time; excepting in the case of those who fall from their sect; but for such 'there is no forgiveness, neither in this world, nor in that which is to come.' To prove this, they quote St. Matthew, (xii. 32.)

The Shakers also maintain, with the Quakers, that it is unlawful to swear, game, or use compliments to each other; and that water baptism and the Lord's Supper are abolished. They deny the imputation of Adam's sin to his posterity; and they seem to be less Calvinists in other respects likewise, than their brethren, the Jumpers, in Wales.

Their form of government is said to be republican, under the chief elder, whom they elect, and whose power is unlimited. Like the Moravians, they are divided into classes; and subordinate to the chief elder are inspectors of all classes, invested with different degrees of authority. Their discipline is founded on the supposed perfection of their leaders. Confession is made of every secret, by all, from the oldest to the youngest; and the people are made to believe that they are seen through in the Gospel glass of perfection by their teachers, who behold the state of the dead, and innumerable worlds of spirits, good and bad.

As marriage is prohibited by them, and married persons are admitted to become members only on condition that they renounce each other, their society is recruited merely by proselytes. They send missionaries through the country to make proselytes; and their meetings, which sometimes continue 'day and night for a considerable time,' are often attended by converts from a great distance, who stay from 'two to twenty days.' In these meetings they have praying, preaching, singing, and dancing; the men in one apartment, the women in another.

They vary their exercises of devotion. Their heavy dancing, as it is called, is performed by a perpetual springing from the house-floor, about four inches up and down, both in the men's and women's apartment, moving about with extraordinary transport, singing, sometimes one at a time, and sometimes more. They sometimes clasp their hands, and leap so high as to strike the joists above their heads. This elevation affects the nerves so that they have intervals of shuddering, as if they were in a violent fit of the ague. They even throw off their outside garment, in these exercises, and spend their strength very cheerfully in this way; and when the chief speaker calls for their attention, after joining in prayer with him, or listening to his harangue, they immediately renew their dancing with increased vigour. 'Sometimes there will be short intermissions, but in a minute or two one of the chiefs will spring up, crying, "As David danced, so will we before God;" the others follow this signal; and thus alternately, dancing, praying, and singing, they pass night after night, and often until morning.'

They assert that their dancing is the token of the great joy and happiness of the Jerusalem state, and denotes the victory over sin. One of their most favourite exertions is turning round very swiftly for an hour or two; and this, they say, is to show the great power of God. They sometimes fall on their knees, and make a sound like the roaring of many waters, in groans and cries to God, as they say, for the wicked world who persecute them. It is, however, observed, that though, at first, they used these violent gesticulations, now they have 'a regular, solemn, uniform dance, or genuflection, to as regular, solemn, a hymn, which is sung by the elders, and as regularly conducted as a proper band of music.' Adam's View of Religions, pp. 283—285; New York Theological Magazine, November and December 1795; Adam's Religious World Displayed, vol. iii. pp. 442—447.

SHALMANE'SER, שלמנאסר, signifies peace tied or chained, or perfection and retribution, or peace taken away, or that withdraws. Shalmaneser or Salmaneser, king of Assyria, succeeded Tiglath-pileser, and had Sennacherib for his successor. He began to reign in the year of the world 3276, reigned fourteen years, and died in the year of the world 3290. (2 Kings xvii. 3.) It is very probable he is called Enemessar in the Greek of Tobit, (i. 2.) and Shalman in Hosea, (x. 14.) The Scripture tells us of Shalmaneser, that he came into Palestine, subdued Samaria, and obliged Hoshea, the son of Elah, to pay him tribute; but in the third year, being weary of paying tribute, Hoshea took secret measures with So, king of Egypt, to remove this subjection. Shalmaneser brought an army against him, ravaged Samaria, and besieged Hoshea, in his capital city. Notwithstanding the resistance of Hoshea, who held out three years, (2 Kings xvii. 1. 5, 6, 7, &c.; xviii. 9, 10.) he took the city, put Hoshea into bonds, carried away the people beyond the Euphrates; and thus he ruined the city and kingdom of Samaria, which had subsisted two hundred and fifty-four years, from the year of the world 3030 to 3283. Tobit was among the captives carried away by Shalmaneser, but afterwards got into the good graces of this prince, who gave him liberty to do what he pleased, and to live where he would. According to the Greek, he even made him his purveyor, which was an officer to furnish provisions to the king's household.

Profane authors tell us, that this prince made war also with the Tyrians. Eleleus king of Tyre, seeing the Philistines were much weakened by their war with Hezekiah, king of Judah, took this opportunity of recovering to his obedience the city of Gath, which had revolted from him. The Gittites, fearing the power of the king of Tyre, had recourse to Shalmaneser, who marched with all his forces against the Tyrians. At his approach, the city of Sidon, Ace, afterwards Ptolemais (now Acre) and the other maritime cities of Phenicia, submitted to Shalmaneser.

But the Tyrians, with only twelve ships, having in a sea-fight defeated the united fleet of the Assyrians and Phenicians, acquired by this victory so great reputation at sea, and became so formidable, that Shalmaneser durst no more engage them by sea. He withdrew, therefore, into his own dominions, but left a great part of his army to besiege Tyre. The besiegers made but a slow progress, by reason of the brave resistance of the besieged. The troops of Shalmaneser stopped up the aqueducts, and cut the pipes that brought the water into the city, which reduced the Tyrians to the last extremity; but the Tyrians dug wells in their city, and by this means held out five years longer. In the mean time, Shalmaneser dying, they were delivered from the siege. Usher places this siege in the year of the world 3287.

SHAM'GAR, שִׁמְגָר, signifies, named a stranger; otherwise, he is here a stranger; otherwise, rumination, or desolation of the name; otherwise, surprise, astonishment of the stranger. Shamgar, or Samgar, son of Anath, was the third judge of Israel, after Ehud, and before Barak. (Judg. iii. 31.) The Scripture only says, that he defended Israel, and killed six hundred Philistines with an ox-goad. From the peace obtained by Ehud, in the year of the world 2679, to whom Shamgar succeeded, till the servitude under the Canaanites, in the year of the world 2699, are twenty years.

SHEAF. The day after the feast of the Passover they brought into the temple a sheaf of corn, as the first-fruits of the barley-harvest, (Levit. xxiii. 10, 11, 12.) with these ceremonies:—On the fifteenth of Nisan, in the evening, when the feast of the first day of the Passover was ended, and the second day was begun, which was a working day, the house of judgment deputed three men to go in solemnity, and gather the sheaf of barley. The inhabitants of the neighbouring cities assembled, to be present. The barley was gathered in the territory of Jerusalem. The deputies demanded, three times, if the sun was set? They were as often answered, that it was. Afterwards they demanded three times, if they might have leave to cut the sheaf? Leave was as often granted. They reaped it out of three different fields, with three different sickles, and put the ears into three boxes, to carry them to the temple.

The sheaf, or rather the three sheaves, being arrived in the temple, were threshed in the court; and they took a full omer, that is, about three pints of the grain; after it had been well winnowed, parched, and bruised, they sprinkled over it a log of oil, that is, near a pint.

To this they added a handful of incense; and the priest who received this offering, waved it before the Lord, toward the four quarters of the world, cross-wise; he cast part of it on the altar, and the rest was his own. After this, every one might begin the harvest.

SHE'BA, שֶׁבָּא, signifies captivity; otherwise, conversion, repose, old age. The queen of Sheba, (1 Kings x. 1, 2, &c. 2 Chron. ix. 1.) who (Matt. xii. 42. Luke xi. 31.) is called queen of the south, was, according to some, a queen of Arabia; according to others, a queen of Ethiopia. Josephus says, that Sheba was the ancient name of the city of Meroe, before Cambyes gave it that of his sister Meroe, and that from hence the queen came, of whom we are speaking. This opinion has much prevailed. The Ethiopians at this day maintain, that this princess was of their country, and that her posterity reigned there for a long time. They preserve the catalogue of them, their names, and successions. The eunuch of queen Candace, who was converted and baptized by St. Philip, (Acts viii. 27.) was an officer belonging to a princess of the same country. The ancients acknowledge that women used to govern in this country. The isle of Meroe is sometimes comprehended in Ethiopia; and this country, as well as Egypt, is south of Palestine.

Those, who would have this princess to come from Arabia, rely, first, on the general consent, that there are Sabeans and Cushim, or Ethiopians, in Arabia. This princess was queen of Sheba, or of Cush, and Ethiopia. Secondly, Arabia is south from Judea. Thirdly, Arabia Felix may well be said to be at the uttermost parts of the world, (Matt. xii. 42.) because it borders on the Southern Ocean, and formerly they knew no land beyond it; Terra, finesque, quæ ad orientem vergunt, Arabiâ terminantur, says Tacitus. Fourthly, Arabia abounds in gold, silver, spices, and precious stones, which are the presents this princess made to Solomon; which cannot be conveniently said of the island of Meroe. Lastly, several understand these verses of Claudian, of the Sabeans in Arabia Felix, where he says the women are used to govern:

Medis, levibusque Sabæis,
Imperat hic sexus, reginarumque sub armis
Barbariæ pars magna jacet.

And if popular tradition may be any thing relied on, that of the Arabians may be produced, who think that queen Balkis came from the city of Sheba, otherwise called Marib or Mareb, in Yemen.

Candaule is the name that Josephus and several others give to the queen of Sheba. She came to see Solomon, about the year of the world 3012.

Mr. Bruce has given us the history of the queen of Sheba and her descendants, from the Abyssinian historians; but he thinks the eunuch of Candace (Chandake) was an officer of the queen Hendaqui, whose territories lie beyond the Great Desert, south of Syene in Upper Egypt. 'It is probable, at least,' says a late writer, 'that the Sheba of Solomon's visitor, and the Ethiopia of the Acts, are distinct places, and Sheba the furthest off; which adds to the force of our Lord's comparison, as probably this visitor travelled from the greatest distance, &c. of any that ever came to Jerusalem. But what if the Ethiopians, that is, Abyssinians, at that time ruled in Arabia, also? Then she might come from Arabia, yet be the queen of Ethiopia, which is only across the Red Sea; and which seems to have been the fact.' Supplement. Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary of the Holy Bible.

SHEBA, or SHEBO, שבע, signifies seven, or the seventh; fulness, or oath. Sheba, son of Bichri, of Benjamin, was a turbulent fellow, who was near engaging Israel in a civil war. After the defeat of Absalom, when the tribe of Judah came to king David, and brought him over the river Jordan, on his way to Jerusalem, the other tribes resented the little notice taken of them. There was provoking language given on both sides; insomuch, that Sheba, the son of Bichri, sounded a trumpet, and proclaimed, 'We have no share in David.' Thus Israel forsook David, and followed Sheba. (2 Sam. xx. 1, 2, 3, &c.)

When David came to Jerusalem, he sent Abishai, with what troops were at hand, in pursuit of this traitor. Joab also took soldiers; and crossing over the country north of Jerusalem, he arrived at Abellibeth-maacha, a city lying at the entrance of the pass between Libanus and Antilibanus, whither Sheba had retired. Joab besieged the place; when a woman of the city, wiser than the rest, persuaded the people to cut of Sheba's head, and to throw it to Joab; upon which Joab and his army retired.

SHEB'ARIM, שברים, signifies the breakings, or hopes, or expectation, otherwise, corn; סברים, surrounding, or about the high places. Shebarim, or Sabarim, a place about Ai and Bethel. The inhabitants of Ai pursued the Israelites from their city to Shebarim. (Josh. vii. 5.) Some take Shebarim in an appellative sense: 'They pursued them till they had entirely routed them.' Thus the Septuagint, "ἕως συνέτριψαν αὐτούς."

SHEB'NA, שבנה, σωβνάς, or Sobnas, signifies who rests himself, or who is now captive. Shebna, or Shebnah, was secretary under king Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii. 18.) This prince sent Shebna, Joah, and Asaph, to hear what Rabshakeh had to propose. Some pretend, that Shebna had been high priest; but the Scripture calls him the scribe, and the treasurer. See the prophecy pronounced against him by Isaiah (xxii. 15, &c.) which it is supposed was fulfilled in the reign of Manasseh, with whom, it is thought, he was taken captive, and carried to Babylon. Some suppose, from the expression in Isaiah, that Shebna had actually constructed a magnificent monument, sibi et suis, as the Latins speak. The contrast of such stability, with the rollings of a ball into a far country, is very strong. Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary, No. cex. p. 41.

SHE/CHEM, שכם, שחם, שחם, signifies part, portion, the back, shoulders, early in the morning. Shechem, son of Hamor, was prince of the Shechemites. He took Dinah, the daughter of Jacob, as she went to see a festival of the Shechemites, and dishonoured her, (Gen. xxxiv.) in the year of the world 2265. Afterwards, asking her in marriage, he obtained her, on condition that he and all the men of Shechem should be circumcised. This was agreed to; but on the third day after, when the wounds of the circumcision were at the sorest, Simeon and Levi, the two brothers of Dinah by the same mother, entered Shechem, and slew all the males. After this all the sons of Jacob, and their domestics, plundered the city.

SHECHEM, a city of Samaria, otherwise called Sychar, Neapolis, or Naplouse. Josephus says, that the people of the country called it Mabarcha; perhaps because of the vale of Morch, hard by. Joshua (xvii. 7; xx. 7.) appoints this city to Benjamin; it was in the mountains of this tribe. Jacob bought a field in the neighbourhood of this city, which by way of overplus he gave to his son Joseph, who was buried here. (Gen. xlviii. 22.) Near the same city was Jacob's well, or fountain, at which Jesus Christ discoursed with the woman of Samaria. (John iv. 5.) After the ruin of Samaria by Shalmaneser, Shechem was the capital of the Samaritans; and Josephus says, it was so in the time of Alexander the Great. It was ten miles from Shiloh, forty from Jerusalem, and fifty-two from Jericho. Jerome says, that Paula visited the church built on Jacob's fountain. Antoninus Martyr, Adamnanus, and Villibaldus, who wrote in the eighth century, speak of this church. Phocas, who wrote in the twelfth century, makes no mention of it.

'This town,' says Mr. Buckingham, 'is seated between the two hills of Gerizim, on the south, and Ebal on the north, and so fully occupies the valley between them, that the mountains may be said to press it in each side, and leave no room to add any thing to its breadth. Its length, however, is not so limited, as there is an extension of the valley to the east and west, which would admit of the buildings being continued in each of these directions. The town consists chiefly of two long streets, running nearly east and west, through the centre of the valley described, and those again intersected by several smaller ones, mostly crossing them at right angles. At the present time, (in the year 1816,) the town is populous and flourishing, and the grounds around it bear the marks of opulence and industry.'

The resident population of Shechem, or Napolose as it is now called, is thought to amount to ten thousand, though Mr. Buckingham conceives it to be rather less. These are almost all Mahometans; the few Greek Christians there, scarcely amounting to fifty in number. The town is governed by a Mutesellim, or Beg, as he is termed, subject to Damascus; and he has at present about four hundred Amaout soldiers. The men dress partly in the Turkish, and partly in the Arabian fashion; but their general appearance approaches nearer to the former. The women have the whole face covered with a coloured veil, as in the towns of the Yemen; and the scarf thrown over their head and shoulders is of a yellowish white, with a deep red border; the stuff being, seemingly, a silk manufacture, or, at least, a mixture of that with cotton.

'Napolose,' says Dr. Clarke, 'appears luxuriantly embosomed in the most delightful and fragrant bowers; half concealed by rich gardens, and by stately trees collected into groves, all around the bold and beautiful valley in which it stands. Trade seems to flourish among its inhabitants. Their principal employment is in making soap; but the manufactures of the town supply a very widely extended neighbourhood, and they are carried to a great distance upon camels.

'The history of Shechem, referring to events long prior to the Christian dispensation, directs us to antiquities which owe nothing of their celebrity to any traditional aid. The traveller, directing his footsteps towards its ancient sepulchres, as everlasting as the rocks in which they are hewn, is permitted, upon the authority of sacred and indisputable record, to contemplate the spot where the remains of Joseph, of Eleazar, and of Joshua, were severally deposited. If any thing connected with the memory of past ages be calculated to awaken local enthusiasm, the land around this city is pre-eminently entitled to that distinction.'

Though Napolose is a place of considerable trade with Damascus, and with the towns on the sea-coast, yet there were no Jews here who remained as permanent residents. As for the Samaritans, though a remnant of them still existed so late as the time of Maundrell's journey, or about a century ago, it does not appear that there were in 1816 half-a-dozen families remaining, and they were so obscurely known, and remained in such privacy, that many who had passed all their days in this town, did not know of the existence of such a sect. To so low a state are the people reduced, who once held this city as their metropolis, and who established here the chief seat of their religious as well as of their political power. Buckingham's Travels in Palestine, vol. ii. pp. 432-434; Clarke's Travels, vol. iv. pp. 268. 270.

SHE'KEL שֶׁקֶל, signifies weight, money. Shekel, Siclus, an Hebrew weight and money. (Exod. xxx. 23, 24. 2 Sam. xiv. 26.) Shekel is used to denote the weight of any thing, as iron, hair, spices, &c. Among the different opinions concerning the weight and value of the shekel, we shall adhere to that of Dr. Arbuthnot, who makes the weight of the shekel equal to 9dw. 2½gr. English Troy-weight; and the value equal to 2s. 3½d. sterling money; but the golden shekel was worth 1l. 16s. 6d. English money. Some are of opinion that the Jews had two kinds of shekels, namely, the common one already noticed, and the shekel of the sanctuary, which last they make double the former. But most authors make them the same, and think that the word sanctuary is added to express a just and exact weight, according to the standards kept in the temple or tabernacle. Moses (Numb. xviii. 16.) and Ezekiel (xlv. 12.) say, that the shekel was worth twenty gerahs. Arbuthnot's Tables of Ancient Coins, Weights, and Measures.

SHEK'INAH, שכנה, signifies Divine presence [tabernacling.] Nothing is more frequently mentioned in the writings of the Jews, than the Shekinah, by which they understand the presence of the Holy Spirit. In the Targums, or Chaldee paraphrases, we find the names Jehovah, or God; Memar, or the word; and Shekinah, or the Holy Ghost. They suppose the Holy Spirit, speaking and communicating itself to men by revelation; first, in the prophets; secondly, in the Urim and Thummim, of the high-priest's breast-plate; thirdly, in what the Hebrews call Bath-col, or the daughter of the voice. The Shekinah is the presence of the Holy Ghost, which resided in the temple of Jerusalem.

The Shekinah was the most sensible token of the presence of God, among the Hebrews; and it rested over the propitiatory, or over the golden cherubim, which adhered to the propitiatory, or covering of the ark. Here the Shekinah abode in a cloud; from hence God gave forth his oracles vocally, as is thought, when consulted by the high-priest on account of his people. Hence it is often said in Scripture, that God sits upon the cherubim, or between the cherubim; that is, he gives the most evident tokens of his divine presence, by answering from hence the inquiries of Israel. The Rabbins tell us, that the Shekinah first resided in the tabernacle prepared by Moses, in the wilderness, and that it descended therein on the day of its consecration, in the figure of a cloud. It passed from thence into the sanctuary of Solomon's temple, on the day of its dedication by this prince; where it continued till the destruction of Jerusalem, and the temple, by the Chaldeans, and was not afterwards seen there.

A late writer observes, that as to the nature of the fire which appeared in the burning bush, possibly it was the Shekinah, or usual token of the divine presence; and if so, it may lead us to think, whether the Shekinah was not of a very mild and gentle, though luminous appearance. Scripture Illustrated.

SHELOMITH, שלמים, signifies my peace, my happiness, my recompence. Shelomith, Salomith, or Salumith, daughter of Dibri, of the tribe Dan, was mother of that blasphemer, who, having blasphemed the name of the Lord in the camp, was condemned to be stoned. The Scripture tells us that Shelomith had this blasphemer by an Egyptian; which should be naturally understood of an Egyptian who had married her: but the Rabbins explain it otherwise. They say, Shelomith was a very handsome and virtuous woman, who having been solicited and tempted to criminal conversation by an Egyptian, an overseer of the Hebrews' labour, without complying with him; he at last found an opportunity, by night, of slipping into the house and bed of Shelomith, in the absence of her husband, and abused her simplicity.

The day following, when this woman discovered the injury, she bitterly complained of it to her husband, when he returned. He, at first, thought of putting her away, but kept her some time, to see if she should prove with child by the Egyptian. After some months her pregnancy becoming evident, he sent her away, and with words he assaulted the officer, who had done this outrage. The Egyptian abused him still farther, both by words and blows. Moses, coming hither by chance, and hearing of this injury done by the Egyptian to the Israelite, took up his defence, killed the Egyptian, and buried him in the sand.

The brethren of Shelomith, seeing their sister put away like an adulteress, pretended to call her husband to account for it, and to make him take her again. He refused; and they came to blows. Moses happened to be there again, and wished to reconcile them; but the husband of Shelomith asked him, what he had to do in the matter? Who had made him a judge over them? And, whether he had a mind to kill him also, as yesterday he killed the Egyptian? Moses, hearing this, fled from Egypt into the country of Midian.

The blasphemer stoned in the wilderness (Lev. xxiv. 10, 11.) was, say the Jews, the son of Shelomith and this Egyptian. The officer who inspected the Hebrews' labour is he of whom Moses speaks. (Exod. ii. 11, 12.) And the husband of Shelomith is intimated in the same place. (Exod. ii. 13, 14.) Thus the Jews corrupt the Scripture, by supplying the text, and refining on its narrations.

SHEM, שם, signifies name, renown; or he that puts, or places, or who is put, or placed. Shem, or Sem, son of Noah, (Gen. vi. 10.) was born in the year of the world 1558, before the deluge ninety-eight years. We think he was older than Japheth and Ham. He entered the ark with Noah his father. Afterwards when the good old man was overtaken with wine, and was naked in his tent, Shem and Japheth covered him, nor would see in him any thing indecent. When Noah awoke, he foretold blessings on Shem, saying, The Lord God of Shem be blessed [he shall dwell in the tents of Shem] and let Canaan be the slave of Shem. The great prerogative of Shem was, that from his race was to proceed the Messiah, and the worship of the true God was to be preserved among his posterity. Being an hundred years of age he begat Arphaxad, and died, aged six hundred years, in the year of the world 2158. Shem obtained for his portion the best provinces in Asia.

Shem had five sons, Elam, Asher, Arphaxad, Lud, and Aram, who peopled the finest provinces of the East. The principal design of Moses being to give the history and the laws of the Jews, he has carried the genealogy of Shem farther than those of the other sons of Noah, who were not directly included in his subject. It is pretended that Noah committed to Shem the body of Adam, which he sent and buried on Calvary. It is said, also, he deposited his will with him, by which he distributed the whole earth among his three sons. Among the heathen gods, Ham is Jupiter; Japheth, Neptune; and Shem, Pluto.

SHEMAIAH, שִׁמְעִי, signifies that hears; or that obeys the Lord. Shemaiah was a prophet, sent to Rehoboam, king of Judah, with a message from God, to forbid his war against Israel. (2 Chron. xi. 2.) Some years after this, Shishak, king of Egypt, came into Judea, against Rehoboam, and took the best places of his kingdom. The prophet Shemaiah told Rehoboam, and the princes of Judah, who had retired into Jerusalem, that they had forsaken the Lord; and now he, in his turn, will forsake them, and deliver them over into the hands of Shishak, king of Egypt. The king and the princes, being in a consternation, answered, 'The Lord is just;' but they humbling themselves, God moderated his anger and their sufferings.—Shemaiah wrote the history of Rehoboam. (2 Chron. xii. 15.)

SHEMAIAH, the Nehelamite, was a false prophet who lived at Babylon while Jeremiah was in Judea, and at Jerusalem. (Jer. xxix. 24, 25—31, 32.) Jeremiah having sent prophecies to the captive Jews at Babylon, Shemaiah the Nehelamite wrote back to the people at Jerusalem, to decry the prophet Jeremiah; and to Zephaniah, prince of the priests, and to the rest of the priests, to reproach them for not seizing and imprisoning Jeremiah, as one possessed with a spirit of false prophecy. Jeremiah, in his turn, wrote back to the Jews in captivity at Babylon. The Lord says, against Shemaiah the Nehelamite, and against his posterity, None of his race shall ever sit in the midst of the people, and he shall not share in the happiness of my people.

SHEPHERDS, or PASTORS. When the patriarch Joseph invited his father and brethren to settle in Egypt, he bid them tell Pharaoh they were shepherds, or breeders of sheep, that they might have the land of Goshen assigned for their habitation; Because, says Joseph, the Egyptians have an abomination to shepherds. It is inquired, Wherefore had the Egyptians such an abhorrence to shepherds? There are two reasons generally assigned for this: first, because the Hebrews, who bred sheep, also killed and ate them, or sacrificed them to their God; whereas the Egyptians worshipped sheep and goats, and thought it a great crime to kill or sacrifice them. Diodorus Siculus says, that sheep were in great veneration throughout all Egypt. And Strabo assures us, that they sacrificed them only in the Nome, or province of Nitria, or in that of Mendese, according to Herodotus.

Tacitus observes, that the Israelites sacrificed sheep and lambs, as if it were to insult Jupiter Ammon, the deity of Egypt; and that they killed oxen without scruple, to affront the ox Apis. But this does not prove that the employment of ox-keepers, or neat-herds, was of itself odious to the Egyptians, as the Scripture insinuates. On the contrary, this office would have recommended them to the esteem of the people, if they had not killed these animals; as in the Nome of Mendese, the keepers of goats were honoured, because the goat was the favourite deity of that district.

We must, therefore, seek another cause of Egyptian aversion from shepherds. Manetho relates, that an army of strangers, from the coasts of Arabia, or from the east, invaded Egypt, and finding it defenceless, they subdued it, and established a succession of kings in Lower Egypt, for about five hundred and eleven years. After this, the kings of Thebais, and of Upper Egypt, after a long war, at last drove them out of the country. These princes were called Hicsos, that is, king-shepherds. Some, says Manetho, affirm they were Arabians; but we find in other books, that they were not kings, but captives. For in Egyptian, the word hic, when pronounced hoc, signifies a captive. This reason of the hatred of the Egyptians against the shepherds appears to be plausible.

Abel was a keeper of sheep, (Gen. iv. 2.) as were the greater number of the ancient patriarchs. When men began to multiply, and to follow different employments, Jabal, son of Lamech and his wife Adah, was acknowledged as father, that is, founder of shepherds and nomades (Gen. iv. 20.): 'He was the father of such as dwell in tents, and of such as have cattle.' God sometimes takes the name of Shepherd of Israel (Isa. xl. 11.); and kings, both in Scripture and ancient writers, are distinguished by the title of shepherds of the people. The people forsaken, are compared to a flock without a shepherd. Isaiah says, that the Messiah shall feed his flock. God calls Cyrus his shepherd. The prophets often inveigh against the shepherds of Israel, against the kings, who feed themselves, and neglect their flocks; who distress them, treat them ill, seduce them, and lead them astray. (Ezek. xxxiv. 23.) The Lord says, (Isaiah lxiii. 11.) that he brought his people through the Red Sea, with their shepherds; that is, Moses, Aaron, and the chief of the people at their head. Micah says, (v. 5.) that the Lord shall raise seven shepherds over his people, and an eighth over the land of Assyria, to bring forth thence the people of Israel. We take these seven or eight shepherds, to be the seven princes confederate with Darius, son of Hystaspes, who killed Smerdis the Magian, that had seized the empire of Persia, after the death of Cambyses.

Zechariah (xi. 8.) mentions three shepherds whom the Lord had cut off in one month. These three were Aaron, Moses, and Miriam, who died in the wilderness; not, indeed, within the space of one month, but who all had the sentence of death passed on them in a month, and died at a little distance of time from one another. This is the explication of the Rabbins. Others think these three shepherds were David, Adonijah, and Joab, who all died in the space of one month.

The same Zechariah received order from the Lord, saying, 'take unto thee yet the instruments of a foolish shepherd; for,' says the Lord, 'I will raise up a shepherd in the land, which shall not visit those that be cut off,' &c. (Zech. xi. 14, 15.) The sheep having forsaken Jesus Christ, their lawful shepherd, were delivered up to foolish shepherds, who plunged them into calamities; these are the Roman emperors, successors of Tiberius. Caligula succeeded Tiberius; Claudius, Caligula; and Nero, Claudius. Every one knows the characters of these princes; that they were truly foolish shepherds, mad, wicked, and cruel.

The Messiah is often called a shepherd. 'I will set up shepherds over them, which shall feed them.' (Jer. xxiii. 4, 5.) Isaiah (xl. 11.) speaks in the same manner: 'He shall feed his flock like a shepherd; he shall gather the lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom, and shall gently lead those that are with young.' And Zechariah (xiii. 7.) says, 'Awake, O sword, against my shepherd, and against the man that is my fellow, saith the Lord of Hosts. Smite the shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered, and I will turn mine hand upon the little ones.' Jesus Christ refers this passage to his passion. (Matt. xxvi. 31.) He takes on himself the title of the good shepherd, who gives his life for his sheep. (John x. 11, 14, 15.) St. Paul calls him the great Shepherd of the sheep, (Heb. xiii. 20.); and St. Peter gives him the appellation of Prince of shepherds. (1 Pet. v. 4.)

SHE'SHACK, ששק, signifies bag of linen; otherwise, the sixth bag. By the name of Sheshach, or Sesach, Jeremiah (xxv. 26.; li. 41.) hints at Babylon. Jeremiah was to cause all nations to drink of the cup of the Lord's fury, and the 'king of Sheshach shall drink after them.' And elsewhere, 'How is Sheshach taken, and how is the praise of the whole earth surprised! How is Babylon become an astonishment among the nations!' But how comes it that he gives this name to Babylon? Jerome thinks he does it out of caution, not to provoke Nebuchadnezzar, who then was besieging Jerusalem. We take Sheshach to be a pagan deity, chiefly worshipped at Babylon. He gives this city the name of its tutelar deity, as he says (Jer. l. 2.) 'Babylon is taken; Bel is confounded; Merodach is broken in pieces.' Bel and Merodach were gods of the country. Sheshach was, probably, the moon. At Babylon they celebrated feasts called Sacæa, which greatly resembled the Roman Saturnalia. The servants then acted the part of masters. Strabo says they were celebrated in honour of Anais, which is Diana, or the moon.

SHIB/BOLETH, שִׁבְּוֶלֶת, Vulgate. Scibboleth (Judg. xii. 6.) signifies burden, ear of corn; or current of water. Shibboleth, or Sibboleth, is an Hebrew word, which signifies an ear of corn, spica. After Jephthah had beat the Ammonites, the men of Ephraim were jealous of this advantage obtained by the tribes beyond Jordan, and complained heavily that they had not been called to this expedition. Jephthah answered with much moderation: but that did not prevent the Ephraimites from using contemptuous words toward the men of Gilead; telling them they were only fugitives from Ephraim and Manasseh, a kind of bastards, that belonged to neither of the two tribes. To fighting they went, and the men of Gilead killed a great number of Ephraim. After this, they set guards at all the passes of Jordan; and when an Ephraimite, who had escaped, came to the water-side, and desired to pass over, they asked him, if he was not an Ephraimite? If he said No; they bid him pronounce Shibboleth, which signifies an ear of corn. But he pronouncing it Sibboleth, according to the pronunciation of the Ephraimites, and not well pronouncing the first letter, they killed him on the spot; on this occasion there were killed forty-two thousand Ephraimites.

SHIELD. In Scripture, God is often called the shield of his people, (Gen. xv. 1.); 'I am thy shield,' says God to Abraham. The Psalmist says, (Psalm v. 12.) 'Thou, Lord, wilt bless the righteous; with favour wilt thou compass him, as with a shield.' Princes and great men are also called the shield of the people. 'The shields of the earth belong unto God,' or are dependent upon him. (Psalm xlvi. 9.) The Septuagint have it;—the strong gods of the earth have exalted themselves.

The common materials of a shield were wood: it was covered with leather, with plates of gold, or brass. Sometimes they were all of gold, or brass. Solomon made some of massy gold, which Shishak, king of Egypt, took away; and Rehoboam made others of brass to serve in their stead. (1 Kings xiv. 26, 27.) Goliath's shield was of brass. Nahum (ii. 3.) describes the shields of the Chaldeans as bright and sparkling. The Psalmist says, that God shall cause peace to reign among his people, and that they shall throw their shields into the fire. (Psalm xlv. 9.) These shields, therefore, were of wood.

They hung their shields around the towers for ornament, and to use on occasion. The tower of David was adorned with a thousand shields, hung round about it: there were deposited arms of all kinds. (Cant. iv. 4.)

SHIGGAION, שִׁיגְיֹון, signifies a song of trouble, or comfort. Shiggaion, Shigionoth, or Sigaion. This word occurs in the Hebrew. (Psalm vii. title, and Habakkuk iii. 1.) The Septuagint have translated it by Psalm or Canticle; but Aquila, and Symmachus, have rendered it, by ignorance, or sins of ignorance. Theodotion, in Habakkuk, has it, for voluntary sins; but there is reason to doubt whether his text be very entire. Some think Shiggaion is an instrument of music; some a certain air, or tune, to which this psalm was sung. Others translate it, the error of David; the secret of David; the delight of David; the disquiet of David. Calmet thinks it ought to be translated, a song of trouble, or, a song of consolation of David.

SHI'LOH, שִׁילֹה, שִׁלָּה, or Silo, signifies peace, or abundance; otherwise, that deceives, or mocks, according to the Syriac. This term is famous among interpreters and commentators, on Scripture. It is used (Gen. xlix. 10.) to denote the Messiah. The Patriarch Jacob foretells his coming, in these words: 'The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come, and unto him shall the gathering of the people be.' The Hebrew text reads עַד כִּי יָבֹא שִׁילֹה, 'Until Shiloh come.' All Christian commentators agree, that this word ought to be understood of the Messiah, of Jesus Christ; but all are not agreed about its literal and grammatical signification. Jerome, who translates it by qui mittendus est, manifestly reads Shiloach, sent, instead of Shiloh. The Septuagint translate Ἔως ἀνέλθῃ τὰ ἀποκείμενα αὐτῷ. Or, Ἔως ἀνέλθῃ ὃ ἀπόκειται. As if they had read שִׁלֹּה, instead of שִׁלָּה: 'Until the coming of him to whom it is reserved; or till we see arrive that which is reserved for him.'

It must be owned that the signification of the word Shiloh is not well ascertained. Some translate, 'the sceptre shall not depart from Judah, till he comes to whom it belongs,' שִׁלָּה, or שִׁלֹּה, instead of שִׁלָּה. Others, 'till the coming of the peace-maker, or, the pacific, or of prosperity,' שִׁלָּה, prosperatus est. Shalah signifies, 'to be in peace, to be in prosperity.' Others, 'till the birth of him who shall be born of a woman, without the knowledge of man,' שִׁלֹּה or שִׁלָּה, secundina, fluxus. Otherwise, 'the sceptre shall not depart from Judah till its end, its ruin; till the downfall of the kingdom of the Jews.' Some Rabbins have taken the name Silo, or Shilo, for a city of this name in Palestine:—'The sceptre shall not depart from Judah till it come to Shiloh,' שִׁלָּה, or שִׁלֹּה. It has ceased, it has finished, says Le Clerc in Genesis, till it be taken from him, to be given to Saul, at Shiloh. But where is it said, that Saul was acknowledged as king, or consecrated at Shiloh? If we would understand it of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, the matter is equally uncertain. The Scripture mentions no assembly at Shiloh, that admitted him king. A modern author derives Shiloh from Shalah, שִׁלָּה, fatigare, which sometimes signifies to be weary, to suffer; 'till his labours, his sufferings, his passion shall happen.'

So much for the grammatical signification of Shiloh: it is sufficient that the ancient Jews are, in this matter, agreed with the Christians, that this word stands for Messiah the king; so the paraphrasts Onkelos and Jonathan, the ancient Hebrew commentaries on Genesis, and the Talmudists themselves explain it. The sceptre continued among the Jews: they had kings of their own nation, in the persons of the Herods; but soon afterwards the sceptre was entirely taken away from them, and has never been restored to them since.

The Jews seek in vain to put forced meanings on this prophecy of Jacob, saying, for example, that the sceptre intimates the dominion of strangers, to which they have been in subjection; or, the hope of seeing, one day, the sceptre or supreme power settled again among themselves. It is easy to perceive that this is contrived to deliver themselves out of perplexity. In vain, likewise, they take refuge in certain princes of the captivity, whom they pretend to have subsisted beyond the Euphrates, exercising an authority over the nation, little short of absolute; and being of the race of David. This pretended succession of princes is perfectly chimerical; and though at certain times they could show a succession, it never continued long; and their authority was too obscure, and too limited, to be the object of a prophecy so remarkable as this.

SHILOH, a famous city of Ephraim, (Josh. xviii. xix. xxi.) twelve miles distant from Shechem, according to Eusebius; ten miles, according to Jerome: it was in Acrabatene, according to both. In Jerome's time Shiloh was ruined, and nothing remarkable was found there, but the foundation of the altar of burnt-offerings, which had been erected when the tabernacle was there. At Shiloh Joshua assembled the people, to make the second distribution of the Land of Promise. (Josh. xviii. 1, 2, 3.) Here the tabernacle of the Lord was set up, when the people were settled in the country. (Josh. xix. 51.) The ark and the tabernacle of the Lord continued at Shiloh from the year of the world 2560, when it was set up by Joshua, to the year of the world 2888, when it was taken by the Philistines, under the administration of the high-priest Eli. At Shiloh Samuel began to prophesy. (1 Sam. iv. 4.) Here the prophet Ahijah dwelt. (1 Kings xiv. 2.) Jeremiah foretold that the temple of Jerusalem should be reduced to the same condition as Shiloh was. (Jer. vii. 12. 14.; xxvi. 6. 9.) After the return of the ark out of the country of the Philistines, instead of returning it to Shiloh, the ark was taken to Kirjath-jearim. (1 Sam. vi. 21.)

Reland conjectures, that, from the name Shiloh, Pausanias took occasion to say that Silenus, the companion of Bacchus, was buried in Palestine. Benjamin of Tudela affirms that the tomb of Samuel was to be seen here. On the medals of Shechem, or Neapolis, we see Silenus represented; which should make us think that it was rather at Shechem than at Shiloh they might expect to find the tomb of this demi-god.

SHIM'EI, שִׁמְעִי, signifies that hears, or obeys; otherwise, name of the heap. Shimei, son of Gera, a kinsman of Saul's, who, when David was obliged to retire to Jerusalem, began to curse him, and throw stones, &c. (2 Sam. xvi. 5, 6, 7, 8, &c.)

But when David returned to Jerusalem after the defeat and death of Absalom, Shimei hastened with the men of Judah, and with a thousand men of Benjamin, to come before David: he threw himself at his feet, desiring him to forget and forgive his fault. Abishai, the son of Zeruiah, expostulated in an angry manner; but David disapproved of Abishai's zeal, and promised Shimei, with an oath, that he would not put him to death. And, in truth, he suffered him to live in peace, while he himself lived; but before his death he recommended to Solomon not to let Shimei go entirely unpunished, but to exercise his discretion upon him.

When Solomon therefore ascended the throne, he confined Shimei to Jerusalem, where Shimei dwelt three years, till some of his slaves ran away from him, and took sanctuary with Achish, king of Gath. Shimei went after them, and brought them to Jerusalem. The king, being informed of this, caused Shimei to come before him, and said to him; Did not I assure you, that the day you quitted your confinement, you should be put to death? So he gave orders to Benaiah, the son of Jehoiada, to kill him.

SHI'NAR, שִׁנְעָר, signifies watch of him that sleeps; otherwise, spoil of the tooth. Shinar, or Sennaar, a province of Babylonia, in which the tower of Babel was built. (Gen. xi. 2.) Calneh was built in the same country. (Gen. x. 10.) Amraphel, king of Shinar, was a potent prince in the time of Abraham. (Gen. xiv. 1.) Daniel says, (i. 2.) that Nebuchadnezzar carried away the sacred vessels of the temple of Jerusalem, and put them in the temple of his god, in the land of Shinar. There is a great probability that the mountains of Singares, or Zagras, as well as the city and river of Singare, take their name from Shinar, Sennaar, or Sengar.

'Shinar,' says a late writer, 'was certainly a considerable extent of level country; it included Babylon, and probably extended further south; but how much we cannot very well tell. It is extremely probable that the city Singara marks some part of this province; in which case, Babylonia would be a part of the land of Shinar, rather than the land of Shinar a part of Babylonia; and indeed this would lead us to consider the land of Shinar as that extent between the rivers Tigris and Euphrates, which was afterwards called Mesopotamia. To this agrees the opinion of Michaelis, which extends Shinar so far north, as to include Nisibis and Edessa: Shinar might be the original name of this whole extent, which might afterwards be divided into Padan-aram and other parts, like as Mesopotamia was, under the Roman government.' Taylor's Sacred Geography.

SHI'SHAK, שִׁשָּׁק, signifies, present of the bag, of the pot, of the thigh; otherwise, of the kiss. Shishak, or Sesac, king of Egypt, declared war against Rehoboam, king of Judah, in the fifth year of Rehoboam. The king of Egypt had twelve thousand war chariots, and sixty thousand horse, with an innumerable multitude of people, out of Egypt, the countries of Lubim, of Sachim, and of Cush. He entered Judea, and made himself master of the strongest places in the country, advancing to Jerusalem. Then the prophet Shemaiah came to Rehoboam, and the princes of Judah, in Jerusalem, and said, thus saith the Lord, As you have forsaken me, so I have delivered you up into the hands of king Shishak. But they acknowledging their fault, God seeing their humiliation, said to Shemaiah; Since they have humbled themselves under my hand, I will not destroy them.

Shishak entered Jerusalem, but soon withdrew, taking with him the treasures of the Lord's house, and those of the king's palace. He carried away with him the golden bucklers that Solomon had made. The rabbins are of opinion, that the chief motive of this prince's war against Rehoboam, was because he coveted to possess the ivory throne of Solomon, with which he was charmed. This is the Shishak to whom Jeroboam fled, toward the end of Solomon's reign; and when Shishak came into Judea, he did no harm to Jeroboam's territories, (2 Chron. xii. 2, 3, 4. 1 Kings xiv. 25, 26, &c.) in the year of the world 3033.

Perhaps Jeroboam might invite him to invade Rehoboam's country. Till the time of Shishak the Scripture mentions the kings of Egypt by the general name of Pharaoh; Shishak is the first whose proper name is mentioned. Chronologists are not agreed as to the correct order of Shishak in the Egyptian dynasties. Some will have him to be the same as Sesonchis; others Sesostris, or Sesothis. Usher thinks him to be Sesonchis, and places the beginning of his reign in the year of the world 3026.

This Shishak, or Sesac, according to Sir Isaac Newton, in his chronology of ancient kingdoms amended, was the greatest conqueror, and the most celebrated hero, of all antiquity, being the son of Ammon, or the Egyptian Jupiter, and known to the Greeks by the name of Bacchus, Osiris, and Hercules; was the Belus of the Chaldeans, the Mars, or Mavors, of the Thracians, &c. He made great conquests in India, Assyria, Media, Scythia, Phenicia, Syria, Judea, &c. His army was at length routed in Greece by Perseus; which disgrace, together with the attempts of his brother Danaus to usurp his kingdom in his absence, obliged him to return into Egypt in the ninth year of his expedition. From hence he drove his brother Danaus, who took refuge in Greece, and was there celebrated by the name of Neptune, Japetus, Tiphon, Python, &c.

SHIT'TIM, שִׁטִּים, sarritin, signifies that turn away, or divert; otherwise scourges, rods, or thorns. Shittim was a sort of precious wood, of which Moses made the greater part of the tables, altars, and planks, belonging to the tabernacle. The Septuagint have rendered this word incorruptible wood. Jerome says, the Shittim wood grows in the deserts of Arabia, and is like white-thorn as to its colour and leaves: but the tree is so large as to furnish very long planks. The wood is hard, tough, smooth, without knots, and extremely beautiful. It is thought that this wood is the black acacia, because, as they say, this is the only tree found growing in the deserts of Arabia. It is so hard and solid, as to become almost incorruptible. When cut, it is of the colour of a Lotos-tree, and planks are taken from it twelve cubits long. Its branches do not rise up in height; its leaves are round and large, like those of a pear tree, soot-colour underneath, and green above.

Prosper Alpinus says, that the Acacia is called Sant by the Egyptians; that it is found in Egypt, in places distant from the sea; is very common about Mount Sinai, on the mountains which border on the Red Sea; that it grows about as tall as a mulberry tree; its trunk is of the thickness of a plumb-tree, its bark is black, rough, and covered with very sharp thorns. Its leaves are oblong, small, and very short. It bears a pale, yellowish, or white, flower. The male bears no fruit, but is close set with thorns. The female bears fruit twice a year, and has much fewer thorns. This, they say, is the true description of the Acacia of Arabia.

SHOSHAN'NIM, שׁוֹשַׁןִּים, signifies an instrument of six strings. Shoshannim is a word in the titles of Psalms xlv. lxxx. which the Septuagint translate ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀλλοιωθησομένων, those that shall be changed; Aquila, ἐπὶ τοῖς κρίνοις, the lilies; Symmachus, ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀνθῶν, the flowers. Le Clerc takes this to signify only the master of a musical instrument, called shoshannim; and Calmet thinks shoshannim to have been the name of a musical instrument of six strings, or a song of rejoicing.

SHOULDER. To give or lend his shoulder for bearing of a burden, signifies to submit to servitude, (Gen. xlix. 15.); 'Isachar bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant unto tribute.' The preacher advises his pupil to submit his shoulder to the yoke of wisdom. (Ecclus. vi. 26.) The Messiah has delivered his people from the rod, or from the yoke to which they were subject. (Isa. ix. 4.) The same prophet, (x. 27.) comforting Israel with the promise of deliverance from Assyria, says, 'His burden shall be taken away from off thy shoulder.' The Scripture calls that a rebellious shoulder, a withdrawing shoulder, that will not submit to the yoke; and those that bear it together with joint consent, 'serving with one shoulder.'

Marks of honour and command were worn on the shoulder. Job (xxxi. 36.) desires of God to decide his cause: 'Surely I would take it upon my shoulder, and bind it as a crown to me.' Isaiah (ix. 6.) says, that the Messiah shall bear the insignia of his government on his shoulder. God promises Eliakim, the son of Hilkiah, to give him 'the key of the house of David, and to lay it upon his shoulder.'

'To be borne upon shoulders,' sometimes stands for a kind of honour and distinction. God says, that when he shall bring back his people from the captivity of Babylon, he will give a signal to the people, 'and they shall bring thy sons in their arms, and thy daughters shall be carried upon their shoulders.' (Isa. xlix. 22.)

Sometimes, on the contrary, this denotes great weakness, great disgrace. God commanded Ezekiel to make a breach in the wall, and carry out his goods thereby, on his shoulder, in the night-time; to represent the taking of Jerusalem, and the captivity of the king and people. (Ezek. xii. 6, 7.)

SHU'NAM, שׁוֹנָם, signifies their change, their repeating; otherwise, their second; otherwise, sleep.

SHU'NAMITE, or SUNAMITE, a daughter, or woman, born at Shunem. This surname was given to Abishag, the spouse of David, married in his old age to keep him warm. (1 Kings i. 3. 15.; ii. 17. 21, 22.) It was given also to the hostess of Elisha, who entertained that prophet when he came to Shunem. (2 Kings iv. 12. 25. 36.) It is given to the spouse in Canticles (vi. 13.) by a corrupt reading of Sunamitis, instead of Sulamitis.

SHU'SHAN, שושן, σουσολ, signifies the lily, or rose; otherwise joyful. This word is met with in the title of Psalm lx. Calmet takes it to be the name of a musical instrument of six strings. The Vulgate reads Pro his qui Immutabuntur. Le Clerc confesses his ignorance of the import of this word.

SHUSHAN, or SUSAN, the capital city of Susiana, or the country of Elam, that is, Persia. (Dan. viii. 2.) Daniel always calls it the Palace: 'I was at Shushan, in the palace;' perhaps Shushan royal, because the kings of Chaldea had here a royal palace. After Cyrus, the kings of Persia took a custom of passing the winter here, and the summer at Ecbatana. The winter was very moderate at Shushan, but the heat of the summer was so great that the very lizards and serpents, if surprised by it in the streets, were even burned up by the heat of the sun. This city stands upon the river Ulai. In this city, and on this river, Daniel had the vision of the ram with two horns, and the goat with one horn, &c., in the third year of the reign of Belshazzar (Dan. viii. 1, 2, 3, &c.), in the year of the world 3447.

Also in this city of Shushan, the history of Esther happened. Here Ahasuerus, or Darius, the son of Hystaspes, generally resided and reigned. (Esther i. 1, 2. 5. &c.) Pliny says, he rebuilt Shushan, enlarged, and adorned it. Nehemiah was also at Shushan, when he obtained from king Artaxerxes permission to return into Judea, and to repair the walls of Jerusalem. (Nehem. i. 1.) Benjamin of Tudela, and Abulfarage, place the tomb of Daniel at Chuzestan, which is the ancient city of Shushan, the capital of the province of Elam.

Lightfoot says, that the outward gate of the eastern wall of the temple, was called the gate of Shushan, and that upon this gate was carved the figure of the city of Shushan, in acknowledgment of the decree granted at Shushan by Darius, son of Hystaspes, which permitted the rebuilding of the temple. Some, however, question whether this might not rather be the arms, or insignia, of the city Shushan, as, for instance, three lilies, proper.

The modern name of this province, is Khuzistan, or Chuzestan, while that of the ruins of the capital is the same as before, being Shus or Shushan. Mr. Macdonald Kinnier observes, that Shus is a Pehlivi word, signifying pleasant; and that when Shapoor, the conqueror of Valerian, erected his royal city on the banks of the Karoon (not fifty miles from this ancient capital) he called it Shus-ter, which means, more pleasant.

The ruins of Susa, in themselves, present an appearance not at all unlike those of Babylon, being a succession of similar mounds, covered with fragments of bricks, tiles, &c. and stretching over a space of country to the extent of ten or twelve miles. Of these mounds two stand pre-eminent and of enormous expanse; one being in circumference a mile, and the other nearly two; their height measures about 150 feet. They are composed of huge masses of sun-dried bricks, and courses of burnt brick and mortar, and stand not very far from the banks of the Kerrah, or Kara-Sou; from whose eastern shore the vestiges of this famous capital are yet traceable nearly to the banks of the Abzal, the river Euleus, or Ulai, approaching the town of Desphoul. The people of the country distinguish those two great mounds, by the names of the Castle and the Palace; and at the foot of the largest appears a little dome-like building, under which travellers are shown the tomb of the prophet Daniel. A dervise resides there, impressed with a belief of its peculiar sanctity, and points to the grave of the inspired son of Judah, with as much homage as if it belonged to one of his own most respected imauns. Though covered by this modern structure, no doubt is held by Jew, Arab, or Mussulman, of the great antiquity of the tomb beneath; all bearing the same tradition, that it indeed contains the remains of the prophet.

Josephus mentions a famous edifice built by Daniel at Susa, in the manner of a castle, which, the Jewish historian adds, was remaining in his time, and had been finished with such wonderful art, that even then it seemed as fresh and beautiful as if only newly built. Within this edifice, he continues, was the place where the Persian and Parthian kings used to be buried; and for the sake of the founder, the keeping of it was committed to one of the Jewish nation, even at that day. It must be observed, that the copies of Josephus, now extant, do indeed place this building in Ecbatana in Media; but St. Jerome, who also gives an account of it, and professes to do so word for word out of Josephus, places it in Susa in Persia; and this makes it plain, that the copy of Josephus, from which Jerome quoted, had it as he says. And this most likely is the true reading; for Susa having been within the Babylonian empire (before it came into the possession of Cyrus), the Scriptures tell us that Daniel sometimes resided there; and a common tradition has existed in those parts for ages, that Daniel died in that city, and there they show his monument unto this day. Besides, it is to be observed, that Josephus calls this building 'Baris,' which is derived from the Chaldee berah, and which is often met with in the sense of a palace, a great house enclosed on all sides, in the form of a tower, in the Hebrew books written after the captivity, as in the books of Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther. It is the same by which Daniel himself distinguishes the castle or palace of Shushan; for what we translate 'at Shushan in the palace,' (Dan. viii. 2.) is in the original Besh Shushan Ha Birah: here, no doubt, the Birah of Daniel is the same as the Baris of Josephus, and both signify the palace or castle built at Shushan by Daniel, while governor of its province.

The site of Susa or Shushan, the once noble metropolis of the ancient princes of Elamis, is now a mere wilderness, given up to beasts of prey; no human being disputing their reign, excepting the poor dervise who keeps watch over the tomb of the prophet. Sir R. K. Porter's Travels in Georgia, Persia, &c.; vol. ii. pp. 411—414.

SI'DON, צִידוֹן, signifies hunting, or craft; otherwise, food, or sustenance; otherwise, the ship of the judge. Sidon, or Zidon, the eldest son of Canaan, (Gen. x. 15.) was founder of the very ancient city of Sidon, the capital of Phenicia.

SIDON, or Zidon, a very ancient, and famous city, founded by Sidon the eldest son of Canaan. Strabo places Sidon four hundred stadia from Berytus, and two hundred from Tyre.

The name Sidon is commonly derived from the Hebrew or Tyrian word צִידָה, Zada, which signifies to fish. Joshua (xi. 8.) calls it Sidon the Great, by way of eminence. Hence some have taken occasion to say, that in his time there were two Sidons, a greater and a less. But no geographer has mentioned any other Sidon than Sidon the Great. Joshua assigned Sidon to the tribe of Asher, (Joshua xix. 28.); but this tribe could never get possession of it. (Judg. i. 31.) It is situated on the Mediterranean, in a fine country, one day's journey from Paneas, or from the fountains of Jordan. It has a fine harbour. Abulfeda places it sixty miles from Damascus. This city has been always famous for its great trade and navigation. At present it is called Saïde. There are extant some ancient medals of Sidon, on which are seen ancient Phenician characters, which are the same as the Hebrew characters before the captivity of Babylon. The principal deities of the Sidonians were Baal and Astarte, or, the sun, and moon, also Hercules. The Hebrews often fell into the idolatry of the Phenicians, especially after Ahab, king of Israel, married Jezebel, the daughter of Eshbaal, king of the Zidonians. (1 Kings xvi. 31.) There is frequent mention of this city in the Scriptures.

The following is Volney's account of Sidon: 'As we return to the sea coast, we must first remark Saïde, the degenerate offspring of ancient Sidon. This town, formerly the residence of the pacha, is, like all the Turkish towns, ill-built, and full of modern ruins. Saïde is a considerable trading town, and is the chief emporium of Damascus, and the interior country. The French, who are the only Europeans to be found there, have a consul, and five or six commercial houses. The exports consist in silk; and particularly in raw and spun cotton. The manufacture of this cotton is the principal art of the inhabitants, the number of whom may be estimated at about five thousand.'

The city, as it exists at present, rises immediately from the strand; and, when seen from a slight distance, presents a rather imposing appearance. The interior, however, is wretched and gloomy. 'About half-way between Saïde (or Sidon) and Soor (or Sour, Tyre) are very extensive ruins of towns which once connected these two cities; but of these ruins there is now scarcely one stone left upon another. They consist chiefly of lines which show, rased even with the soil, the foundation of houses—many stones irregularly scattered—a few cisterns with half-defaced sculpture on them; and, at a considerable distance from the path, there are at one spot several low columns, either mutilated or considerably sunk in the earth. These relics show, what it needed, indeed, no such evidence to prove, that in peaceable and flourishing times, on this road between two such considerable cities as Tyre and Sidon, there must have been many smaller towns for business, pleasure, and agriculture, delightfully situated by the sea-side; but peaceful security has long been a blessing unknown to these regions; and we may apply to them the language of Judges (v. 7.) 'The villages ceased; they ceased in Israel.' Jowett's Christian Researches in Syria, pp. 129, 130; Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 623; Taylor's Sacred Geography; Volney's Travels, vol. ii. p. 207.

SIGN. This word is taken for whatever serves to express, or represent, another thing; as, when God gave to Noah the rainbow, as a sign of his covenant, (Gen. ix. 12, 13.): when he appointed circumcision to Abraham, as the seal of the covenant made with him and his posterity. (Gen. xvii. 11.) The sun and the moon are appointed by God for signs and seasons. It is often rendered token in the English translation. (Gen. i. 14.)

2. Sign is put for a miracle: Thou shalt do these signs and wonders, in the midst of Egypt, says the Lord to Moses, (Exod. iv. 7, 8, 9.); and if the Egyptians do not believe the first sign, they will believe the second, &c. The word sign is very frequent in this sense, in Scripture.

3. Sign, or token, is often put for the proof, or evidence, of a thing: so, (Exod. iii. 12.) 'This shall be a token (or sign) unto thee, that I have sent thee.' 'Show me a sign, that thou talkest with me,' that is, a proof. (Judg. vi. 17.) 'What shall be the sign (or evidence) that the Lord will heal me?' (2 Kings xx. 8.) This acceptation agrees with the first mentioned; also, (Gen. iv. 15.) 'And the Lord set a mark (a sign) upon Cain;' he put a token upon him that he might be known, or rather, according to Shuckford, he gave him a sign of security to ease his mind.

4. Signs of Heaven; signs of the Magicians; phenomena of the heavens; impostures of magicians, which they use to deceive the unwary. 'The Lord frustrateth the tokens (or signs) of the liars, and maketh diviners mad.' (Isaiah xlv. 25.) And in Jeremiah, (x. 2.) 'Be not dismayed at the signs of Heaven, for the heathen are dismayed at them.'

5. 'Behold I and the children whom the Lord hath given me, are for signs and for wonders in Israel,' (Isaiah viii. 18.); that is, what shall happen to me shall be a prophetic similitude of what shall happen to the people. (Ezekiel iv. 3.) The Lord pours down his vengeance upon sinners, and makes them a sign, as a public and sensible proof of his wrath. (Ezek. xiv. 8.)

SI'HON, סִיחֹן, signifies rooting out; otherwise, conclusion. Sihon, king of the Amorites, not only refusing passage to the Hebrews, but coming to attack them, was slain, and his army routed. (Numb. xxi. 21, 22. Deut. i. 4. 11. 24. 26. 30. Psalm cxxxv. 11.; cxxvi. 19.) Heshbon his capital city was taken, and his dominions were distributed among Israel. This war happened in the last year of Moses's life, some months before the Israelites entered the Land of Promise; in the year of the world 2553. Moses observes, that Sihon had made a conquest from the Moabites, of the best part of the country he then possessed, and had settled himself in their place. On this account, in the time of Jephthah, the Ammonites and Moabites demanded that country which Israel had formerly conquered from Sihon, pretending it belonged to them. (Judg. xi. 12, 13, 14.) But Jephthah answered, that Moses and the Hebrews having taken it from Sihon, who was then in peaceable possession of it, and having conquered it in a fair war, it belonged to Israel, and that neither Moab nor Ammon had any right to it.

SI'HOR, סִיחֹר, סָוֶס, signifies black, trouble, or early in the morning. Sihor, or Sichor, is a name of the Nile. (Josh. xiii. 3.) The water of the Nile is generally turbid.

SIHOR is thought to be a city in the western part of the tribe of Asher. It cannot be far from Carmel. Reland imagines that this may be the city, or the river, of Crocodiles, which Pliny and Strabo place in this country. Strabo says, it is between Ptolemais and the Tower of Straton, or Cæsarea of Palestine. The Hebrew reads Shihor-libnath, (Josh. xix. 26.); and Calmet thinks Libnath to be the white promontory between Ecdippe and Tyre, and Sihor to be a rivulet in this neighbourhood.

SILAS, Σίλας, signifies the third. It is thought to be the same as Silvanus, which signifies one that loves the woods or forests. Silas, or Silvanus, was, according to St. Luke, (Acts. xv. 22.) one of the chief men among the brethren; which gives room to judge, that he was of the number of the seventy. When a dispute was raised at Antioch, about the observance of the legal ceremonies, they chose Paul, Barnabas, Judas, and Silas, to go to Jerusalem, to advise with the apostles on this question. He is believed by Hieron, to be the same Silas, mentioned by the name of Silvanus, in the two Epistles of St. Paul to the Thessalonians. St. Peter sent his first Epistle by him from Rome, in which he entitles him a faithful brother. Silas joined himself to St. Paul; and, after Paul and Barnabas had parted on account of John Mark, (Acts xv. 37—41.) Silas went with St. Paul, to visit the churches of Syria and Cilicia. Thence they passed into Lycaonia, Phrygia, and Galatia; and lastly, they crossed the sea, and came into Macedonia.

At Philippi, they found a woman who was possessed with a spirit of Python, from which St. Paul dispossessed her. Her masters, therefore, seized Paul and Silas, dragged them before the magistrates, and accused them of introducing customs contrary to those of the Romans. The magistrates ordered Paul and Silas to be publicly whipped and imprisoned. In the night there was a great earthquake; and the gaoler was converted, and received baptism with his whole family. The day following the magistrates sent orders to liberate Paul and Silas; but Paul replied, that Roman citizens were not to be used thus, and that the magistrates themselves should come and liberate them. These words of St. Paul give room to judge that Silas also was a freeman of Rome.

From Philippi they went to Thessalonica and Berea; St. Paul proceeding to Athens, he sent for Silas thither, who however did not join him again till they met at Corinth, in the year of Christ 52; here they wrote the two Epistles to the Thessalonians. Silas was very useful to him in preaching the Gospel. (2 Cor. i. 19.) The Greeks improperly distinguish between Silas and Silvanus. Some refer to Silas what St. Paul says to the Corinthians, (2 Cor. viii. 18, 19.): 'And we have sent with him the brother, whose praise is in the Gospel throughout all the churches; and not that only, but who was also chosen of the churches to travel with us with this grace, which is administered by us to the glory of the same Lord,' &c. Some have thought that Silas was the same as the evangelist St. Luke; Silas referring to woods, and Lucus to groves.

SILOAM, שִׁלּוֹם, silwām, or Shiloah, signifies sent, or who sends; otherwise, dart, branch, or whatever is sent; or, otherwise, according to the Syriac, that spoils, or is spoiled. Siloam, says Calmet, was a fountain under the walls of Jerusalem, east, between the city and the brook Kidron. Epiphanius writes, that God gave this fountain at the intercession of the prophet Isaiah. But it was in being long before this prophet; and there is great probability that it is the same as the fountain En-rogel, or the fuller's fountain in Joshua, Samuel, and the Kings. (Josh. xv. 7.; xviii. 16. 2 Sam. xvii. 17. 1 Kings i. 9.) The situation of the fountain of Rogel east of, and below, the walls of Jerusalem, the same as the fountain of Siloam, convinces us that it must be the same fountain; for there was but one on this side. Josephus often speaks of the waters of Siloe, or Siloam; he says, that, when Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem, this fountain increased its waters; and that the same happened when Titus besieged the city. So that whereas before, water could hardly be bought for money, during the siege it abundantly supplied the Roman army, and was besides sufficient for watering the gardens.

Reland says that there was a custom of drawing water out of the fountain of Siloam; and pouring it out before the Lord, in the temple, at the time of evening sacrifice; to which there seems to be some allusion in John vii. 37. A learned writer is of opinion, that Siloam was the nearest fountain to the temple, and not far from it. The man blind from his birth, was directed by our Lord to 'wash in the pool of Siloam.' Now if, observes this writer, our Lord went out of the temple by one of the western gates into the city, then he might meet with this blind man pretty close to the temple; and most likely he sent him to Siloam, as the nearest fountain in which he might wash; so that there was no affectation in our Lord's conduct (such as directing him through the most public streets, &c. of the city, in order to give this cure the greater publicity, &c.) but a simplicity, readiness, and neatness, very agreeable to his general character; while, at the same time, it continued that allusion to the benefits derivable from the pool of Siloam, which is by interpretation sent.

'Having descended Mount Sion,' says Chateaubriand, 'on the east side, we came at its foot, to the fountain and pool of Siloe, where Christ restored sight to the blind man. The spring issues from a rock, and runs in a silent stream, according to the testimony of Jeremiah, which is contradicted by a passage of St. Jerome. It has a kind of ebb and flood, sometimes discharging its current like the fountain of Vaucluse, at others retaining and scarcely suffering it to run at all. The pool, or rather the two pools of the same name, are quite close to the spring. They are still used for washing linen as formerly. The water of the spring is brackish, and has a very disagreeable taste; people still bathe their eyes with it, in memory of the miracle performed on the man born blind.'

'The pool of Siloam,' says Mr. Buckingham, 'is now a dirty little brook, with scarcely any water in it; and even in the rainy season, it is said to be an insignificant muddy stream. The illusion created by Milton's sublime invocation to it, in the opening of the Paradise Lost, is entirely done away by the sight of the spot itself.' Buckingham's Travels in Palestine, vol. i. p. 291; Chateaubriand's Travels in Greece, Palestine, Egypt, and Barbary, vol. ii. pp. 34—36; Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary of the Holy Bible, No. cxl. p. 83.

The Tower of Siloam. (Luke xiii. 4.) It is said that the Tower of Siloam fell upon eighteen men, and buried them in its ruins. It is thought this Tower was near the fountain of Siloam.

SILVER. This metal does not appear to have been used before the Deluge; at least, Moses says nothing of it; he speaks only of brass and iron, (Gen. iv. 22.); but in Abraham's time it was become common, and traffic was carried on by it. (Gen. xiii. 2.) The Scripture observes, that this patriarch was rich in gold and silver; that he bought a sepulchre for his wife Sarah for four hundred shekels of silver. (Gen. xxiii. 15.) This silver (apparently) was not coined, but was in bars or ingots; in commerce it was always weighed.

SIMEON, שִׁמְעוֹן, signifies that hears, that obeys, or is heard. Simeon, son of Jacob and Leah, was born in the year of the world 2247. (Gen. xxix. 33.) He was brother to Dinah by the same mother; and after Shechem, the son of Hamor, had defiled Dinah, Simeon and Levi revenged the affront, entered Shechem, killed all the men they found, and brought away their sister, (Gen. xxxiv. 25.) in the year of the world 2265. It is thought Simeon was one who showed most inhumanity to his brother Joseph; and advised his brethren to kill him. (Gen. xxxvii. 20.) This conjecture is founded on Joseph's keeping him prisoner in Egypt, (Gen. xlii. 24.) and treating him with more rigour than the rest of his brethren. Jacob, on his death-bed, showed his indignation against Simeon and Levi:—'Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce, and their wrath for it was cruel: I will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel.' (Gen. xlix. 5.)

In effect, the tribes of Simeon and Levi were scattered and dispersed in Israel: Levi had no compact lot or portion; and Simeon received for his portion only a district dismembered from the tribe of Judah, (Josh. xix. 1, 2, &c.) and some other lands they over-run in the mountains of Seir, and in the desert of Gedor. (1 Chron. iv. 24. 39. 42.) The Targum of Jerusalem, and the Rabbins, followed by some ancient fathers, believe that the greater part of the Scribes and men learned in the law were of this tribe: and as these were dispersed throughout Israel, we see in this the accomplishment of Jacob's prophecy, which foretold that Simeon and Levi should be scattered among their brethren. Perhaps Jacob meant the dispersion of Simeon and Levi as an evil, a degradation; but Providence overruled it to be an honour: so Levi had the priesthood, and Simeon had the learning—or writing-authority, of Israel, whereby both these tribes were honourably dispersed throughout Israel. Judith (ix. 2.) seems to vindicate this notion of Simeon; but she approved only of his zeal, and not of the other circumstances of the action.

The Testament of the twelve patriarchs intimates, that Simeon died at the age of one hundred and twenty years; that he was a man of an intrepid, implacable, and severe temper.

The sons of Simeon were Jemuel, Jamin, Ohad, Jachin, Zohar, and Shaul. (Exod. vi. 15.) Their descendants amounted to 59,300 men, at the coming out of Egypt (Numb. i. 22.); but only 22,200 entered the Land of Promise, the rest dying in the desert, because of their murmurings and impiety. (Numb. xxvi. 14.) The portion of Simeon was west and south of that of Judah; having the tribe of Dan and the Philistines north, the Mediterranean west, and Arabia Petræa south. (Josh. xix. 1—9.)

SIMEON, an holy old man who was at Jerusalem, full of the Holy Ghost, and expecting the redemption of Israel. (Luke ii. 25, 26, &c.) The Holy Ghost had assured him, that he should not die before he had seen the Christ of the Lord; he therefore came into the temple, prompted by inspiration, just at the time when Joseph and Mary presented Jesus Christ there, in obedience to the law. Simeon took the child into his arms, gave thanks to God, &c. After this, Simeon blessed Joseph and Mary. It is believed, with good reason, that he died soon after he had given his testimony to Jesus Christ.

It has been pretended, that Simeon, who received Jesus Christ into his arms, was the same as Simeon the Just, the son of Hillel, and master of Gamaliel, whose disciple St. Paul was. It is also said, that as Simeon one day was explaining that passage of Isaiah, 'A virgin shall conceive, and bring forth a son,' &c. and not being able to penetrate this mystery, it was revealed to him, that he should not die before he had seen the accomplishment of it.

SÝMON, Σίμων, signifies that hears or obeys. SIMON MACCABÆUS, surnamed Thas-si, was son of Mattathias, and brother of Judas and Jonathan. He was chief, prince, and pontiff of the Jews, from the year of the world 3860 to 3869. He had for his successor John Hyrcanus his son. Mattathias, the father of the Maccabees, just before his death, said to his other sons, 'I know that your brother Simon is a man of counsel; give ear unto him always, he shall be a father unto you.' He gave proofs of his valour in the battle between Judas Maccabæus and Nicanor. (2 Macc. viii. 22, 23.) On another occasion (2 Macc. xiv. 17.), Simon was sent into Galilee, to succour the Jews there, who were threatened with destruction by the inhabitants of Tyre, Sidon, and Ptolemais. Simon obtained a great booty, brought into Judea the Israelites that were in Galilee, and returned triumphant. He again signalized his valour in the battle between his brother Jonathan and Apollonius, the governor of Cælo-Syria, whom they defeated, and killed above eight thousand of his men. Simon was made governor of the whole coast of the Mediterranean Sea, from Tyre to the frontiers of Egypt, by the young king Antiochus Theos. He also took Bethsura and Joppa, and built Adida, in the plain called Sephale. All these things he did while his brother Jonathan was chief and high priest of the Jews. (1 Macc. x. 82; xii. 33. 48, &c.)

But Jonathan being surprised by Tryphon, and a report being spread that he was put to death, Simon came to Jerusalem, and having assembled all the people, they chose him as their chief. Then Simon had the walls of Jerusalem repaired; and knowing that Tryphon was coming into Judea with a great army, he marched out, resolving to give him battle.

When Tryphon came to Bascama, he there slew Jonathan and his two sons, and then returned into Syria. Simon fetched away the bones of his brother, and buried them honourably, at Modin, in the sepulchre of his fathers; which he adorned with pillars, pyramids, and trophies of sculpture.

Tryphon, coming into Syria, there killed the young king Antiochus, and usurped his kingdom. Simon Maccabæus would not acknowledge him, but his competitor, Demetrius Nicator, as king of Syria; to whom he applied for confirming the ancient franchises of Judea, and for freedom from tribute. Demetrius granted Simon more than he asked; so that this year, which was the hundred and seventieth of the Greeks, he began to write on the tables and public registers, 'The first year under Simon, sovereign pontiff, chief, and prince of the Jews.' After this he took Gaza; and the Syrians that were in the citadel of Jerusalem capitulated to him. He appointed an annual festival in commemoration of the reduction of this fortress; which had been so long in the hands of foreigners.

All Israel beheld with pleasure the prudent administration of this great man. His whole study was to advance the happiness of his nation, and to render it prosperous and secure. He took Joppa, and made a harbour of it, to improve the trade of the Jews, and every way extended the limits of his country.

He renewed the alliance of the Jews with the Romans and with the Lacedæmonians. The whole Jewish nation concurred in registering a public act, by which they acknowledged their obligations to Simon and his family, and recognised him and his children as perpetual prince and pontiff of their nation, till a faithful prophet should arise from among them. They ordered that he should be obeyed in all things, that all public acts should pass in his name, that he should be clothed in purple, and adorned with gold. This declaration was written upon a table of brass, and placed in the galleries of the temple.

Antiochus Sidetes, king of Syria, son of Demetrius Soter, and brother to Demetrius Nicator, being informed that Demetrius Nicator was taken by the Parthians, wrote to Simon from the Isle of Rhodes, to engage him on his side against Tryphon. He confirmed to him whatever had been granted by Demetrius Nicator, allowed him the privilege of coining money, remitted to him all debts owing to the kings of Syria, and declared Jerusalem to be a free and an holy city. Simon sent him men and money to assist him in the reduction of Dora; in which Tryphon had shut himself up. But Antiochus would not receive them, nor would he confirm the articles of his treaty with Simon. He even sent Athenobius to him, to demand the surrender of several places, or a thousand talents of silver; threatening, in case of refusal, to enter Judea with troops, and to treat him as an enemy. Simon, not discouraged by his threats, answered that he had usurped nothing from him, but had only taken possession of the inheritance of his fathers. He offered an hundred talents for the city of Joppa and Gazara, of which he had made himself master, because they occasioned great calamities to his country.

Antiochus sent Cendebeus with an army on the coasts of the Mediterranean; but Cendebeus was defeated by John Hyrcanus, son of Simon. Three years afterwards, Simon visited the cities of Judea, and came to the castle of Docus, or Dagon; where his son-in-law Ptolemy, son of Ambubus, resided. Ptolemy made him a great entertainment; but in the midst of it caused him to be massacred, with his two sons, Mattathias and Judas, hoping by this to make himself master of Jerusalem and the whole country. But John Hyrcanus was beforehand with him, and came first to Jerusalem.

SIMON, the Cyrenean. When Jesus Christ was going to Calvary, and unable to bear the weight of his cross, the soldiers met a man, a native of Cyrene in Libya, named Simon, who was father of Alexander and Rufus, whom they compelled to carry the cross after Jesus; that is, to carry it whole and entire according to some; according to others, to carry one end of it with Jesus; according to others, to carry the cross beam. (Matt. xxvii. 32. Mark xv. 21.) It is asked, whether Simon was a Jew or a Pagan? Several fathers thought him a Gentile, and considered him as a type of that idolatrous people, which afterwards should be called to the profession of the Gospel, and to carry the cross after Christ.

SIMON, the Canaanite, or Simon Zelotes, an apostle of Jesus Christ. It is doubtful whether the name of Canaanite was derived to him from the city Cana in Galilee; or whether it might not be written Chananean, or Canaanite; or, lastly, whether it should not be taken according to its signification in the Hebrew, by deriving it from the root Kana, to be zealous. St. Luke (vi. 15. Acts i. 13.) gives him the surname of Zelotes, the zealous or zealot, which, says, Calmet, seems to be the translation of the surname Canaanite, given by the other evangelists. (Matt. x. 4. Mark iii. 18.) Some fathers say, he was of Cana, of the tribe of Zebulun or Naphtali. The learned are still divided about the signification of the term Zelotes, what it may denote. Some take it only for the zeal he showed in embracing the Gospel of Jesus Christ; others think he was of a certain sect called Zealots, of which mention is made in Josephus.

SIMON, brother of our Lord, (Matt. xiii. 55. Mark vi. 3.) that is to say, his cousin-german, and son of Mary, the sister of the Holy Virgin. Calmet believes him to be the same as Simeon, bishop of Jerusalem, and son of Cleophas.

SIMON, the Pharisee, with whom Jesus dined after he had raised the child of the widow of Nain. (Luke vii. 36, 37, &c.) While he was at table with Simon, a woman noted for her ill life, entered the room, poured out a box of perfume on the feet of Jesus, wiped them with her hair, washed them with her tears, &c. Simon seeing this, was astonished at it, but was reproved by Jesus, who forgave the sinner, but condemned the unforgiving Pharisee by a similitude.

SIMON the Leper, dwelt at Bethany, near Jerusalem. (Matt. xxvi. 6. Mark xiv. 3. John xi. 1, 2; xii. 3, 4, 5.) Jesus coming thither a few days before his passion, was invited by Simon the Leper to eat with him. Lazarus, whom our Saviour had raised from the dead some time before, was at table with them. Martha, his sister, was very busy in attending on them; and Mary, his other sister, to show her love and respect for our Saviour, brought a box of perfumes, which she poured on his feet. This entertainment is very different from that at which our Saviour had been about two years before, in the house of Simon the Pharisee; as Mary the sister of Lazarus was a different person from the sinner-woman of Nain.

SIMON Magus, or the Sorcerer, was, as is said, of the village of Gitton, in the country of Samaria. Philip the deacon coming to preach at Samaria, (Acts viii. 5—13.) converted several persons, and this Simon, also believed, and was baptized. The apostles Peter and John visiting Samaria, communicated the Holy Ghost to those baptized by Philip; on which Simon, full of admiration, offered money to the apostles, saying, 'Give me also this power.' But Peter said to him with great indignation, 'Thy money perish with thee: thou art in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity.' Simon made answer, 'Pray ye to the Lord for me.'

St. Luke adds, (Acts viii. 9, 10, 11.) that Simon had addicted himself to magic before Philip came to Samaria, and, by his impostures and enchantments, had seduced the people of this city, who said, 'This man is the great power of God.'

But after St. Peter had rejected, with horror, his proposal of selling the power of imparting the Holy Ghost, Simon fell into much greater errors and abominations; applying himself to magic more than ever, taking pride in withstanding the apostles, and infecting a great number of persons with his impious errors. For this purpose it is said he left Samaria, and travelled through several provinces; seeking places where the Gospel had not yet reached, that he might prejudice the minds of men against it.

At Tyre, in Phenicia, says Theodoret, he bought a public prostitute, called Selene or Helene, and carried her with him, committing crimes in secret with her. Having run through several provinces, and made himself admired by vast numbers of persons for his false miracles and impostures, he came to Rome in the time of the emperor Claudius, about A.D. 41. It is said he was honoured as a deity by the Romans, and by the senate itself, who decreed a statue to him, in the isle of Tyber, with this inscription,—'To Simon the holy God.' Several other apocryphal stories are related concerning Simon Magus, which it is thought unnecessary to repeat.

As to the heresies of Simon, besides those imputed to him, (Acts viii. 10.) the fathers accuse him of pretending to be the great power of God, and that he came down as the Father in respect of the Samaritans, as the Son in respect of the Jews, and as the Holy Ghost in respect of the Gentiles: but that it is indifferent which of these names he went by. St. Jerome quotes these blasphemous expressions out of one of his books: 'I am the word of God, I am the beauty of God, I am the Comforter, I am the Almighty, I am the whole essence of God.' He was the inventor of the Eons, which were as so many persons, of whom they composed their deity. His Helen he called the first intelligence, the mother of all things; he sometimes called her the Holy Ghost, Prunice, or Minerva. He said, that by this first intelligence he had originally a design of creating the angels; but that she, knowing this will of her father, had descended lower, and had produced the angels, and the 'other spiritual powers, to whom she had given no knowledge of her father; that these angels and powers had afterwards made angels and men: that Helen had passed successively into the bodies of women, and among others, into that of Helen, the wife of Menelaus, who occasioned the war of Troy; and that she had at last descended into the body of this Helen of Tyre.

He did not acknowledge Jesus Christ as Son of God, but considered him as a rival, and pretended himself to be the Christ. He believed not the resurrection of the body, but barely a resurrection of the soul. He taught that men need not trouble themselves about good works, for all actions were indifferent, and that the distinction of actions into good and evil, was only introduced by the angels, to render men subject to them. He rejected the law of Moses, and said he was come to abolish it. He ascribed the Old Testament to the angels; and though he every where declared himself an enemy to angels, yet he paid them an idolatrous worship, pretending men could not be saved without offering to the supreme Father abominable sacrifices, by means of the principalities that he placed in each heaven. He offered them his sacrifices, not to obtain assistance from them, but to prevail with them that they might not oppose men. Simon formed a sect of heretics, which were called Simonians.

SIN, סִין, signifies bush. Sin, or Zin, was a city, and desert south of the Holy Land, in Arabia Petrea: it gave name to the wilderness of Sin. The Scripture distinguishes two cities, and two deserts of Sin, one is writ סִין, sin, with samech: the other זִין, tzin, with trade.

The first was near Egypt and the Red Sea. The Hebrews were no sooner out of this sea, than they were in the wilderness of Sin, which is between Elim and Sinai. (Exod. xvi. 1.; xvii. 1.) Here God rained manna on them.

The second is also south of Palestine, but toward the Dead Sea. Kadesh was in the desert of Zin, (Deut. xxxii. 51.); from this wilderness they sent out the spies. Here Moses and Aaron offended the Lord, at the waters of strife. (Numb. xiii. 21.) The land of Canaan and the tribe of Judah had the desert of Zin, or Zina, for their southern limit. (Numb. xxvii. 14.; xxxiv. 3. Josh. xv. 3.)

SIN is any thought, word, action, omission, or desire, contrary to the law of God. God was not the author of sin, or of death; but sin and death entered into the world by the malice of the devil. (James i. 13.) Adam by his disobedience rendered us all guilty in the eyes of God; his sin merited death for us; he is the cause that we are all born children of iniquity, and that we are inclined to evil from the womb. Jesus Christ, by his death, hath restored life to us; his obedience has reconciled us to God; he has merited for us the character of children of God.

SIN against the Holy Ghost, is differently explained by different interpreters. 'The sin or blasphemy against the Holy Ghost,' says Bishop Tomline, 'is mentioned in the first three Gospels. It appears, that all the three evangelists agree in representing the sin of blasphemy against the Holy Ghost as a crime which would not be forgiven; but no one of them affirms that those, who had ascribed Christ's power of casting out devils to Beelzebub, had been guilty of that sin, and in St. Luke it is not mentioned that any such charge had been made. Our Saviour, according to the account in St. Matthew and St. Mark, endeavoured to convince the Jews of their error; but so far from accusing them of having committed an unpardonable sin in what they had said concerning him, he declares that, 'Whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him,' that is, whatever reproaches men may utter against the Son of man during his ministry, however they may calumniate the authority upon which he acts, it is still possible that hereafter they may repent and believe, and all their sins may be forgiven them; but the reviling of the Holy Ghost is described as an offence of a far more heinous nature: 'The blasphemy against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven unto men.'—'He that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost, hath never forgiveness.'—'Unto him that blasphemeth against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven.' It is plain that this sin against the Holy Ghost could not be committed while our Saviour was upon earth, since he always speaks of the Holy Ghost as not being to come till after his ascension into heaven. A few days after that great event, the descent of the Holy Ghost enabled the Apostles to work miracles, and communicated to them a variety of other supernatural gifts. If men should ascribe these powers to Beelzebub, or in any respect reject their authority, they would blaspheme the Holy Ghost, from whom they were derived; and that sin would be unpardonable, because this was the completion of the evidence of the divine authority of Christ and his religion; and they who rejected these last means of conviction, could have no other opportunity of being brought to faith in Christ, the only appointed condition of pardon and forgiveness. The greater heinousness of the sin of these men would consist in their rejecting a greater body of testimony; for they are supposed to be acquainted with the resurrection of our Saviour from the dead, with his ascension into heaven, with the miraculous descent of the Holy Ghost, and with the supernatural powers which it communicated; circumstances, all of which were enforced by the apostles when they preached the Gospel; but none of which could be known to those who refused to acknowledge Jesus as the Messiah, during his actual ministry. Though this was a great sin, it was not an unpardonable one, it might be atoned for by subsequent belief, by yielding to subsequent testimony. But, on the other hand, they who finally rejected the accumulated and complete evidence of Jesus being the Messiah, as exhibited by the inspired apostles, precluded themselves from the possibility of conviction, because no farther testimony would be afforded them, and consequently, there being no means of repentance, they would be incapable of forgiveness and redemption. Hence it appears, that the sin against the Holy Ghost consisted in finally rejecting the Gospel, as preached by the apostles, who confirmed the truth of the doctrine which they taught 'by signs and wonders, and divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost.' (Heb. ii. 4.) It was unpardonable, because this was the consummation of the proofs afforded to men of that generation of the divine mission of Christ. This sin was manifestly distinct from all other sins; it indicated an invincible obstinacy of mind, an impious and unalterable determination to refuse the offered mercy of God.'

Dr. Doddridge thus paraphrases the passages on this subject in the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Mark: 'I therefore give you the most solemn and compassionate warning of your danger, for you are on the brink of a most dreadful precipice. That malignity of heart which leads you to ascribe these works of mine to a confederacy with Satan, may incline you to pass the same impious sentence on the greatest and fullest confirmation which is to be given to my Gospel by the effusion of the Spirit on my followers; and therefore, to prevent, if possible, such guilt and ruin, verily, I say unto you, that all other sins shall be forgiven to the children of men, and even all the other blasphemies with which they shall blaspheme; but the blasphemy against the Spirit of God, in this most glorious dispensation of it, shall not be forgiven to those impious and incorrigible men, who shall dare to impute to diabolical operation those glorious works of divine power and goodness. And I add, that whosoever speaks a contemptuous and impious word even against the Son of man himself, while here on earth, in this obscure form, he may possibly be brought to repentance for it; and so it shall be forgiven him, and, consequently, even your case, bad as it is, is not entirely hopeless; but whosoever shall maliciously speak any thing of this nature against the Holy Spirit, when the grand dispensation of it shall open in those miraculous gifts and operations that will be attended with the most evident demonstrations of his mighty power, it shall never be forgiven him at all, either in this world or in that which is to come; but he is obnoxious to eternal damnation, and must irrecoverably sink into it; nor will all the grace of the Gospel, in its fullest display, afford a remedy for so aggravated a crime, or furnish him with means for his conviction and recovery.' Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. ii. pp. 287—291; Dr. Doddridge's Family Expositor, vol. i. pp. 324, 325, edit. 1810.

Original SIN was the rebellion of the first man Adam against his Creator, which was a sin of universal efficacy, and which derives a guilt and stain to mankind in all the ages of the world. The account the Scripture gives of it is grounded on the relation which all men have to Adam, as their natural and moral principal or head. It is said that all men are born children of wrath, (Ephes. ii. 3.); that by the fault of one alone, sin came into the world, and death by sin. (Rom. v. 12.) 'By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men.' And this is what we call original sin, so well described by Job, who says (xiv. 1—4.) 'Man that is born of a woman, &c. Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? Not one.' And David says, 'Behold I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me.' (Psalm li. 5.)

'We are (says the apostle) by nature children of wrath.' (Ephes. ii. 3.) Not only by depravation or custom, and ill-contracted habits, but by nature, the first principle and source of action. And nature, we know, is as entire, though not as strong, in an infant as in a grown man. Indeed, the strength of man's natural corruption is so great, that every man is born an adult sinner. Sin is the only thing in the world which never had an infancy. Tantillus puer, tantus peccator, says Austin. Could we view things in semine, and look through principles, what a nest of impurities might we see in the heart of the least infant! Like a knot of little snakes wrapped up in a dunghill. What a radical productive force of sin might we behold in all his faculties, ready, upon occasion and the maturity of age, to display itself with a cursed fertility! When a man is grown up, his corruption does not begin to exist, but to appear, and to spend upon that stock which it had long before. Pelagius, indeed, tells us that the sons of Adam came to be sinners only by imitation. But then I would know of him what those first inclinations are which dispose us to such bad imitations? Certainly that cannot but be sinful, which so powerfully and almost forcibly inclines us to sin. We may conclude, therefore, that even this original, native corruption renders the persons who have it obnoxious and liable to death. An evil heart will condemn us, though Providence should prevent its running forth into an evil life. Sin is sin, whether it rests in the inclinations, or shoots out into the practice: and a toad is full of poison, though he never spits it.'

It seems impossible to deny the doctrine of original sin, without at the same time impugning the wisdom of God, as manifested in the scheme of redemption. In this scheme there is an amazing apparatus, for which, upon the hypothesis of those who deny the doctrine of human depravity, there can be no necessity; for there certainly can be no necessity that Christ should die 'for all,' if all have not sinned. According to this scheme, every human creature must be born of 'God,' be created 'anew,' 'be quickened,' 'be reconciled to God by Jesus Christ,' 'be washed from his sins in his blood.' Here, therefore, are requirements and provisions where none are needed, if the doctrine of human depravity be unfounded. God, who alone can see and provide for future contingencies, has fancied there would be a universal apostacy, when there has been no such thing,—foretold by his prophets, that he would provide a way for the restoration of his people, when no restoration was required;—appointed a Saviour to die for the sins of the whole world, and whose blood was to wash away the sins of many, who had no sins to be thus cancelled. This, even this, is called 'rational religion;' a religion that evidences the wisdom and goodness of God, conformably to the most liberal, and pure, and philosophical principles! See FALL OF MAN. Dr. Olinthus Gregory's Letters on the Evidences, Doctrines, and Duties of the Christian Religion, vol. ii. pp. 40, 41; South's Sermons.

SINAI סיני signifies bush; according to the Syriac, enmity. Sinai, or Sina, a famous mountain of Arabia Petræa, on which God gave the law to Moses. (Exod. xix. 1.; xxiv. 16.; xxxi. 18.; xxxiv. 2, 4. &c. Levit. xxv. 1.; xxvi. 46.) It stands in a kind of peninsula, formed by the two arms of the Red Sea, one extended north, called the Gulf of Kolsum; the other extending east, called the Gulf of Elan. The Arabs call Mount Sinai by the name of Tor, that is, the mountain, by way of excellence; or Gibel Monsa, the Mountain of Moses: it is 260 miles from Cairo, which is a journey of ten days. The wilderness of Sinai, where the Israelites continued encamped almost a year, and where Moses erected the tabernacle of the covenant, is considerably elevated above the rest of the country; the ascent to it is very craggy, the greater part cut out of the rock; then one comes to a large space of ground, which is a plain surrounded on all sides by rocks and eminences, whose length is nearly twelve miles.

Toward the extremity of this plain, on the north, two high mountains appear; the highest is called Sinai, the other Horeb. They are of very steep ascent, and do not stand on much ground, in comparison with their extraordinary height. Sinai is at least one third part higher than the other, and its ascent more upright, and difficult. The top of the mountain terminates in an uneven and rugged space, which might contain about sixty persons. On this eminence is built a little chapel, called St. Catherine's, where it is thought the body of this saint rested for 360 years; but afterwards it was removed into a church at the foot of the mountain. Near this chapel issues a fountain of very good fresh water; it is looked on as miraculous, it not being conceivable how water can flow from the brow of so high and so barren a mountain.

Mount Horeb stands west of Sinai; so that at sun-rising the shadow of Sinai covers Horeb. Besides the little fountain at the top of Sinai, there is another at the foot of Horeb, which supplies the monastery of St. Catherine. Five or six paces from thence they show a stone whose height is four or five feet, and breadth about three, which, they say, is the very stone from whence Moses caused the water to gush out; its colour is of spotted grey, and it is, as it were, set in a kind of earth, where no other rock appears. This stone has twelve holes or channels, which are about a foot wide, from whence they say the water issued which the Israelites drank.

'Sinai,' says Sandys, 'has three tops of a marvellous height; that on the west side, where God appeared to Moses in a bush, fruitful in pasturage; far lower than the middlemost, and shadowed when the sun riseth thereon; which is that wheron God gave the law to Moses, and which is now called the Mount of Moses, at the foot of which stands the monastery called St. Catherine's, from which there were steps formerly up to the very top of the mountain, and were computed 14,000 in number. At present some of them are broken, but those that remain are well made, and easy to go up and down. There are in several places of the ascent, good cisterns, and especially near the top a fair and good one. The third or most easterly summit is called by the religious in those parts, Mount Catherine; on the top of which there is a dome, under which they say was interred the body of this saint, brought hither by angels after she was beheaded at Alexandria.' 'One may judge of the height of St. Catherine's Mount, which certainly is not so high as that of Moses by a third part, from this circumstance, that Thevenot found much snow on both when he was there, which was in February. The Monastery of St. Catherine's is from Cairo some eight days' journey over the deserts.' Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. i. p. 408.

SINCERITY, freedom from hypocrisy or dissimulation. As this grace or virtue respects God, it imports the sincerity of our piety towards him; that we heartily believe, fear, and honour him; that the outward expressions of our piety and obedience proceed from our inward apprehensions of, and affections towards him; that we sincerely love God and his truth, and readily embrace it. Our piety is sincere, when it proceeds from rational religious motives; that is, when the principal and prevailing motives of our piety are a sense of God's authority over us, and of our duty and obligation to him; a fear of his displeasure and threatenings; and the hope of that glorious reward which he hath promised to obedience. A man may be assured his heart is not right towards God, when his piety and zeal for true religion doth either cease, cool, or abate; for if we drop the profession of our religion, or neglect the practice of it; this is a plain demonstration of the insincerity of our former piety. A sincere piety must be rooted in the heart, and be a living principle within us; and without this, all acts of piety and devotion are hypocrisy; a picture of religion and form of godliness, without its life and power. Another evidence of sincere piety is, when men are religious in private as well as in public. He is truly devout, who is so in his family and closet, where he hath no other witness than God, and his own soul, as well as in the church. He is a real honest man, who as readily performs his word and promise when no proof can be made, no law compel him to it, as if there had been any number of witnesses. He is sincerely just, who will not wrong any man, though he could do it with the greatest secrecy and safety; nor impose upon others' ignorance and unskilfulness, though ever so much to his own benefit and advantage. He is truly charitable, who chooses to give alms in secret, rather than in the sight of men. A sincere piety consists in the constant practice of goodness, in the general course of our lives. The habits of any known sin, the wilful deliberate neglect of our duties, and even the single act of more heinous crimes, will bring our sincerity in question, and cannot be screened under the name of infirmity. Another evidence of a sincere piety is, that our obedience to God be uniform and universal, equally respecting all the laws of God, and every part of our duty. We must not regard some precepts of the law, and allow ourselves in the breach or neglect of the rest; observe the duties of one table of the law, and omit the other; nor obey all the commandments of God, one only excepted. For, he that keeps the whole law, saving that he offends in one point, is guilty of all; that is, his obedience is not sincere to the rest.

Sincerity with regard to men, signifies a simplicity of mind and manners in our behaviour and conversation; discovering itself in a constant, plain, honest, and open carriage, free from craft and cunning, and all deceitful appearances in word or deed; in a word, to speak as we think, to perform what we promise, to be in reality what we would be thought to be. We may be prudently silent, but we must not make a false show, and appear to be what we are not, either by word or action. Contrary to this virtue, is, I fear, much of that complaisant conversation among us, that pretended kindness and esteem for persons which we have not, or to that degree our expressions import. This we call flattery, which is an odious sort of insincerity, because it abuses men into a vain opinion of themselves, and of the kindness of others towards them. Indeed all hypocrisy and insincerity are mean in themselves; and are often used to the prejudice of others, in their rights and interests. As dissimulation is contrary to sincerity, because it consists in a deceitful representation of our virtues, qualities, and character; so falsehood, fraud, and perfidiousness, which men too often practise one towards another, is yet of a more injurious and mischievous consequence. The former betrays great vanity, the latter gross iniquity.

With the sincerity of our piety towards God, let us join simplicity and integrity in our conversation with men. Let us use truth and plainness in all our words and actions; that our tongue may be ever the true interpreter of our minds, our expressions the lively image of our thoughts and affections, and our actions exactly agreeable to our inward purposes and intentions. The general want of sincerity in our conversation, is one of the great corruptions and degeneracy of our age. The world is so full of dissimulation and compliment, that men's words are scarcely any signification of their thoughts. Hypocrisy and insincerity are vain and foolish, and though designed to cheat others, are in truth deceiving ourselves. No man would flatter or dissemble, if he thought that he was seen and discovered. But all his hypocrisy is open to the eye of God, from whom nothing can be hid. The ways of man are before the eyes of the Lord, and he seeth all his goings; there is no darkness, nor shadow of death, where the workers of iniquity may hide themselves. Truth and sincerity have every advantage over insincerity: and whoever dissembles, and seems to be what he is not, thinks it right to have such a quality as he pretends to; for to counterfeit and dissemble, is to put on the appearance of some real excellence. But the best way is, for a man to be in reality what he would seem to be. For it is difficult to personate, and act a false part long; because where truth does not exist, nature will endeavour to return, and make a discovery. Truth carries its own light and evidence along with it; and not only commends us to every man's conscience, but to God, the searcher of our hearts. Hence sincerity is the truest wisdom. For integrity hath many advantages over all the artful ways of dissimulation and deceit. It is a more plain and easy, more safe and secure mode of dealing. It hath less of trouble and difficulty, of danger and hazard; it is the shortest and nearest way to our end, and will carry us thither in a straight line.

A dissembler must be always upon his guard, lest he contradict his own pretences; for he acts an unnatural part, and puts a continual force and restraint upon himself. Truth always lies uppermost; and he that acts sincerely, hath an easy task, because he follows nature, and so needs not to invent pretences before, or excuses afterwards, for any thing he says or does. Sincerity is firm and substantial, plain and open, and fears no discovery, of which the crafty man is always in danger. Sincerity is the most compendious wisdom, and an excellent instrument for the dispatch of business. It creates confidence in those we deal with, saves many inquiries, and brings things to a short issue. The inconvenience attending falsehood and dissimulation is perpetual, because it brings a man under a constant jealousy and suspicion; so as not to be believed when he speaks truth, nor trusted when perhaps he means honestly. Warner's System of Divinity and Morality, pp. 315—325.

SINEW. The Hebrews do not eat the sinew of the thigh of animals in memory of the sinew of Jacob's thigh, which the angel touched, and which contracted such a numbness, that, according to some interpreters, he went lame of it all his life after. This abstinence from the sinew of the thigh of animals, is not commanded to Israel by the law, for they must have abstained from it even before the law, according to the observation in Genesis, (xxxii. 32.) Some interpreters think this forbearance is only voluntary devotion. In some places they abstain wholly from the hind-quarter of animals; in other places they content themselves with taking away the sinew. See JACOB.

SIN'ITE, סיני, or Sinaus, signifies bush, enmity. By the name Sinite (Gen. x. 17.) is denoted the eighth son of Canaan. The Sinites dwelt near Arce, in Mount Libanus. Strabo mentions the fortress of Sinnai in the mountains. By Sinai, the Arabic means the inhabitants of Tripoli, in Phenicia.

S'I'ON, שִׁיאוֹן, שְׁהוֹן, signifies noise, tumult. Sion (Deut. iv. 48.) is one of the names of Mount Hermon, or rather of a mountain, or of a chain of mountains; the whole being called mountains of Hermon, from Mount Hermon, the principal. Probably of this mountain the Psalmist speaks, (cxxxiii. 3.) 'As the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion,' which is thought to be put for Sion. The union and the good understanding of brethren, is as agreeable as the dew which falls on Hermon and Sion, two contiguous mountains.

'Mount Sion,' says a late traveller, 'of a yellowish colour, and barren appearance, is open in form of a crescent towards Jerusalem. This sacred summit is distinguished by three monuments, or more properly by three ruins: the house of Caiaphas, the place where Christ celebrated his Last Supper, and the tomb or palace of David. From the top of the hill, you see, to the south, the valley of Ben-Hinnon; beyond this the Field of Blood, purchased with the thirty pieces of silver given to Judas; the Hill of Evil Council, the tombs of the Judges, and the whole desert towards Hebron and Bethlehem. To the north, the wall of Jerusalem, which passes over the top of Sion, intercepts the view of the city, the site of which gradually slopes from this place towards the valley of Jehoshaphat. The residence of Caiaphas is now a church, the duty of which is performed by the Armenians. David's tomb is a small vaulted room containing three sepulchres of dark-coloured stone; and on the spot where Christ held his Last Supper, stand a mosque and a Turkish hospital, formerly a church and monastery occupied by the fathers of the Holy Land.' Chateaubriand's Travels in Greece, Palestine, Egypt, and Barbary, vol. ii. p. 31.

SIS'ERA סִיסְרָא, signifies that sees a horse, a swallow. Sisera, or Sisara, was general of the army of Jabin, king of Hazor; (Judg. iv. 2.) in the year of the world 2719 he was sent by his master against Barak and Deborah, who had an army of ten thousand men on Mount Tabor. Sisera marched against them with nine hundred chariots armed with scythes, and a great number of infantry. Barak with his small army attacked Sisera with such impetuosity, that he entirely routed him. Sisera himself fled; quitted his chariot, and ran on foot towards Harosheth of the Gentiles. Approaching the tent of Heber the Kenite, Jael, the wife of Heber, desired him to enter and hide himself. She covered him with a mantle, and gave him milk to drink. Sisera said to her, 'Stay at the door of the tent, and if any ask you who is here, answer, Nobody.' Jael afterwards returning, and finding him fast asleep, she drove a tent nail through his temples with a hammer, and fastened him to the ground. When Barak arrived, she showed him Sisera weltering in his blood, dead.

SISTER, Soror, in the style of the Hebrews, has equal latitude as a brother. It is used not only for a sister by natural relation from the same father and mother, but also for a sister only by the same father, or by the same mother; or a near relation only. Sarah is called sister to Abraham, (Gen. xii. 13.; xx. 12.), though only his niece, according to some, or sister by the father's side, according to others. In the law (Lev. xviii. 18.) it is forbidden to take to wife the sister of a wife; to marry two sisters; or, according to some interpreters, to marry a second wife, having one already. Literally, Thou shalt not take a wife over her sister to afflict her, as if meaning to forbid polygamy. In the Gospel, the brothers and sisters of Jesus Christ are his cousins; children of the sisters of the Holy Virgin. (Matt. xiii. 56. Mark vi. 3.)

In the Song of Songs (Cant. iv. 9, 10. 12.; v. 1, 2.) the name of sister is a name of tenderness between the spouses. Sometimes the word sister shows a resemblance of conditions and inclinations. The prophets (Jer. iii. 8. 10.; Ezek. xvi. 46.) call Jerusalem the sister of Sodom and Samaria, because it delighted in the imitation of their idolatry and iniquity.

Jesus Christ says, that those who keep his commandments, are his brothers and his sisters. (Matt. xii. 50.) Job exclaims, 'I have said to corruption, Thou art my father; to the worm, Thou art my mother and my sister.' The wise man advises his pupil to say to wisdom, (Prov. vii. 4.) 'Thou art my sister,' that is, to love her, and become familiar with her. St. Paul asks, whether it were not as lawful for him, as for the other apostles, to carry with him in his journeys some pious Christian sister. (1 Cor. ix. 5.) As Christians saluted each other by the name of brother, so they call Christian women sisters. St. James says, (ii. 15, 16.) 'If a brother or a sister be naked, and destitute of daily food,' &c.

SLANDER may be defined the fabrication or the utterance of false and malicious reports against others. Of slander, as thus explained, there are some species which rise to such a pitch of iniquity, as to endanger not only the security, but the very existence of all that is most dear to us; our reputation, our property, and our lives. Indeed, who is there that can detail with sufficient accuracy, or express with sufficient energy, the mass of evil to which judicial falsehoods may expose us? But there are species of slander which, in many cases, are as detrimental to the peace, the character, or the fortune of others, as any judicial lie could be; which are practised with more frequency, because they may in general be circulated with more secrecy, with less danger of detection, and less dread of punishment. Nothing is so precious as character: and yet what character is so fair which the backbiter may not revile, which the foul breath of the slanderer may not taint? How easy is it to impute to men vices which they have not, or to deny the virtues which they have? We may call a sober man a drunkard, an honest man a knave, a religious man a hypocrite; and the slander, originating at first in secret whispers, or uncharitable suggestions, may be propagated from mouth to mouth, till it become impossible to trace it to its source, to stop its diffusion, to allay its virulence, or to hinder its effects. Slander is well described as the pestilence that walketh in darkness, against whose contagious influence no vigilance can guard, and whose destructive consequences no caution can avert.

Those who are subject to the corrosive influence of envy and malevolence, are ever ready to put a wrong construction on the actions of others, to impute them to false motives, or to draw from them inferences unfavourable to the moral character of the individual. Such misrepresentations are among the most common effects of slander, and are the most certain indications of malevolence. Thus frugality is imputed to avarice, gravity to moroseness; the cheerful are termed dissipated, the considerate crafty, the charitable ostentatious, the devout hypocritical. As we cannot read the hearts of others, as we see not their thoughts, and feel not their sensations, it is both presumptuous and uncharitable in us to judge their motives, or to measure the good or the evil of their minds and affections, by any other criterion than their outward conduct. Nor are we rashly to determine the bent of a man's character and disposition from any single action, but from a series of actions; for it is not any one insulated act, but an habitual course of action, which clearly and indisputably shows the character of the individual. Hence we cannot determine a man's real character, nor the leading tendencies of his conduct, from a casual glance or a momentary observation. Yet it is from a superficial knowledge, and an imperfect acquaintance, that we form our opinions and make up our judgments on the characters of our fellow-creatures. But surely, as the character of a man is the aggregated influence of his habits, no man's character can be ascertained from a few single and isolated acts; for every habit is the result, not of a few scattered and disjointed, but of many successive and concatenated acts. We are not to call a man a drunkard, who has, once or twice, been known to violate the precepts of sobriety; nor can we rightly denominate a man covetous or cruel, who, in one or two instances, has manifested a niggardly spirit, a love of money, or a want of humanity, who, in his general conduct, and in his ordinary behaviour, which is the clearest indication of character, is found generous and humane. The best men are subject to occasional offences; and, as there is hardly any rule so general that it admits of no exceptions; so there, perhaps, never was any habit in any individual so firmly cemented, and so uniformly obeyed, that no deviations from it were ever observed. Hence we may see into what fatal mistakes, what unjust and uncharitable judgments, we may be led by a cursory or casual insight into the actions of others, and how wary we ought to be to pronounce on the motives of men, or on the general bent of their thoughts and dispositions, their minds and hearts, except on that evidence which is derived from an intimate acquaintance with, or a diligent inquiry into, the habits of their lives. Let us remember, that as, in passing judgment on the conduct of others, it is never safe to determine without a sufficiency of information, so it is always sinful, whether our information be great or little, to err from want of charity. Yet it will be found to be want of charity, rather than want of knowledge, and perverseness rather than ignorance, which gives rise to all the slanderous aspersions, malicious stories, and evil reports, which are current in the world.

'The tongue of the slanderer,' says the eloquent Massillon, 'is a devouring fire, which blackens whatever it touches; which directs its fury on the good grain, equally as on the chaff; on the profane as on the sacred; which, wherever it rages, produces nothing but devastation and ruin; digs even into the bowels of the earth, and fixes itself on things the most hidden; turns into vile ashes what, only a moment before, appeared to us so precious and brilliant; acts with more violence and danger than ever, in the time when it was apparently stifled; which blackens what it cannot consume; and sometimes sparkles and delights before it destroys. I would have told you, that evil speaking is an assemblage of iniquity; a secret pride, which discovers to us the mote in our brother's eye, but hides the beam which is in our own; a mean envy, which, hurt at the talents or prosperity of others, makes them the subject of its censures, and studies to dim the splendour of whatever outshines itself; a disguised hatred, which sheds in its speeches the hidden venom of the heart; an unworthy duplicity, which praises to the face, and tears in pieces behind the back; a shameful levity, which has no command over itself, or its words, and often sacrifices both fortune and comfort to the imprudence of an amusing conversation; a deliberate barbarity, which goes to pierce your absent brother; a scandal, where you become a subject of shame and sin to those who listen to you; an injustice, where you ravish from your brother what is dearest to him. Slander is a restless evil, which disturbs society; spreads dissension through cities and countries; disunites the strictest friendships; is the source of hatred and revenge; fills, wherever it enters, with disturbances and confusion; and, every where, is an enemy to peace, comfort, and Christian good-breeding. Lastly, it is an evil full of deadly poison; whatever flows from it is infected, and poisons whatever it approaches; even its praises are empoisoned; its applauds malicious; its silence criminal; its gestures, motions, and looks, have all their venom, and spread it, each in their way. It is, above all, by the innocence of the intention that slanderers pretend to justify themselves; that you continually say, that your design is not to tarnish the reputation of your brother, but innocently to divert yourselves with faults which do not dishonour him in the eyes of the world. But what is that cruel pleasure, which carries sorrow and bitterness to the heart of your brother? Where is the innocence of an amusement, whose source springs from vices which ought to inspire you with compassion and grief? If Jesus Christ forbid us in the Gospel to invigorate the languors of conversation by idle words, shall it be more permitted to you to enliven it by derisions and censures? If the law curses him who uncovers the nakedness of his relations, shall you, who add raillery and insult to the discovery, be more protected from that malediction? If whoever call his brother fool, be worthy, according to Jesus Christ, of eternal fire, shall he who renders him the contempt and laughing-stock of a profane assembly escape the same punishment? If you love your brother as yourself, can you delight in what afflicts him? Ah! the church formerly held in horror the exhibitions of gladiators, and denied that believers, brought up in the tenderness and benignity of Jesus Christ, could innocently feast their eyes with the blood and death of these unfortunate slaves, or form an harmless recreation of so inhuman a pleasure. But you renew more detestable shows, to enliven your languor. You bring upon the stage, not infamous wretches, devoted to death, but members of Jesus Christ, your brethren, and there you entertain the spectators with wounds which you inflict on persons devoted to God.

On this subject Dr. Barrow observes as follows: 'If we do mark what is done in many (might I not say in most?) companies, what is it but one telling malicious stories of, or fastening odious characters upon another? What do men commonly please themselves in so much, as in carping, and harshly censuring, in defaming and abusing their neighbours? Is it not the sport and divertisement of many, to cast dirt in the faces of all they meet with; to bespatter any man with foul imputations? Doth not in every corner a Momus lurk, from the venom of whose spiteful or petulant tongue no eminency of rank, dignity of place, or sacredness of office, no innocence or integrity of life, no wisdom or circumspection in behaviour, no good nature, or benignity in dealing and carriage, can protect any person? Do not men assume to themselves a liberty of telling romances, and framing characters concerning their neighbour? Do they not usurp a power of playing with, of tossing about, of tearing in pieces, their neighbour's good name, as if it were the veriest toy in the world? Do not many, having a form of godliness (some of them demurely, others confidently, both without any sense of, or remorse for what they do) backbite their brethren? Is it not grown so common a thing to asperse causelessly, that no man wonders at it, that few dislike, that scarce any detest it? That most notorious calumniators are heard, not only with patience, but with pleasure; yea, are even held in vogue and reverence, as men of a notable talent, and very serviceable to their party? So that slander seems to have lost its nature, and not to be now an odious sin, but a fashionable humour, a way of pleasing entertainment, a fine knack, or curious feat of policy; so that no man at least taketh himself or others to be accountable for what is said in this way. Is not, in fine, the case become such, that whoever hath in him any love of truth, any sense of justice or honesty, any spark of charity towards his brethren, shall hardly be able to satisfy himself in the conversations he meeteth; but will be tempted, with the Holy Prophet, to wish himself sequestered from society, and cast into solitude; repeating those words of his, "Oh that I had in the wilderness a lodging-place of way-faring men, that I might leave my people, and go from them: for they are an assembly of treacherous men, and they bend their tongues like their bow for lies?"' Barrow's Works, vol. i. pp. 242, 243; Massillon's Sermons, vol. i. pp. 142—146, Eng. Translation; Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. ii. pp. 318—324.

SMYR'NA, Σμύρνα, from a Greek word that signifies myrrh. Smyrna is a city of Asia Minor, on the Archipelago, having a fine harbour. Jesus Christ, by the mouth of St. John, addresses the angel or bishop of Smyrna. (Rev. ii. 8, 9, 10.)

It is asked, who was this angel, or bishop? The generality think it was Polycarp, who was made Bishop of Smyrna by the apostle John. The commendations given to the angel of Smyrna agree with Polycarp; and it is observable, that here is not one word of reproach. There is some probability that the martyrdom of Germanicus and others, of Smyrna, who suffered under Marcus Aurelius, was what St. John had in view, when he says, the devil shall put some of them in prison.

SO, סו, savá, a measure for grain, or dry matters, Heb. Seah, which the Greeks translate by σάρον. But it is better to acknowledge, that the true etymology of this Egyptian word is not to be found in the Hebrew tongue.

So, king of Egypt: he made an alliance with Hoshea, king of Israel, and promised him assistance, yet gave him none; nor prevented Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, from taking Samaria, and subverting the kingdom of Israel, in the year of the world 3283. (2 Kings xvii. 4.)

Usher and Marsham think So, otherwise Soos or Sous, is the Sabacan king of Ethiopia, who is taken for the first king of the dynasty of Egyptians in Egypt. Usher says, he began to reign in the year of the world 3277, having taken and burnt alive Bocchoris, king of this country. He reigned eight years. He had for his successor Sevechus, whom Usher thinks to be the Sethon of Herodotus.

SOBER-MINDEDNESS. In the whole progress of tender years, till wisdom has become our favourite study; till virtue is become a settled habit in the soul, and all our ways are established; we stand in need of the directions of wise and religious instructors, and of being kept under prudent discipline. It cannot be reasonably expected that young persons, left to their own counsels, should be careful to enrich their minds with a treasure of Divine knowledge, and to form them to an exalted, arduous, and heavenly virtue. The discreet and pious tutor will labour to bring his pupil to reflect seriously on the design of his beneficent Creator in making him a religious and reasonable being; that he may be disposed in every occurrence, during the whole course of life, to behave in character; to avoid the pernicious sweets, the delusive joys of vice, and attain to the dignity and perfection of a devout Christian, an heir of eternal felicity, in regions enlightened by the Almighty and the Lamb. Happy they! who are 'brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord;' whose minds are led into an early knowledge of God, an unfeigned love of the duties that result from it, and a just aversion to every thing that defiles and depraves the human heart; who are sedate in the flower and pride of life, amidst gay expectations and a long prospect of pleasurable enjoyments.

When we exhort young men to be sober-minded, the advice is undoubtedly very useful and seasonable; peculiarly adapted to their situation and circumstances, as they are in great danger of being deceived with glittering toys, enamoured of sensual pleasures, and conformed to the world and the vain customs of a degenerate age. If they can be persuaded to take heed to their ways in that dangerous period of life, so as not to be betrayed into vice; if they can be prevailed upon to fly youthful lusts, not to allow themselves in what is contrary to the rules of right reason, and which they have just cause to condemn in their sober moments; if they can be induced to act upon all occasions as becometh thinking and accountable beings, uncertain how soon they may be consigned to happy mansions, or to horrid and dismal abodes; they will, it may reasonably be expected, persist in a religious course, and not depart from the way in which they have been taught to walk. However unwilling young people are to be reminded of the uncertainty of life and all the enjoyments of it, however unwilling they are to believe that all their strength and vivacity cannot preserve them one moment from the stroke of death, such admonitions are far from being unseasonable. There is too much occasion for reminding them of their precarious situation; for repeating the solemn truth, and exhorting them frequently to make a prudent and religious use of their rational faculties. Could they be persuaded to consider their latter end, and often to reflect that their everlasting state will be determined according to their behaviour in the present life, such considerations would cool the heat of passion, stop indecent sallies, and render them desirous of having 'God for the guide of their youth.'

When we exhort young persons to be sober-minded, we must carefully distinguish between a sober mind and a gloomy countenance, between innocent mirth and the affectation of unseasonable gravity. We must let them know that religion does not forbid pleasantries; that a cheerful countenance and a joyful heart are not only consistent with it, but arise naturally out of a clear conscience, and a mind that has just reason to be satisfied with its dispositions and actions. Religion was never intended to debar us from the delights of conversation. Social entertainments are suitable to human beings, render us useful to our fellow-creatures, and a comfort to one another. Innocence and piety are the duties of every age and condition; but those rigid austerities, which give religion a forbidding aspect, and with which superstitious souls torment themselves, are not required of any by the good and gracious Creator. Pure and undefiled religion forbids all levity of behaviour, all profane, vicious, and dissolute mirth; but gives her votaries in the room of them a perpetual serenity of mind, and joys which no man taketh from them. It consists not in enthusiastic abstractions, superstitious penances, and a retreat from the conversation of human beings; but in making a right use of our reason, and in a constant and uniform practice of all divine and moral virtues. It does not extirpate but regulate our passions, and directs our affections to their proper objects. Richardson's Divine and Moral Essays, pp. 19—28.

SO'DOM, שְׂדֹמָה, signifies their secret; otherwise, calx, or their cement. Sodom, the capital city of Pentapolis, was for some time the dwelling-place of Lot, the nephew of Abraham. (Gen. xiii. 12, 13.) The crimes of this city rose to such a height, that God destroyed it by fire from heaven, with three other neighbouring cities, Gomorrah, Zeboim, and Admah; which were as wicked as itself, (Gen. xix.) in the year of the world 2107. The plain in which they stood was before pleasant and fruitful, like an earthly paradise. It was first burned, and was afterwards overflowed by the waters of the Jordan, which there formed the Dead Sea, or Lake of Sodom. It is believed Sodom was one of the southern cities that were destroyed; because it was near Zoar, which was beyond the southernmost point of the Dead Sea.

It is doubted whether it stood within the space of land now possessed by this sea, or only upon its border. The prophets mention the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, or allude to it, and insinuate, that these places shall be desert and dried up, and uninhabited, (Jer. xlix. 18.; 1. 38.); that they shall be covered with briars and brambles, a land of salt and sulphur, where there can be neither planting nor sowing. (Amos iv. 11.) In all parts of Scripture, the ruin of Sodom and Gomorrah is represented as one of the most signal effects of God's anger.

The following is Volney's description of the present state of this district: 'The south of Syria, that is, the hollow through which the Jordan flows, is a country of volcanos; the bituminous and sulphureous sources of the lake Asphaltites, the lava, the pumice-stones thrown upon its banks, and the hot-baths of Tabaria, demonstrate that this valley has been the seat of a subterranean fire, which is not yet extinguished. Clouds of smoke are often observed to issue from the lake, and new crevices to be formed upon its banks. If conjectures in such cases were not too liable to error, we might suspect that the whole valley has been formed only by a violent sinking of a country which formerly poured the Jordan into the Mediterranean. It appears certain, at least, that the catastrophe of five cities destroyed by fire must have been occasioned by the eruption of a volcano then burning. Strabo expressly says, "that the tradition of the inhabitants of the country (that is, of the Jews themselves) was, that formerly the valley of the lake was peopled by thirteen flourishing cities, and that they were swallowed up by a volcano." This account seems to be confirmed by the quantities of ruins still found by travellers on the western border. These eruptions have ceased long since; but earthquakes, which usually succeed them, still continue to be felt at intervals in this country. The coast in general is subject to them, and history gives us many examples of earthquakes, which have changed the face of Antioch, Laodicea, Tripoli, Berytus, Tyre, Sidon, &c. In our time, in the year 1759, there happened one which caused the greatest ravages. It is said to have destroyed in the valley of Balbec upwards of twenty thousand persons; a loss which has never been repaired. For three months the shock of it terrified the inhabitants of Lebanon so much, as to make them abandon their houses, and dwell under tents.' Volney's Travels, vol. i. p. 303.

SOL'OMON, שלמה, signifies peaceable, or perfect, or that recompences. Solomon, or Salomon, son of David and Bathsheba, was born in the year of the world 2971. The Lord loved him, and sent Nathan to David, to declare his affection toward this child, and to give Solomon the name of Jedidiah, or, 'beloved of the Lord.' (2 Sam. xii. 24, 25.) This was, probably, when Nathan assured David that his son should succeed him, and that he should inherit those promises the Lord had made him some years before, when he had conceived the design of building a temple to the Lord; for then God told him, by the prophet Nathan, that the honour of building a temple should be reserved for his son. (2 Sam. vii. 5, &c.)

From this time David prepared what was necessary for building the temple, and gave Solomon an education proportionate to the great designs God had ordained him to. But, toward the end of David's reign, Adonijah, David's eldest son, began to act as if he were to succeed to the crown. David did not restrain him; Joab, Abiathar, and several of the principal men of the court, were in his interest: but Zadok the high-priest informed Bathsheba, the mother of Solomon, of his designs; and by her application to David procured the king's orders for the immediate coronation of Solomon. These orders were obeyed; Solomon was anointed king of Israel; brought back amid the acclamations of the people, and placed on the throne of David: who said, Blessed be the Lord, who has this day permitted me to see with my own eyes my son Solomon sitting on my throne.

Adonijah, and his guests, being alarmed, fled for safety; and were assured of it by Solomon. Adonijah then quitted his asylum, and came to pay his duty to king Solomon.

David's death being at hand, he earnestly recommended to Solomon a strict fidelity and piety towards God: bid him punish Joab and Shimei; but show friendship to the sons of Barzillai, who had succoured him in his distress. He put into his hands plans for building the temple, and accounts of his treasures for erecting this edifice; with many other regulations civil and sacred. Lastly, in a general assembly of the people, and of the great men, David delivered to him his gold, silver, and valuable materials, collected for building the temple, and exhorted all present to make each an offering to the Lord, according to his abilities.

Solomon now entered on the full possession of the kingdom. Soon after this, his brother Adonijah made interest with Bathsheba, that she would entreat Solomon to give him Abishag, the Shunamite to wife. Bathsheba recommended this request; but Solomon perceiving Adonijah's evil intentions, ordered Adonijah to be put to death. He also banished the high-priest Abiathar to his country-house, because he had been of Adonijah's party. When Joab heard what had happened to Adonijah and Abiathar, he fled into the tabernacle as a place of refuge. Solomon commanded him to be put to death. Solomon also ordered Shimei to build a house in Jerusalem, and not quit that city. Shimei obeyed this order for a time, but transgressing it, Solomon sent Benaiah, the son of Jehoiada, to kill him.

Solomon being confirmed in his kingdom, contracted an alliance with Pharaoh, king of Egypt, and married his daughter, in the year of the world 2991. He brought her to Jerusalem, and had apartments for her in the city of David, till he should build her a palace, which he did some years afterwards, when he had finished the temple. It is thought, that on occasion of this marriage, Solomon composed the Canticles, which are a kind of Epithalamium. To the same is referred Psalm xlv. This marriage has not been generally approved. Scripture speaks of the daughter of Pharaoh, as contributing to pervert Solomon, (1 Kings xi. 1, 2. Nehem. xiii. 26.) and it is very likely, that if at first this princess might seem converted to the Lord, she afterwards might retain her private disposition to idolatry, and engage her husband in it.

Solomon, accompanied by his troops, and all Israel, went up to Gibeon, where was then the brazen altar, upon which he offered a thousand burnt-offerings. The night following God appeared to him in a dream; and said, Ask of me what you desire. Solomon begged of God a wise and understanding heart, and such qualities as were necessary for the government of the people committed to him. This request was agreeable to the Lord; and was fully granted by him. Solomon returned to Jerusalem, where he offered a great number of sacrifices on the altar before the ark of the Lord, and made a great feast for his servants.

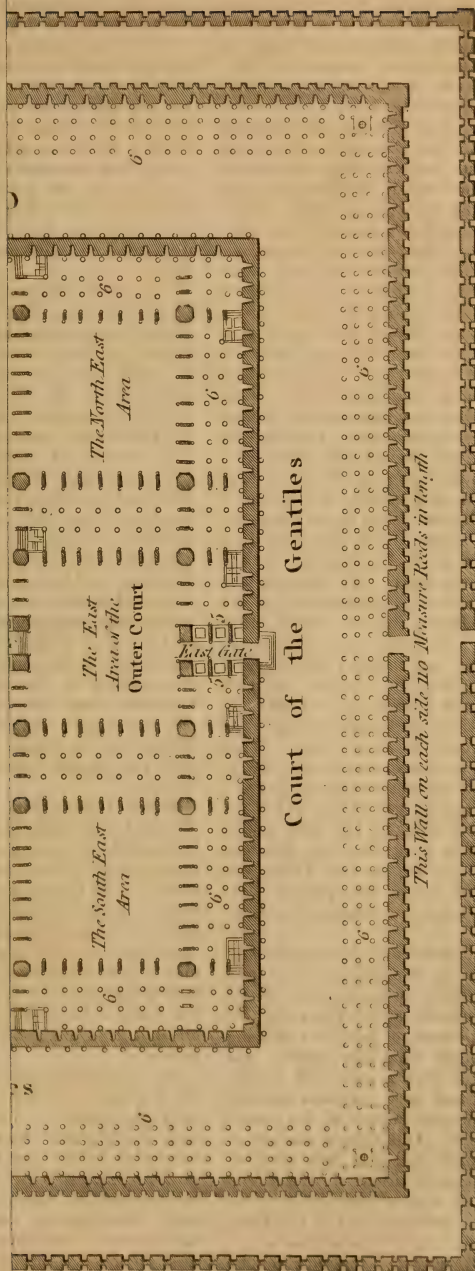

Two women, who lived together in one house, came before the king, and complained that one of them had stifled her child in her sleep, and having privately conveyed it to her companion, had stolen her living child, and pretended it to be her own. As each of these women eagerly claimed the living child, the king ordered to cut this child in two equal parts, that each of the women might have half of it. But the real mother of the child, moved by natural affection, said to the king, Let not the child be divided, rather let her take the whole child. Solomon, without hesitation, determined that the child should be given to her, for she was the mother of it. All Israel hearing of this decision, were filled with reverence for their king, perceiving his great wisdom, and knowledge of the human heart.

Solomon enjoyed a profound peace throughout his dominions: Judah and Israel lived in security; and his neighbours either paid him tribute, or were his allies; he ruled over all the countries and kingdoms, from the Euphrates to the Nile, and his dominions extended even beyond the Euphrates: he had abundance of horses and chariots of war: he exceeded the Orientals, and all the Egyptians, in wisdom and prudence: he was the wisest of mankind, and his reputation was spread through all nations. He composed, or collected, three thousand proverbs, and one thousand and five canticles. He knew the nature of plants and trees, from the cedar on Libanus, to the hyssop on the wall; also of beasts, of birds, of reptiles, of fishes. There was a concourse of strangers from all countries to hear his wisdom; and ambassadors from the most remote princes. He made gold and silver as common in Jerusalem as stones in the street; and cedars as plentiful as the sycamores in the valley.

When Hiram, king of Tyre, knew that Solomon was made king of Israel, he sent ambassadors to congratulate his accession to the crown. Some time afterwards, Solomon desired him to supply wood and workmen, to assist in building a temple to the Lord. Hiram gladly undertook what Solomon desired. Solomon, on his part, obliged him to give 20,000 measures of wheat, and 20,000 measures of oil. The Hebrew and the Vulgate have only twenty measures of oil; but it is thought it ought to be twenty thousand.

Solomon began to build the temple in the fourth year of his reign, and the second after the death of David; four hundred and eighty years after the Exodus. He employed in this great work seventy thousand proselytes, descendants of the ancient Canaanites, in carrying burthens; four-score thousand in cutting stones out of the quarries; and three thousand six hundred overseers of the works. Besides thirty thousand Israelites in the quarries of Libanus.

The temple was completed in the eleventh year of Solomon, so that he was but seven years in performing this vast work. The dedication was made in the year following, in the year of the world 3001. To make this ceremony the more august, Solomon chose for it the eighth day of the seventh month of the holy year, which was the first of the civil year, and answered to our October. The ceremony of the dedication lasted seven days, at the end of which began the feast of tabernacles, which continued seven days longer; so that the people continued at Jerusalem fourteen or fifteen days, from the eighth to the twenty-second of the seventh month.

When the ark was placed in the sanctuary, while the priests and the Levites were celebrating the praises of the Lord, the temple was filled with a miraculous cloud; so that the priests could no longer continue there, nor perform the functions of their ministry. Then Solomon, being on his throne, prostrated himself with his face to the ground; then rising up, and turning toward the sanctuary, he addressed his prayer to God, and besought him, that the house which he had built might be acceptable to him, that he would bless and sanctify it, and hear the prayers of those who should address him from this holy place. He besought him also to fulfil the promises he had made to David his servant, in favour of his family, and of the kings his successors. Then he turned himself to the people, and blessed them. Fire coming down from heaven consumed the victims and burnt-sacrifices on the altar, and the glory of the Lord filled the whole temple; so that even the priests could not enter the temple, to perform their offices.

On this day the king caused to be sacrificed 22,000 oxen, and 120,000 sheep for peace-offerings. And because the altar of burnt-offerings was not sufficient for all these victims, the king consecrated the court of the people. The Lord appeared a second time to Solomon in a dream; probably in the night that followed the first day of the dedication, and said to him, I have heard your prayer, and have chosen this temple to be my house of sacrifice. I will bless you and your posterity, if you are constant in my worship; but if not, I will punish you, and destroy this edifice.

Solomon afterwards built a palace for himself, and another for his queen, the king of Egypt's daughter. He was thirteen years in finishing these buildings, and employed therein whatever the most exquisite art, or the most profuse riches could furnish. The palace in which he generally resided was called the house of the forest of Lebanon; probably because of the great quantity of cedar used in it. He gave Hiram twenty cities in the province of Galilee. Hiram went to see them, but did not like them.

Hiram also sent Solomon six-score talents of gold; probably he lent them Solomon to go on with his buildings. (1 Kings ix. 14.)

Solomon also built the walls of Jerusalem, the place called Milo, in this city; he repaired and fortified Hazor, Megiddo, Gezer, the two Beth-horons, Upper and Lower, Baalath, and Palmyra, in the desert of Syria. He also fortified the cities where he had magazines of corn, wine, and oil; and those where his horses and chariots were kept. He brought under his government the Hittites, the Hivites, the Amorites, and the Perizzites, which remained in the land of Israel. He made them tributaries, and compelled them to work at the public works.

He fitted out a fleet at Ezion-geber, and at Elath, on the Red Sea to go to Ophir. Hiram, king of Tyre, furnished him with mariners, who instructed the subjects of Solomon. They performed this voyage in three years, and brought back gold, ivory, ebony, precious wood, peacocks, apes, and other curiosities. In one voyage they brought Solomon four hundred and fifty talents of gold, (2 Chron. ix. 21.) or only four hundred and twenty. (1 Kings ix. 28.)

About the same time, the queen of Sheba came to Jerusalem, attracted by the great fame of king Solomon. She brought rich presents of gold, spices, and precious stones. She proposed several enigmas, and hard questions; to which Solomon gave her such satisfactory answers, that she owned what had been told her of his wisdom and magnificence was far short of what she had found. The king, on his part, made her rich presents.

Solomon was one of the richest, if not the very richest, of all princes that have ever lived; and the Scripture expressly tells us he exceeded in riches and wisdom all the kings of the earth. His annual revenues were six hundred and sixty-six talents of gold, without reckoning tributes from kings and nations, or paid by Israelites, or sums received for customs. The bucklers of his guards, and the throne he sat on, were overlaid with gold. All the vessels of his table, and the utensils of his palaces, were of gold. From all parts he received presents, vessels of gold and silver, precious stuffs, spices, arms, horses, and mules; the whole earth desired to see the face of Solomon, and to hear the wisdom God had put into his heart.

But the latter actions of his life sadly disgraced his character. Besides Pharaoh's daughter, he married wives from among the Moabites, Ammonites, Idumeans, Sidonians, and Hittites. He had 700 wives, who were so many queens, besides 300 concubines. These women perverted his heart, in his declining age, so that he worshipped Ashtoreth, goddess of the Sidonians, Moloch, idol of the Ammonites, and Chemosh, god of the Moabites. To these he built temples on the Mount of Olives, over against, and east of Jerusalem. Wherefore the Lord said to him in a dream, Since you have not kept my covenant, nor obeyed my commandments, I will rend and divide your kingdom, and will give it to one of your servants. Solomon, before his death, saw the beginnings of revolt, in the troubles raised by Jeroboam, and by Hadad the Idumean.

Solomon died after he had reigned forty years, in the year of the world 3029. We think he might be about fifty-eight years of age; for he was about eighteen when he began to reign. Josephus allows him eighty years of reign, and ninety-four years of life; but this is a manifest error. The history of this prince was written by the prophets Nathan, Ahijah, and Iddo. He was buried in the city of David, and Rehoboam his son reigned in his stead, but not over all Israel.

Several interpreters are of opinion that the book of Ecclesiastes is a monument of the repentance of Solomon, being composed by him after his fall.

Of all the ingenious works composed by Solomon, we have nothing remaining but his Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Canticles. Some have ascribed to him the book of Wisdom, and Ecclesiasticus; but these opinions are very improbable.

There has also been published, The Psalter of Solomon, containing eighteen Psalms, found in Greek, in the library of Augsburg, by Andrew Schott; which have been translated into Latin, and given to the public by Father de la Cerda. The learned are agreed that they are none of Solomon's, but of some Hellenistic Jew, much conversant in the sacred authors, who has composed them in imitation of the Psalms of David, of which he has pretty closely imitated the style; and has inserted in them several fragments of the prophets Isaiah and Ezekiel, which he has well enough accommodated to his design.

SONG. See CANTICLES.

SO'REK, שֹׂרֵק, signifies vines, or grapes; otherwise, whistle, or whistling. Sorek was the name of a brook that passed through the tribe of Dan; and also a valley where dwelt the famous Delilah, Samson's mistress. (Judg. xvi. 4.) This valley of Sorek was famous for its choice wines. (Gen. xli. 11. Isaiah v. 2. Jer. ii. 21.)

SOSIP'ATER, Σωσίπατρος, signifies that saves the father, or safety of the father. Sosipater, of whom St. Paul speaks, (Rom. xvi. 21.) was his kinsman, as some think. 'Lucius, and Jason, and Sosipater, my kinsmen, salute you.' But there is some difficulty in this, since Jason was of Thessalonica, and Sosipater was of Berea, in Macedonia, very distant from Tarsus, the country of St. Paul. In what sense then does he call them kinsmen? Is it because they were of the same nation, of the same tribe, of the same city, of the same religion, or only allied to him? Calmet thinks it may be confidently asserted, that this Sosipater, who was at Rome, A.D. 58, when St. Paul wrote to the Romans, cannot be the Sosipater of Berea; since he accompanied St. Paul the same year 58, to Jerusalem, and probably went with him from Corinth, whence the Epistle to the Romans was written, to go by way of Macedonia to Jerusalem. (Acts xx. 4, 5, 6, &c.) In our English translation he is called Sopater.

SOS'THENES, Σωσθένης, signifies saviour, strong and powerful. Sosthenes was chief of the synagogue of Corinth. The Jews of Corinth laying hold of St. Paul, carried him before the tribunal of Gallio, the proconsul, but he sent them away. Then they seized Sosthenes, the chief of the synagogue, and began to beat him before the tribunal; but Gallio disregarded it. It is disputed whether they were Jews or Gentiles, who seized Sosthenes and beat him. The printed Greek of the Acts intimates that they were Gentiles. St. Austin and Bede read in the same manner. They imagined that the Pagans, seeing Gallio's ill reception of the Jews, abused this chief of their synagogue; whether merely out of hatred to the Jews, or out of friendship to St. Paul. This opinion is followed by Cajetan, Lyran, Grotius, and some others. (Acts xviii. 17.)

Others think that Sosthenes, though head of the synagogue, yet might be a friend and secret disciple of St. Paul; and that the other Jews, seeing themselves neglected by Gallio, might vent their malice on Sosthenes.

SOUL, that vital, immaterial, active substance, or principle in man, by which he perceives, remembers, reasons, and wills. We are too apt to suppose that our powers of perception are constituted by the organized fibres of which our bodies are composed; and because in this present state of things we have no other means of communication with the sensible world than through the medium of our senses; or, because we see with our eyes, hear with our ears, taste with our palate, smell with our nose, and feel with our touch, that therefore death, which proves the destruction of these organic powers, must annihilate that consciousness which we have of the existence of other beings, and of our own existence. But it does not follow that the organs of sensation are the same thing as the sentient being; or that the one ceases to be when the others are destroyed. May we not conceive it very probable that we may exist, and be conscious of existence, or be in respect to perception and intelligence the same beings that we are at present, without either eyes, or ears, or smell, or taste, or touch, in short, without any corporeal integument?

Those who maintain that death destroys the mind and the body of man, seem to suppose that the organs of perception are the same as the percipient power; and that what destroys one, of course destroys the other. But there are certain facts and analogies which seem to prove that the sensual organs do not constitute the perceptive faculty, but are only the means or channel of correspondence between that faculty and the external world. We can have no original perception of external objects with which we have not been previously made acquainted by the senses; but when the mind has acquired such sensual ideas, it can retain and compound them when the sight, or hearing, or any other sense by which they were originally communicated, is destroyed. If the perceptive power and the perceptive organs were one and the same thing, the ideas of sense being so intimately identified with the organs of sense, could not survive their destruction; and thus he who had lost his sight could no longer have any visible ideas. But we know that those who have corporeally lost their sight, do not mentally cease to see; or, in other words, do not cease to retain those perceptions of visible objects, which they were originally assisted in acquiring by the faculty of vision; and in dreams we all know that the perceptive faculty is often very active, when the organs of perception are in a state of suspension or temporary death. Hence it follows, that we may perceive without organs of perception, and that the perceptive faculty is something very different from the perceptive organs.

The will, which puts the limbs in motion, must be something very different from the limbs, which are put in motion; for the limbs are evidently the instruments of the will, as the will, which is the moving faculty, is as active after the destruction of the limb as it was before; for the will can apply an artificial limb to the same purposes as the natural; but this could not be effected if the faculty of motion resided in the limb, rather than in the mind. But the power of willing, or the actual faculty of perception, seems no more to reside in the organs of sense, as in the eye, or ear, than in the spectacles or the trumpet which we often use to assist the operation of those organs. And hence we infer that our organs of sense, which some philosophers make to constitute the perceptive faculty itself, and consequently in which they suppose our personal identity to reside, do not constitute ourselves, and consequently that they may be annihilated without the annihilation of our consciousness. The relation between us and our senses is of the same kind, though more intimate and entire than that between us and other external objects; and the destruction of the one no more necessitates the destruction of our personality, than the destruction of the other. But if the perceptive faculty remain after the destruction of the perceptive organs; if the power of motion survive the natural instruments of motion; if the will continue full of life and activity, when the material fibres on which it is to operate are perished or decayed, we have good reason to believe that the same power of perception survives the shock of death; for, if we may lose some of our most material organs without its being impaired, is it not highly probable that when the whole corporeal frame is dissolved, the percipient faculty will not be destroyed?

The power of the mind principally resides in activity of reflection; but we have seen in many remarkable instances that the vigour of reflection often remains without being in the least affected by the decay of the body, and has sometimes shone with the brightest lustre, and displayed its fullest strength, when the lamp of animal life was on the point of going out. And if the reflective faculty be not affected by the sickness, the decay, or the debility of the body, it becomes almost morally certain that it will remain after the total dissolution of the corporeal frame, and that death will not only not destroy the mind, but not even for a moment suspend its operations.

It is demonstrably clear that the decay of the sensual organ does not impair the vigour or impede the exercise of the thinking faculty, and consequently we may infer that that faculty may remain entire even after the destruction of the whole corporeal frame. The powers of reflection differ from those of sensation, and death, which extinguishes the one, may only cause the more vigorous expansion of the other.

If, therefore, death, which destroys the corporeal organs, and makes the body moulder into dust, have no effect on the mind, as many circumstances concur to prove; if it neither extinguish, nor even suspend its active powers; death itself ought to be regarded as the period of our nativity to a more exalted and refined state of being. Thus after death there will be a continuation of our present existence, but under happier circumstances, in which all the privations and sufferings of this life will be removed; and the mind, freed from the terrene grossness which now surrounds it, will be susceptible of pleasures as pure as they are permanent. Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. i. pp. 138—146.

STAR, Stella; in Hebrew, כוכב, cocah. Under the name of stars, the Hebrews comprehended all the heavenly bodies, constellations, and planets; all the luminaries, except the sun and the moon. The Scripture often expresses itself as if it should seem to attribute sense and understanding to the stars. The sun and moon were called by the idolatrous Israelites, king and queen of heaven; and the stars were (as it were) their army and militia. (Deut. xvii. 3.) Both received those honours which were due only to their Creator.

The number of the stars was considered as infinite: the Psalmist, to exalt the power and omniscience of God, says that he numbers the stars, and calls them by their names. He is described as a king taking a review of his army, and knowing the name of every one of his soldiers. The Scripture, to express a very extraordinary increase and multiplication, uses the similitude of the stars of heaven, or of the sands of the sea: 'I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand upon the sea shore.' (Gen. xv. 5.; xxii. 17.; xxvi. 4. Exod. xxxii. 13, &c.) Job says, (xxv. 5.) that in the eyes of God, the stars themselves are impure; that they formed a kind of concert song to his honour at the beginning of the creation, (xxxviii. 7.); that God locks them up, as with a key, and hinders them from appearing, but when he pleases. (Job ix. 7.)

In times of disgrace and public calamity, it is said, the stars withhold their light, and are covered with darkness; that they fall from heaven, and disappear. These figurative and emphatic expressions, it seems probable, frequently refer to the governing powers of nations. Amos (v. 26.) says, that the Israelites in the wilderness carried with them a star to which they paid divine honours: 'Ye have borne the star of your God, which ye made to yourselves.' See CHIUN.

Job (ix. 9.; xxxviii. 31.) speaks of Arcturus, Orion, Pleiades, and the star of the south. See ARCTURUS.

STEPHEN, Στέφανος. Stephen; in Greek, Stephanos, which signifies a crown. Stephen, the first martyr, was probably of the number of those Hellenistical Jews that believed in Jesus Christ. Epiphanius thinks he was of the number of the seventy-two disciples of Jesus Christ: but this is not certain. Jesus Christ appointed his seventy-two disciples to teach and preach; but it seems that Stephen, and the six other first deacons, had not that particular designation, when they were chosen to serve tables; which was in the year 34. St. Stephen is always put at their head; and it is believed he had studied at the feet of Gamaliel. As he was full of the Holy Ghost, and of zeal, (Acts vi. 5, 6, &c.) he performed many wonderful works and miracles, and some of the synagogue of the freed-men of the Cyrenians, of the Alexandrians, and others, disputing with him, could not withstand his wisdom and spirit.

Then they suborned false witnesses, to testify that they heard him blaspheme against Moses, and against God; and they drew him before the Sanhedrim. Stephen appeared in the midst of this assembly, with a countenance like that of an angel; and the high-priest asking him, what he had to answer? In his defence, he showed—he had not said any thing either against Moses or the temple; but that the Jews had always opposed themselves to God and his prophets; he upbraided them with the hardness of their hearts, with their putting the prophets to death, and, lastly, with slaying Jesus Christ himself.

At these words they were enraged, and gnashed their teeth against him. But Stephen, lifting up his eyes to Heaven, said, 'I see the heavens opened, and the Son of Man standing at the right hand of God.' Then the Jews cried out, stopped their ears, and falling on him, they drew him out of the city, and stoned him. The witnesses laid down their clothes at the feet of a young man called Saul, then one of the most eager persecutors of the Christians, but afterwards one of the most zealous preachers of Christianity. Stephen called upon the Lord, and said, Lord, impute not this sin to them. After this he fell asleep in the Lord, and some pious persons took care to bury him, and accompanied his funeral with great mourning. (Acts viii. 2.)

STOICS, Στωικοί, thus called by the Greeks, because they assembled and conversed together under a porch or portico, in Greek Στόα, Stoa. Stoics were heathen philosophers who took their name from the Greek word Stoa, signifying a porch, or portico, because Zeno, the head of the Stoics, kept his school in a porch of the city of Athens. Diogenes Laertius in his life of Zeno, and others, have treated of these philosophers. Josephus says, that the Pharisees approach very near to the sentiments of the Stoics. They affected the same stiffness, patience, apathy, austerity, and insensibility. The sect of the Stoics was considerable at Athens when St. Paul came thither, since he had conferences with them. (Acts xvii. 18.) The Stoics placed the supreme happiness of man in living agreeably to nature and reason. They seem to have looked on God as the soul of the world.

STONES. For the names of the precious stones which were in the high-priest's breast-plate, (Exod. xxviii. 17, &c.) see BREAST-PLATE.

The Hebrews sometimes give the name of stone or rock to kings, to princes, or to God himself. Joseph in Egypt became 'the stone of Israel.' (Gen. xlix. 24.) They also give the name of stones to their weights used in commerce. (Lev. xix. 36.) 'Just weights shall ye have,' the Hebrew says, 'just stones.'

The corner-stone, or the head stone of the corner, is that which is put at the angle of a building, whether at the foundation, or on the top of the wall. Jesus Christ was that corner-stone which, though rejected by the Jews, is the corner-stone of the church, (Psalm cxviii. 22.) and the stone that binds and unites the synagogue and the Gentiles in the union of the same faith. (Eph. ii. 20. Matt. xxi. 42.)

Shower of stones. Joshua (x. 11.) speaks of its raining stones upon the Canaanites. 'And it came to pass as they fled from before Israel, and were in the going down to Beth-horon, that the Lord cast down great stones from heaven upon them unto Azekah, and they died. They were more that died with hail-stones than they whom the children of Israel slew with the sword.' Some pretend that this was ordinary hail, but larger and more violent than usual. Others maintain that Joshua is to be understood literally of a shower of stones. The text seems to be express for this sentiment, and the thing is not impossible. We have several instances of showers of stones. When the Scripture speaks of these events, it speaks of them as of a prodigy. But a common shower of hail has nothing of a miracle in it. Masius, Bonfrere, Grotius, explain it literally of a shower of stones. Moses (Deut. xxviii. 24.) speaks of a shower of dust and sand, with which he threatens Israel. The Romans, who looked on showers of stones as very disastrous, in their annals have noticed many instances of them. It is probable, however, that the stones mentioned by Livy came from an eruption of Mount Vesuvius, being brought by a tempest. But whence could those come that fell on the Canaanites? The instances of enormous hail-stones are amply sufficient. (Exod. ix. 25. Rev. xvi. 21.)

The knives of stone used by the Jews in circumcision were not enjoined by the law; but the use was founded, either on custom, convenience, or experience of this kind of instrument, being less dangerous than those of metal. Zipporah used a stone to circumcise her son. (Exod. iv. 25.) Joshua did the same, when he caused such of the Israelites to be circumcised at Gilgal, as had not received circumcision during their journey in the wilderness. (Josh. v. 2.) The Egyptians used these knives of stone to open dead bodies that were to be embalmed. Pliny assures us that the priests of the mother of the gods had sharp stones with which they cut themselves, which they thought they could not do with any thing else without danger.

Solomon says, (Prov. xvi. 8.) 'As he that bindeth a stone in a sling, so is he that giveth honour to a fool.' When a stone is fastened to a sling, the slinger hinders his own design of throwing it; he loses his labour; so does the man who gives honour to a fool. But the words may be rendered, 'As he that putteth a precious stone in a heap of stones,' where it is obscure and lost; and as this little stone does not augment the heap, nor is so much as seen upon it, so honour heaped on a fool does not render him more worthy of consideration. Others translate it, 'to tie a stone in a piece of purple is to give honour to a fool.' As nothing can be so ill placed as a stone in a piece of fine cloth; so are honours ill placed upon a fool.

Heaps of Stones, raised in witness of any memorable event, and to preserve the remembrance of some matter of great importance, are the most ancient monuments among the Hebrews. In early ages, these monuments were instead of inscriptions, pyramids, medals, or histories. Chardin says, 'Upon the left hand of the road are to be seen large circles of hewn stone, which the Persians affirm to be a great sign that the Caous, making war in Media, held a council in that place: it being the custom of those people, that every officer that came to the council brought with him a stone to serve him instead of a chair: these Caous were a sort of giants. What is most to be admired, after observation of these stones, is this, that they are so big that eight men can hardly move one, and yet there is no place from whence they can be imagined to have been fetched, but from the next mountains, which are six leagues off.' Jacob and Laban raised such a monument on Mount Gilead, in memory of their covenant. (Gen. xxxi. 46.) Joshua erected one at Gilgal, made of stones, taken out of the Jordan, to preserve the memorial of his miraculous passage over this river. (Josh. iv. 5, 6, 7.) The Israelites that dwelt beyond Jordan also raised one on the banks of the river, as a testimony that they constituted but one nation with their brethren on the other side. (Josh. xxii. 10.) Sometimes they heaped such a collection of stones on the burying-place of odious persons, as Achan and Absalom. (Josh. vii. 26. 2 Sam. xviii. 17.)

A heart of stone, may be understood several ways. Job, (xli. 24.) speaking of the Leviathan, says, that his heart is as hard as stone; 'his heart is as firm as a stone, yea, as hard as a piece of the nether mill-stone:' that is, he is of a very extraordinary strength, boldness, and courage. It is said, (1 Sam. xxv. 37.) that Nabal's heart died within him, and he became as a stone; when he was told of the danger he had incurred by his imprudence, his heart became immoveable like a stone, it was contracted or convulsed, and this convulsion was the occasion of his death. Ezekiel says, (xi. 19.; xxxvi. 26.) that the Lord will take away from his people their heart of stone, and give them a heart of flesh; that he will convert them, and inspire them with milder and more gracious feelings. Pretty near in the same sense John the Baptist said, (Matt. iii. 9.) that God was able to raise up to Abraham children from the stones of the desert.

A stone is sometimes put for an idol of stone: 'Woe unto him that saith unto the wood, Awake, and to the dumb stone, Arise, it shall teach.' (Hab. ii. 9.) The Assyrians threw into the fire the gods of the nations; for they were no gods, they were only wood and stone. (Isaï. xxxvii. 9.) And Jeremiah (ii. 27.) says, 'Saying to a stock, Thou art my father, and to a stone, Thou hast brought me forth.'

To be reduced to a heap of stones, is said of a city or a house which is entirely ruined and demolished; 'I will make Samaria as an heap of the field, and as plantings of a vineyard.' (Mic. i. 6.) Isaiah says, (xvii. 1.) that Damascus shall cease to be a city, and shall be reduced to a heap of stones. Thus also our Saviour, speaking of the destruction of Jerusalem, says, that one stone shall not remain upon another, (Matt. xxiv. 2.) Fragments annexed to Calmel's Dictionary, No. cxlvi. p. 167.

STONING, to stone, to put to death by casting stones. Lapidation was a punishment much in use among the Hebrews, and the rabbins reckon up many crimes that were subject to it.

Lapidation, say the rabbins, was performed after two manners. The first was when stones were thrown upon the guilty person till he died; the witnesses throwing the first stones at him. The second manner was, when the criminal was brought to a steep place, whose height was at least that of two men, from whence one of the two witnesses threw him headlong, and the other rolled a large stone upon his body. If he did not die by his fall from the rock, they dispatched him by throwing stones upon him. Some suppose a reference to these two manners of stoning in the Gospel. (Matt. xxi. 44.) We see more than one instance in Scripture of the first manner of stoning; but we have no example of the second; for that of Jezebel, who was thrown out of a window, proves nothing. (2 Kings ix. 33.)

What we have said, that they generally stoned criminals out of the city, is true only of regular executions. For in some cases the Jews stoned those whom they thought deserved it, wherever they found them: for example, when by a transport of zeal, they stoned to death a blasphemer, an adulterer, or an idolater. Thus when they brought to Jesus a woman surprised in adultery, (John viii.) he said to her accusers, Let him who is without fault cast the first stone at her; and when the Jews, pretending he blasphemed, took up stones to stone him, even in the temple. (John viii. 59.; x. 31.) On such occasions they did not stay for the usual formalities, but followed the first transports of their passion. This they called the judgment of zeal.

We are told that after a man had been stoned they fastened his body to a stake by tying his hands together; and so left him till sun-set; then they untied him, and buried him in the Vale of Carcasses, with the stake to which he had been fastened. This, they say, was done only to blasphemers and idolaters; but it would be very difficult to prove this practice by Scripture.

SUBMISSION of our wills to the will of God, imports the performing of those things which he commands; or patiently suffering the evils which God either permits, or inflicts on us. The one may be called an active, the other a passive, submission to the will of God. Had man continued in that state of innocence in which God at first created him, there would have been only required of him an active submission to the will of God; for, by obeying the laws and commands of God, he would have attained to the perfection of his nature, and then both himself and his posterity had been happy for ever. But by transgressing the divine law, he introduced sin, with all its fatal consequences into the world, and became subject to those innumerable afflictions and calamities, which have since been the lot and portion of his miserable posterity. However, as this is now the melancholy condition of mankind, it becomes us patiently to submit ourselves, and to behave with resignation and composure of mind, whenever any calamity or affliction befalls us.

This submission of ourselves to God's will consists in the habit, and not in the act; and properly denotes such a temper and frame of mind, as is prepared cheerfully to bear whatever can happen to us. We must repose ourselves under God's protection, continue resigned and contented in adversity, as well as prosperity; when God writes bitter things against us, as well as when we enjoy the light of his countenance. It is a duty but of low attainment, to submit our wills to the divine, only when we enjoy all our hearts can wish: but can we take contentedly the spoiling of our goods, the loss of our children, the ingratitude of our friends, a painful and acute distemper, and then say with Job, 'the Lord gave, and the Lord taketh away; blessed be the name of the Lord?' And yet we ought cheerfully to submit to the will of God; to rejoice and be exceeding glad, when we suffer for righteousness' sake; 'for whom God loveth he chasteneth, and correcteth every son whom he receiveth.'

The reasonableness of performing this duty will plainly appear, if we consider that God is the great creator and governor of the world. He made us, and not we ourselves, and therefore may justly dispose of us according to his own will and pleasure: 'Shall the clay say to the potter, Why hast thou made me thus?' may not God do what he will with his own? Besides, God has not only an absolute unlimited power over us, but he is also a Being of infinite wisdom, to conduct and bring about the great designs of his providence. How reasonable is it then that such blind ignorant beings as we are, should resign ourselves to the conduct of an infinitely wise God; to observe his directions, execute his commands, govern our lives and conversations by his laws, and submit all our concerns to his disposal! For God is not only infinitely wise and powerful, but also a most good and merciful Being, and naturally inclined to help and assist the distressed and miserable. Let me desire you to consider, whether, if some powerful friend had placed you in an opulent and comfortable station, and in the general conduct of your affairs had discovered the most disinterested kindness, you would not ascribe any occasional discouragements you received, to some unknown reason or cause, rather than to his unfaithfulness or cruelty? Ought not the experience which we have had, and the discovery which all nature affords, of the Divine goodness, to lead us to put a like construction on the evils which we suffer from a hand that hath so frequently loaded us with good? Have we forgotten, in the midst of our complaints, who brought us into the light of day; who watched over our helpless infancy; who reared our growing childhood, and, through ten thousand surrounding dangers, has been our protector and guardian until this day? How often has he rescued us from sickness and death, and made our hearts glad with unexpected comforts? Now, that some cloud is thrown over our prosperity, or some blessing withdrawn, in which, for a time, we had rejoiced, can we imagine that there is no good cause for this change of his proceeding?

The good things, which at different times we have received and enjoyed, are much greater than the evils which we suffer. Of this fact I am sensible it will be difficult to persuade the afflicted. But would they weigh, in a fair balance, the whole of their circumstances, they would find it true. Whatever persons feel at the present makes so strong an impression upon them as very commonly to obliterate the memory of all the past. When one is impressed with some painful disease in his body, or wrung with some sore distress of mind, every former comfort, at that moment, goes for nothing. Life is beheld in all its gloom; a dark cloud seems to hang over it; and it is reviled as no other than a scene of wretchedness and sorrow. But this is to be unjust to human life, as well as ungrateful to its Author. Let me only desire you to think how many days, how many months, how many years, you have passed in health, and ease, and comfort; how many pleasurable feelings you have had; how many friends you have enjoyed; how many blessings, in short, of different kinds, you have tasted; and you will be forced to acknowledge, that more materials of thanksgiving present themselves than of lamentation and complaint. Not only the goods of life are, upon the whole, greater than its evils; but the evils which we suffer are seldom, or never, without some mixture of good. If we are deprived of friends whom we tenderly loved, are there not some still remaining, from whom we may expect much comfort? If our bodies are afflicted with sore disease, have we not reason to be thankful that our mind continues vigorous and entire; that we are in a situation to look around us for whatever can afford us ease; and that after the decay of this frail and mouldering tabernacle, we can look forward to a 'house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens?' In the midst of all distresses, there remains to every sincere Christian that mixture of pure and genuine consolation, which springs from the promises and hopes of the Gospel. As the evils which we suffer are thus alleviated by a mixture of good, so we have reason to believe that the evils themselves are, in many respects, good. When borne with patience and dignity, they improve and ennoble our character. They bring into exercise several of the manly and heroic virtues; and, by the constancy and fidelity with which we support our trials on earth, prepare us for the highest rewards in heaven. It has always been found that the present constitution of human nature cannot bear uninterrupted prosperity, without being corrupted by it. The poisonous weeds which spring up in that too luxuriant soil require the hand of adversity to extirpate them. It is the experience of sorrow and distress that subdues the arrogance of pride, tames the violence of passion, softens the hardness of the selfish heart, and humanizes the temper to feel for the woes of others. Many have had reason to say, that 'it was good for them to be afflicted.' (Psalm cxix. 71.) Blair's Sermons, vol. ii. pp. 352—357; Warner's System of Divinity and Morality, vol. iii. pp. 39—42.

SUC^{COOTH}, סֻכּוֹת, signifies tabernacles, or tents. Succoth, or Sochoth, the first encampment of the Israelites, after they left Egypt. (Exod. xii. 37.) Succoth signifies tents; perhaps the Mischenoth, or cities of tents. (Exod. i. 11.) Our translation renders Mischenoth treasure-cities.

Succoth, a city beyond Jordan, between the brook Jabbok and this river. Jacob at his return from Mesopotamia, passing over the brook Jabbok, set up his tents at Succoth, where afterwards they built a city. (Gen. xxxiii. 17.) Joshua assigned it to the tribe of Gad. (Josh. xiii. 27.) Solomon cast his large brazen vessels for the service of the temple, between Succoth and Zarthan. (1 Kings vii. 46.) Jerome says, Succoth was within the district of Scythopolis. The Jews tell us, the name of Darala was afterwards given to Succoth. Gideon tore the flesh of the principal men of Succoth with thorns and briers, because they returned him an haughty answer, when pursuing the Midianites. (Judg. viii. 7.)

SUC'COTH-BE'NOTH, סוּכּוֹת-בְּנוֹת, signifies the tabernacles of young women, or the tents of prostitutes. (2 Kings xvii. 30.) The Babylonians who were brought into the country of Samaria by Shalmaneser, or by Esar-haddon, king of Assyria, continued the worship of their false gods, and made there Succoth-Benoth, that is, the tents of the young women, or places of prostitution, where all young women, once in their lives, prostituted themselves in honour of the goddess Milytta. Herodotus says, this was thus practised at Babylon: all the young women of the country are obliged, once in their lives, to prostitute themselves to a stranger, in honour of Milytta, or Venus. The rich present themselves in covered chariots before the temple, attended by a great number of domestics. They go only out of ceremony, and do not abandon themselves to strangers, as others do. But the common sort stand before the temple, having crowns on their heads, and being separated from one another by small cords, which, however, do not hinder strangers from going in, and choosing which they like best. They throw money in their laps, saying, 'I invoke the goddess Milytta for you.' The women must not refuse this money, be it ever so little, because it is appointed to uses which they call sacred; nor must they reject such persons as offer themselves. These lead them away, and after they have accompanied them, they may return to their own houses. Probably, the Babylonians brought with them this abominable custom into the country of Samaria. The Rabbins insist, that Succoth-Benoth signifies a hen and chickens. Eusebius and Jerome seem to think it is a city which these people built in Samaria.

SUN, the great luminary which enlightens the world, and by its presence constitutes day. It is eight hundred and ninety thousand miles in diameter, and more than one hundred and twelve times larger than the diameter of the earth. It has been discovered, that the sun moves round its own axis, without moving considerably out of its place, in about twenty-five days; and that not only the earth, but all the planets, move round the sun in periodical times, which produces the different seasons, and the length of days and nights.

This great luminary God created at the beginning to preside over day; as he created the moon to preside over night. It is thought it was the sun which the Phenicians worshipped under the name of Baal, the Moabites under the name of Chemosh, the Ammonites under that of Moloch, the Israelites under that of Baal, and the king of the host of heaven. They united with his worship that of the moon. They worshipped on high places, in groves, on the roofs of their houses. Moses cautioned the Israelites against this worship (Deut. iv. 19.): 'Take ye, therefore, good heed unto yourselves, lest thou lift up thine eyes unto heaven, and when thou seest the sun, the moon, and the stars, even all the host of heaven, shouldest be driven to worship and serve them.' And in another place, (Deut. xvii. 3.) he condemns to death those perverted to worship strange gods, the sun, or the moon. Josiah, king of Judah, took from the temple of the Lord, the horses, and burnt the chariots, which the kings his predecessors had consecrated to the sun. (2 Kings xxiii. 11.) Job says (xxxi. 26, 27, 28.) that he looked on it as a very great crime, and as renouncing the God that is above, to kiss his hand in token of adoration, when he beheld the sun in all its beauty and splendour. Ezekiel saw in the Spirit, in the temple of the Lord, five-and-twenty-men of Judah, who turned their backs on the sanctuary, and had their faces toward the east, worshipping the sun at his rising. (Ezekiel viii. 16.)

The sun furnishes matter to the greater part of the noble similitudes, used by the sacred authors. To represent great calamity, they say the sun was obscured, and the moon withdrew her light, &c. &c. (Isai. xlii. 10.; xxiv. 23. Jer. xv. 9. Ezek. xxxii. 7. Amos. viii. 9.)

The Scripture acquaints us with three very extraordinary and miraculous accidents that happened to the sun. The first was, when it stood still at the command of Joshua, (Josh. x. 12, 13.); the second, when it returned back in the time of king Hezekiah, (2 Kings xx. 11.); and the third, when it was involved in darkness, though the moon was then at full, during the time of our Saviour's crucifixion. (Matt. xxvii. 45.)

To express a long continuance of any thing glorious and illustrious, in Scripture style it is said, it shall continue as long as the sun. So the reign of the Messiah, (Psalm lxxii. 17.; lxxxix. 36.) that his throne is as durable as the sun; that, under his happy dominion, the light of the moon shall be equal to that of the sun, and that of the sun shall be seven times more than ordinary (Isai. xxx. 26.) Jesus Christ is called the Sun of Righteousness. (Mal. iv. 2.)

The compass of the whole earth is described by the expression, from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same; or rather, from east to west (Psalm l. l.; cvii. 3.; cxiii. 3. &c.) To be hung upon a gibbet in the eye of the sun; to be exposed in the fields to the birds of the air, to the heat of the sun, expresses the utmost degree of ignominy. 'A woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet.' (Rev. xii. 1.)

SUPEREROGATION, what a man does beyond his duty, or more than he is commanded to do. Works of supererogation are admitted by the members of the Romish persuasion; and it cannot but be matter of surprise, that such a doctrine should have prevailed in any church which calls itself Christian. This doctrine was first known about the twelfth or thirteenth century; and it seems to have been founded upon what the Papists call "Counsels of perfection," that is, rules which do not bind under the penalty of sin, but are only useful in carrying men to a greater degree of perfection than is necessary to salvation. There is not the slightest authority in Scripture for these Counsels of perfection: all the rules there prescribed for our conduct are given in the form of positive commands, as absolutely necessary, wherever they are applicable, to the attainment of eternal life; and the violation of every one of these commands is declared to be sin. We are ordered to be 'perfect, even as our Father which is in heaven is perfect;' (Matt. v. 48.); and so far from being able to exceed what is required for our salvation, the Gospel assures us, that after our utmost care and best endeavours, we shall still fall short of our whole duty. We are directed to trust to the mercy of God, and to the mediation of Christ; 'and to work out our salvation with fear and trembling.' (Phil. ii. 12.) Hence we may pronounce that works of Supererogation are inconsistent with the nature of man, irreconcilable with the whole tenor and general principles of our religion, and contrary to the express declarations of Scripture. Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. ii. pp. 280, 281.

SUPRALAPSARIANS are the most rigid of all those who profess to receive the doctrine of election. They hold that God had no other view than to magnify his attributes; by the salvation of some, his mercy, and by the condemnation of others, his justice; and therefore that he ordained the fall of man from eternity. Their opinions on this subject seem to be the same as those of the modern Calvinists. See CALVINISTS. Bellamy's History of all Religions, p. 238.

SUPREMACY OF THE POPE, a doctrine held by the Roman Catholics, who believe that the Bishop of Rome is, under Christ, supreme pastor of the whole church; and, as such, is not only the first bishop in order and dignity, but has also a power and jurisdiction over all Christians. The authority usurped by the popes in the dark ages of the church, which extended into this island, had no foundation whatever in Scripture; nor was it asserted, or even mentioned, in the primitive ages of Christianity. Irenæus has left an account of a dispute which Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, had with Anicetus, Bishop of Rome, concerning the observation of Easter; but in this account no mention is made of any superior authority which belonged to Anicetus; and in fact Polycarp, and the church under his jurisdiction, continued to observe Easter according to his judgment, and in opposition to that of Anicetus. It is indeed certain that for several centuries the bishops of Rome neither exercised nor claimed any power out of their own diocese. Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage, in the third century, expressly says, 'Nor hath any one of us set himself up for a bishop of bishops, nor by any tyrannical usage terrified his colleagues or fellow bishops into a necessity of stooping and cringing to him, being duly sensible that every bishop is at liberty to use his power according to his discretion, and is neither to judge nor to be judged by another.' And upon another occasion he says, that 'all the apostles were equal in power, and that all bishops were also equal, since the whole office and episcopate was one entire thing, of which every bishop had a complete and equal share.' Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. ii. 553, 554.

SWEDENBORGIANS denote that particular denomination of Christians who admit the testimony of Baron Swedenborg, and direct their lives in agreement with the doctrines taught in the theological writings of that author.

Emanuel Swedenborg, from whom this denomination of Christians derive their name, was the son of a bishop of West Gothnia, in the kingdom of Sweden, whose name was Swedberg, a man of considerable learning and celebrity in his time. The son was born at Stockholm, January 29, 1688. He enjoyed early the advantages of a liberal education, and, being naturally endowed with uncommon talents for the acquirement of learning, his progress in the sciences was rapid and extensive; and he soon distinguished himself by several publications in the Latin language, which gave proof of equal genius and erudition. It may reasonably be supposed, that, under the care of his pious and reverend father, our author's religious instruction was not neglected. This, indeed, appears plain from the general tenor of his life and writings, which are marked with strong and lively characters of a mind deeply impressed with a sense of the Divine Being, and of all the relative duties thence resulting. He was ennobled in the year 1719, by queen Ulrica Eleonora, and named Swedenborg; from which time he took his seat with the nobles of the equestrian order, in the triennial assembly of the states. The philosophical works published in Latin by Baron Swedenborg are both numerous and important; but his theological works are said to be still more numerous.

1. The first and principal distinguishing doctrine contained in the writings of Baron Swedenborg, and maintained by his followers, relates to the person and character of Jesus Christ, and to the redemption wrought by that Great Saviour. On this subject, it is insisted, that Jesus Christ is Jehovah, manifested in the flesh, and that he came into the world to glorify his human nature, by making it one with the divine. It is, therefore, insisted further, that the humanity of Jesus Christ is itself divine, by virtue of its indissoluble union with the indwelling Father, agreeably to the testimony of St. Paul, that, 'in Jesus Christ dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily,' (Coloss. ii. 9.); and that thus, as to his humanity, He is the Mediator between God and man, since there is now no other medium of God's access to man, or of man's access to God, but this Divine Humanity, which was assumed for this purpose. Thus it is taught, that in the person of Jesus Christ dwells the whole Trinity of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; the Father constituting the soul of the above humanity, whilst the humanity itself is the Son, and the divine virtue, or operation proceeding from it, is the Holy Spirit, forming altogether one God, just as the soul, the body, and operation of man, form one man.

On the subject of the redemption wrought by this Incarnate God, it is lastly taught, that it consisted not in the vicarious sacrifice of one God, as some conceive, to satisfy the justice, or, as others express it, to appease the wrath of another God, but in the real subjugation of the powers of darkness and their removal from man, by continual combats and victories over them, during his abode in the world; and in the consequent descent to man of Divine power and life, which was brought near to him in the thus glorified humanity of this combating God. The receivers, therefore, of this testimony concerning Jesus Christ, acknowledge no other God but him, and believe that, in approaching his Divine Humanity, they approach at the same time, and have communication with all the fulness of the Godhead, seeing and worshipping the invisible in the visible, agreeably to the tenor of those words of Jesus Christ: 'He that believeth on me, believeth not on me, but on Him that sent me; and he that seeth me, seeth Him that sent me.' (John xii. 44, 45.)

2. The second distinguishing doctrine, taught by the same author, relates to the sacred Scripture, or word of God, which is maintained to be divinely inspired throughout, and consequently to be the repository of the whole will and wisdom of the Most High God. It is, however, insisted, that this will and wisdom are not, in all places, discoverable from the letter or history of the sacred pages, but lie deeply concealed under the letter. For it is taught by the author under consideration, that the sense of the letter of the holy word is the basis, the continent, and the firmament of its spiritual and celestial senses, being written according to the doctrine of correspondencies between things spiritual and things natural; and thus designed by the Most High as the vehicle of communication of the eternal spiritual truths of his kingdom to the minds of men. It is farther endeavoured to be shown, that Jesus Christ spake continually according to this same doctrine, veiling Divine and spiritual truths under natural images, especially in his parables, and thus communicating to man the most important mysteries, relative to himself and his kingdom, under the most beautiful and edifying figures, taken from the natural things of this world. Thus, according to Baron Swedenborg, even the historical parts, both of the Old and New Testament, contain vast stores of important and spiritual wisdom under the outward letter; and this consideration, as he farther asserts, justifies the pages of Divine revelation, even in those parts which, to a common observer, appear trifling, nugatory, and contradictory. It is lastly maintained on this subject, that the sacred Scripture, or word of God, is the only medium of communication and conjunction between God and man, and is likewise the only source of all genuine truth and knowledge respecting God, his kingdom, and operation, and the only sure guide for man's understanding, in whatever relates to his spiritual or eternal concerns.

3. A third distinguishing doctrine, which marks the character of the writings of Baron Swedenborg, is the doctrine relative to life, or to that rule of conduct on the part of man which is truly acceptable to the Deity, and at the same time conducive to man's eternal happiness and salvation, by conjoining him with his God. This rule is taught to be simply this: 'to shun all known evils as sins against God, and at the same time, to love, to cherish, and to practise whatsoever is wise, virtuous, and holy, as being most agreeable to the will of God, and to the spirit of his precepts.' On this subject it is strongly and repeatedly insisted, that evil must of necessity remain with man, and prove his eternal destruction, unless it be removed by sincere repentance, leading him to note what is disorderly in his own mind and life; and, when he has discovered it, to fight resolutely against its influence, in dependence on the aid and grace of Jesus Christ. It is insisted further, that this opposition to evil ought to be grounded on the consideration, that all evil is sin against God, since, if evil be combated from any inferior motive, it is not radically removed, but only concealed, and on that account is even more dangerous and destructive than before. It is added, that when man has done the work of repentance, by shunning his hereditary evils as sins against God, he ought to set himself to the practice of what is wise and good by a faithful, diligent, and conscientious discharge of all the duties of his station; by which means his mind is preserved from a return of the powers of disorder, and kept in the order of heaven, and the fulfilment of the great law of charity. For it is perpetually maintained in the writings of Baron Swedenborg, that the essence of charity consists in man's loving his neighbour as himself, and that its principal operation consists in every one's discharging the relative duties which he owes to society, by acting uprightly, and in the fear of God, in his particular employment, whether it be that of a priest, a judge, a soldier, a gentleman, a merchant, or a mechanic.

4. A fourth distinguishing doctrine, inculcated in the same writings, is the doctrine of Co-operation, on the part of man, with the Divine Grace or agency of Jesus Christ. On this subject it is insisted, that man ought not indolently to hang down his hands, under the idle expectation that God will do every thing for him in the way of Purification and Regeneration, without any exertion of his own; but that he is bound by the above law of co-operation, to exert himself, as if the whole progress of his purification and regeneration depended entirely on his own exertions; yet, in exerting himself, he is continually to recollect, and humbly to acknowledge, that all his power to do so is from above, agreeably to the declaration of Jesus Christ, 'Without Me ye can do nothing.' (John xv. 5.) He is therefore bound, according to this law, to enter freely on the great work of self-examination, and with the same freedom to reject the evils which such examination discovers to his view; and also to fulfil freely the duties of his station, of what kind soever they be. This law is shown to be grounded on these two distinct considerations: first, the consideration of the freedom with which man is perpetually invested, either to work with God, or to work against him; and, secondly, the consideration, that all conjunction between God and man must needs be reciprocal, or mutual, agreeably to those words of Jesus Christ, where he says, 'Abide in me, and I in you.' (John xv. 4.) It is therefore shown that, without perpetual freedom on the part of man, he would not be a man, but a machine, and consequently incapable of living in conjunction with his Heavenly Father. It is further shown, that, to effect this conjunction, it is not sufficient that Jesus Christ be in the will and purpose to accomplish it, or that he abides in his disciples, but it is necessary also that his disciples be mutually on their part in the will and purpose to accomplish it also, or that they should reciprocally abide in Him. Lastly, it is insisted, on this interesting subject, that the doctrine of co-operation supplies no ground for the establishment of man's merit and independence on the divine aid, since it is continually taught in the writings in question, that all man's freedom, as well as all his power of co-operation, is the perpetual gift of the most merciful and gracious God, and consequently that all merit, properly so called, belongs to Jesus Christ alone, and nothing at all to man.

5. A fifth, and last distinguishing doctrine, taught in the theological writings of our author, relates to man's connexion with the other world, and its various inhabitants. On this subject it is insisted, not only from the authority of the sacred Scriptures, but also from the experience of the author himself, that every man is in continual association with angels and spirits, and that without such association he could not possibly think, or exert any living faculty. It is insisted further, that man, according to his life in the world, takes up his eternal abode, either with angels of light, or with the spirits of darkness; with the former, if he is wise to live according to the precepts of God's holy word, or with the latter, if, through folly and transgression, he rejects the counsel and guidance of the Most High.

Some other peculiar doctrines of lesser importance might be enlarged on in this place, if it were deemed necessary; such as the doctrine concerning the human soul, as being in an human form; concerning the marriage of the good and the true, as existing in the holy word, and in all things in nature; of the Divine Providence, as extending to things most minute respecting man and the world which he inhabits; concerning the earths in the universe, by which it is taught that all the planets in our system, and in other systems, unconnected with our sun, are inhabited by human beings.

In London, and some of the other cities and great towns in England, places of public worship have been opened, for the express purpose of preaching the preceding doctrines, and of offering up supplications to the Divine Being, and celebrating his praises. In all such places particular forms of prayer have been adopted in agreement with the ideas of the worshippers, as grounded in the religious sentiments above stated, especially respecting the supreme object of adoration, who is acknowledged to be the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, in his Divine Humanity. But in no place have any peculiar rites and ceremonies been introduced, the worshippers being content with retaining the celebration of the two sacraments of Baptism and the Holy Supper, since no other rites are insisted on by the author whose testimony they receive. It is believed by a large majority of those receivers, that it was never his intention that any particular sect should be formed upon his doctrines, but that all who receive them, whether in the establishment, or in any other communion of Christians, should be at perfect liberty, either to continue in their former communion, or to quit it, as their conscience dictates. England appears to be the country where the preceding doctrines have been most generally received; yet there are numerous readers of those doctrines both in Wales, Ireland, France, Germany, Denmark, Sweden, Russia; and also in America, and the West India Islands.

It appears that Baron Swedenborg had many theological eccentricities, but perhaps the most remarkable circumstance respecting him was his asserting, that, during the uninterrupted period of twenty-seven years, he enjoyed open intercourse with the world of departed spirits, and, during that time, was instructed in the internal sense of the sacred Scriptures, hitherto undiscovered. This is a correspondence, to which few or no writers, before or since his time, ever pretended, if we except the Arabian Prophet. Adam's Religious World Displayed, vol. iii. pp. 393—415.

SYCAMORE, a tree called the Egyptian fig-tree; its name is composed of Sycos, a fig-tree, and Moros, a mulberry-tree. It is like the mulberry-tree in its leaves, and the fig-tree in its fruit. This fruit grows sticking against the trunk of the tree. It does not grow ripe till rubbed with iron combs, after which rubbing it ripens in four days. Amos expresses this when he says, 'I was no prophet, neither was I a prophet's son, but I was an herdsman, and gatherer of sycamore fruit, or wild figs.' See FIG-TREE.

SYNAGOGUE. This Greek word signifies either an assembly, or the place in which an assembly meets. In the first sense it is commonly understood of the church of the Jews, compared, or opposed, to that of the Christians. St. John, (Rev. ii. 9.; iii. 9.) speaking of false professors, calls them the synagogue of Satan.

Synagogue, however, commonly signifies a building where the Jews assembled, to pray, to read, and to hear the reading of holy books, and other instructions. It is often mentioned in the Gospels, and in the Acts, because Jesus Christ, and his apostles, generally frequented and preached in the synagogues. The origin of these synagogues is not very well known. Some learned men have thought them a late institution. Dr. Prideaux affirms, that they had no synagogues before the Babylonish captivity; for the chief service of the synagogue, says he, being the reading of the law to the people, where there was no book of the law to be read, there certainly was no synagogue. How rare the book of the law was throughout all Judea before the Babylonish captivity, many texts of Scripture inform us. When Jehoshaphat sent teachers through all Judea, to instruct the people in the law of God, they carried a book of the law with them. (2 Chron. xvii. 9.) This they needed not have done, if there had been any copies of the law in those cities to which they went; and certainly there would have been, had there been any synagogues in them. When Hilkiah found the law in the temple, (2 Kings xxii. 8.) their behaviour on that occasion seems to prove they had never seen it before; which could not have been, had there been any other copies of it among the people. If there were no copies of the law at that time among them, there could then be no synagogues to resort to, for the hearing of it read. Hence Dr. Prideaux concludes that there could be no synagogues among the Jews, till after the Babylonish captivity. As to Psalm lxxiv. 8. 'They have burnt up all the synagogues of God in the land,' or all 'the assemblies of God,' as the original may be translated, our learned author acknowledges it must be understood of places where the people assembled to worship God. But this does not infer that these places were synagogues, and there are none of the ancient versions, except that of Aquila, which so renders this passage. Those who lived at a distance from the temple, or from the tabernacle, before the temple was built, not being able at all times to resort thither, they built courts like those in which they prayed at the tabernacle, and at the temple, in which to offer up their prayers to God, and which in succeeding times we find called by the name 'proseuchæ.' Into one of them our Saviour is said to have gone to pray, and to have continued in it a whole night. (Luke vi. 12.) What our English version renders, 'and continued all night in prayer to God,' is in the original καὶ ἦν διανυκτερεύων ἐν τῇ προσευχῇ τοῦ Θεοῦ; that is, 'and he continued all night in a proseucha of God.' These proseuchæ differed from synagogues in several particulars. In synagogues the prayers were offered up in public forms in common for the whole congregation; in the proseuchæ every one prayed apart by himself, as in the temple. The synagogues were covered houses; but the proseuchæ were open courts. The former were all built within the cities, to which they belonged; the latter, without the cities, and commonly upon an elevated place.

Some, however, are of opinion, that there were synagogues in more early times. Dr. Jennings observes, that the passage in Psalm lxxiv. 8. not only appears to be properly translated synagogues, where the people were stately to meet for divine worship; but that the words col and baarets, 'all' the synagogues of God 'in the land' being added, prevent our understanding this expression, as some do, only of the temple, and the holy places belonging to it at Jerusalem. He also takes notice, that St. James speaks of Moses being read in the synagogues of 'old time.' (Acts xv. 21.) However, the dispute, he says, may perhaps be compromised, if we allow that the custom of erecting those sorts of chapels in later ages called synagogues, and appropriated to public worship alone, first began after the return from the captivity; and that in former times, from their first settlement in the land of Canaan, the people used to meet either in the open air, or in dwelling-houses, particularly in the houses of the prophets, (2 Kings iv. 23.) or in any other place or building convenient for the purpose.

In the midst of the synagogue was a desk or pulpit, on which the book, or roll, of the law was read very solemnly. There likewise he stood who intended to harangue the people. At the highest part of the synagogue, towards the east, and over against the door, which is always west, as far as can well be, is the chest or press, wherein the book, or roll of the law, is kept, wrapped up in fine embroidered cloth. The women are distinct from the men, and seated in a gallery enclosed with lattices; so that they may see and hear, but not be seen.

Every synagogue has its chief, or perhaps several chiefs and officers, according to the circumstances of places. One is called chazan, who appoints and chants the prayers. Another who keeps the keys, and is a kind of church-warden, they call sciamas, or servant. The ruler of the synagogue presides in the assemblies, and in judicial affairs, which are sometimes here decided, against those who have given any scandal, and transgressed the law in any important matter; the same presidents invite those to speak in the synagogue, whom they think capable of it, and offer that honour to strangers, if there be any who seem to have the gift of speaking. Thus our Saviour often spoke in the assemblies; and St. Paul, being at Antioch in Pisidia, was invited by the rulers of the synagogue, to address them for their edification. (Luke iv. 16. Matt. iv. 23.; ix. 35.; et passim; Acts xiii. 13, 14, 15.)

The Jewish authors gave this general rule for the construction of synagogues. Wherever there are ten Batelnim a synagogue ought to be built. The signification of the word Batelnim, has been controverted. Buxtorf thinks them to be persons receiving a stipend for duly assisting at divine service, that there may be always ten persons, at least, to assemble together. Lightfoot imagines them to have been ministers and officers of the synagogue.

It is affirmed that in the city of Jerusalem alone were nearly five hundred synagogues. Every trading fraternity had one of their own, and even strangers built some for their own nation. Hence (Acts vi. 9.) we find the synagogues of the Alexandrians, of the Asiatics, of the Cilicians, of the Libertines, of those of Cyrene, erected for such inhabitants of these cities, or nations, as should be at Jerusalem. Prideaux's Connection, part i. book vi. pp. 547, 555, 556; Jennings's Jewish Antiquities, book ii. chap. ii.

SYR'ACUSE Συρακοῦσαι, signifies that draws violently. Syracuse was a famous city of Sicily, seated on the east side of that island, with a fine prospect from every entrance both by sea and land. This city, whilst in its splendour, was the largest and richest the Greeks possessed in any part of the world. St. Paul went ashore at this city, in his way to Rome, and continued there three days. (Acts xxviii. 12.) Thence he went to Rhegium.

SYR'IA, אַרַם, Syria, Syria, or Mesopotamia, signifies sublime, or that deceives. Syria, in Hebrew (Gen. x. 22.) אַרַם, Aram, from the name of the patriarch who peopled the chief provinces of it. See ARAM. The Arameans, or Syrians, possessed Mesopotamia, Chaldea, and part of Armenia. Syria, properly so called, comprehended between Euphrates east, the Mediterranean west, Celicia north, Phenicia, Judea, and Arabia Deserta, south. Syria of the two rivers, or Mesopotamia; Syria of Damascus; Syria of Zobah; Syria of Maachah; Syria of Reboah, &c. were only so many different provinces of Syria, denominated from their situation with respect to these rivers, or cities. See ARAM, MESOPOTAMIA, DAMASCUS, and CÆLO-SYRIA.

Syria, without any other appellation, stands for the kingdom of Syria, of which Antioch became the capital after the reign of the Seleucidæ. Before that time it was very rare to find the name of Syria used by itself. The provinces of Syria were generally expressed by the addition of the city which was the capital of the province.

Syria was at first governed by its own kings, each of whom reigned in his own city and territories. David subdued them about the year of the world 2960, (2 Sam. viii. 6.); and again in 2969, on occasion of his war against the Ammonites, to whom the Syrians gave assistance. (2 Sam. x. 6, 8, 13, 18, 19.) They continued in subjection till after the reign of Solomon, when they shook off the yoke, and could not be reduced again, till the time of Jeroboam II. king of Israel, in the year of the world 3179. Rezin king of Syria, and Pekah king of Israel, having declared war against Ahab king of Judah, this prince found himself under a necessity of calling to his assistance Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, who put Rezin to death, took Damascus, and transported the Syrians out of their country to beyond the Euphrates. From that time Syria continued in subjection to the kings of Assyria. Afterwards it came under the dominion of the Chaldeans; then under that of the Persians; lastly, it was reduced by Alexander the Great, and was subject to all the revolutions that happened to the great empires of the East.

The present inhabitants, says Volney, who, according to the constant practice of the Arabs, have not adopted the Greek names, are ignorant of the name of Syria, instead of which they call it Barr el Sham, which signifies country of the left; and is the name given to the whole space contained between two lines, drawn, the one from Alexandretta to the Euphrates, and the other from Gaza to the desert of Arabia, bounded on the east by that desert, and on the west by the Mediterranean. This name 'country of the left,' from its contrast with that of the Yamin, or 'country of the right,' indicates some intermediate place as a common point, which must be Mecca.

The plains of Acre, Esdraelon, Sour, Havalah, and the lower Bekaa, are justly boasted of for their fertility. Corn, barley, maize, cotton, and sesamum, produce, notwithstanding the imperfection of their culture, twenty and twenty-five for one. The country of Kaisaria possesses a forest of oaks, the only one in Syria. Safad furnishes cottons, which, from their whiteness, are held in as high estimation as those of Cyprus. The neighbouring mountains of Sour produce as good tobacco as that of Latakia, and in a part of them is made a perfume of cloves, which is reserved exclusively for the use of the Sultan and his women. The country of the Druses abounds in wine and silks: in short, from the situation of the coast, and the number of its creeks, this Pachalic necessarily becomes the emporium of Damascus, and all the interior parts of Syria.

On the most remote parts of Carmel are found wild vines and olive trees, which must have been conveyed thither by the hand of man: and in the Lebanon of the Druses and Maronites, the rocks, now abandoned to fir-trees, and to brambles, present us, in a thousand places, with terraces, which prove they were anciently better cultivated, and, consequently, much more populous than in our days. Volney's Travels, vol. i. p. 288; vol. ii. pp. 180—368.

SYRO-PHENICIA, is Phenicia properly so called, of which Sidon, or Zidon, was the capital; which, having by right of conquest been united to the kingdom of Syria, added its old name Phenicia to that of Syria: the Canaanitish woman is called a Syro-Phenician, (Mark vii. 26.) because she was of Phenicia, which was then considered as making part of Syria. St. Matthew calls her a Canaanitish woman, (Matt. xv. 22, 24.) because this country was really peopled by the Canaanites, Sidon being the eldest son of Canaan. (Gen. x. 15.)

TAB

TABERNACLE; in Latin, tabernaculum; in Greek σκηνη, scene; in Hebrew אהל ohel; which properly signifies a tent. The patriarchs lived in tents, or tabernacles. In the camp of Israel, under Moses, were two tabernacles: the first, the tent of the congregation, was that in which the people assembled for dispatch of their ordinary secular affairs. The other was the tent of testimony, or the tabernacle of the Lord, or simply, the tabernacle. Here the Israelites, while in the wilderness, performed religious exercises, offered sacrifices, worship, &c.

This tabernacle was an oblong square, thirty cubits in length; ten in breadth; ten in height. It was divided into two parts. The first was called the holy place; twenty cubits long, and ten wide. In this were placed the table of shew-bread, the golden candlestick, and the golden altar of incense. The second was the sanctuary, or holy of holies, whose length was ten cubits, and breadth the same. In this was the ark of the covenant. The sanctuary was divided from the holy place by a curtain, or veil, of very rich cloth, which hung on four pillars of shittim-wood, covered with plates of gold. The holy place was also closed in front by a veil, hung on five pillars of shittim-wood, overlaid with plates of gold, their bases being of brass.

On the west, north, and south sides, the tabernacle was inclosed by boards, or planks, of shittim-wood, overlaid with plates of gold, having bases of brass. These boards were eight in number on the west side, but twenty on the north and south sides. They were all ten cubits high, and in breadth each was a cubit and a-half. They were let into each other, by two tenons above and below. And as the whole of the tabernacle was movable, and might be taken down, these boards were carried by two bases, in which were two mortice-holes, by which they were joined together. To support them, each had five golden rings, at proper distances, through which were passed five poles of shittim-wood, covered with plates of gold, which supported the whole.

The tabernacle had no window. It was covered by several curtains; the first, on the inside, was of the colour of hyacinth, striped with purple, scarlet, and crimson. Over this were others of goats' hair, which hindered the rain from penetrating, and preserved the rich curtains. There were none of these curtains in front, but only on the sides and behind, so that at the entrance of the tabernacle, the first rich curtain afore-mentioned might be seen, which enclosed the whole front. Over these veils of goats' hair were two others; one of sheep-skins dyed red, the other of sheep-skins dyed azure-blue.

Around the tabernacle was a large oblong court, in length an hundred cubits, in breadth fifty. This space was encompassed by pillars overlaid with plates of silver, with capitals of silver, but their bases of brass. There were ten pillars to the west, six to the east, twenty to the north, and twenty to the south. On these pillars hung curtains made of twined linen-thread, or net-work, which surrounded the tabernacle; except at the entrance of the court, which was closed by another curtain of richer materials, having embroidered work of hyacinth, purple, and scarlet. This entrance was twenty cubits wide; the curtain was of the same length, and was sustained by four pillars overlaid with plates of silver, whose capitals and bases were of brass.

In this court, and opposite to the entrance of the tabernacle, or holy place, stood the altar of burnt-offerings, on which were burned all the sacrifices. Here was also water for the uses of the priests. The laity brought their victims as far as the altar: there they were killed, skinned, and offered to the Lord, according to their several rites and ceremonies.

The entrance of the tabernacle looked east; the sanctuary west; and the two sides, north and south. This tent was, as it were, the dwelling of the God of Israel, who was considered as residing in the midst of the camp. Round about it were encamped the tribes: Judah, Zebulun, and Issachar, to the east; Ephraim, Benjamin, and Manasseh, to the west; Dan, Asher, and Naphtali, to the north. Reuben, Simeon, and Gad, to the south. The tribe of Levi, being entirely employed in sacred service, were placed all round the tabernacle; Moses and Aaron were to the east, the family of Gershon, west, that of Merari, north, and that of Kohath, south.

The priests entered the holy place every morning to offer incense; and to put out the lamps; and every evening they went in to light them again. Every morning and evening they offered a lamb for a burnt sacrifice on the brazen altar.

The tabernacle of the covenant was erected and consecrated at the foot of Mount Sinai, the first day of the first month of the second year after the coming out of Egypt, in the year of the world 2514.

Spencer has endeavoured to prove that this tabernacle, the ark, the cherubim, &c., were imitations of the worship of the Egyptians and other idolatrous people, to their gods; and that the Lord appointed them to his people out of pure condescension; designing to stop their strong inclination for idolatry, by sanctifying these customs and correcting them; by cutting off all such practices as were impious, superstitious, or idolatrous, with which the pagans had polluted them.

He undertakes to prove this opinion by a comparison between these and the portable temples of the heathen, and of the tents in which they enclosed what was most sacred and venerable in their religion. It is certain the Gentiles carried their gods with them in their journeys, and in processions on the shoulders of their priests. Virgil speaks of the Trojan deities carried by Æneas in his travels:

Errantesque Deos, agitataque numina Trojæ.

Tabernacle is also used in Scripture to denote 1. 'a house or dwelling,' (Job xi. 14; xxii. 23.); 2. Christ's human nature, of which the Jewish tabernacle was a type, in which God dwells really, substantially, and personally, (Heb. viii. 2.; ix. 11.); 3. our natural body, in which the soul lodges, as in a tabernacle. (2 Cor. v. 1, 4. 2 Pet. i. 13, &c.)

The feast of TABERNACLES; in Hebrew the feast of tents, (Lev. xxiii. 42, 43, 44.) because it was kept under green tents, or arbours, in memory of their dwelling in tents in the passage through the wilderness. It was one of the three great solemnities of the Hebrews, in which all the males were obliged to appear before the Lord. It was celebrated after harvest, on the fifteenth of Tisri; which was the first month of the civil year, and answers to September. In this they returned thanks to God for the fruits of the earth then gathered in. (Exod. xxiii. 16.) The feast continued eight days; but the first day and the last were the most solemn. (Lev. xxiii. 34, 35, &c.) It was not allowed to do any labour on this feast, and particularly sacrifices were offered in it.

The first day of the feast they cut down branches of the handsomest trees, with their fruit; branches of palm-trees, or such as were fullest of leaves, and boughs of the willow-trees that grew by water-courses.

The neatest of these branches they carried in ceremony to the synagogue, where they performed what they called Lulab, that is, holding in their right hand a branch of a palm-tree, three branches of myrtle, and two of willow, tied together; and having in their left hand a branch of a citron with its fruit; they brought them together waving them towards the four quarters of the world, and singing certain songs. These branches were also called Hosanna, because they cried Hosanna! not unlike what the Jews did at our Saviour's entry into Jerusalem. (Matt. xxi. 8, 9.) On the eighth day they performed this ceremony oftener, and with greater solemnity than on the other days of the feast; wherefore they called this day Hosanna Rabbah, or the great Hosanna.

The Jews acquaint us, that every Israelite on the feast day, in the morning, was obliged to bring these branches of trees, on penalty of fasting all that day. Then they made a procession round the altar of burnt-offerings, shaking their branches, and singing. At present, they carry these branches into the synagogue, and provide themselves with oranges and citrons, in countries where they do not grow. They make it a part of their ceremony to take a turn round the desk in the middle of the synagogue, once a day at least; and they eat nothing till they have done this.

The first day of the feast, besides the ordinary sacrifices, they offered as a burnt-offering thirteen calves, two rams, and fourteen lambs; with offerings of flour, and libations of wine. They offered, also, a goat for a sin-offering. (Numb. xxix. 12, 13, 14, &c.)

The second day they offered twelve calves, two rams, and fourteen lambs, for a burnt-offering, with their offerings of flour, oil, and wine. They offered, also, a goat for a sin-offering; and this besides the ordinary morning and evening sacrifices, which were never interrupted, nor those offered by the Israelites from private devotion, or for expiation of sin. These we now mention were offered in the name of the whole people of Israel. On the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh days of the feast were offered the same sacrifices as on the second day; with this difference, that every day they diminished from the former by one calf, so that on the third day they offered eleven, on the fourth ten, on the fifth nine, on the sixth eight, and on the seventh only seven. But the eighth day, which was kept with the greatest solemnity, they offered but one calf, one ram, and seven lambs for a burnt-offering; and one goat for a sin-offering; with the other accustomed offerings and libations.

We are assured, that on the eighth day of the feast, the Jews presented at the temple the first fruits of their later crop, that is, of such things as were the slowest in coming to maturity; that they drew water out of the pool of Siloam, which was brought into the temple, and being first mingled with wine, was poured out by the priests at the foot of the altar of burnt-offerings. Perhaps, sometimes, 'blood and water' might flow together. The people, in the mean time, sang these words of the prophet, (Isaiah xii. 3.) 'Therefore with joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation.'

Leo of Modena tells us, that the modern Jews, not having the opportunity of going to the temple, nor of performing the ceremonies prescribed by Moses, make each for himself, in some open place, a bower, or arbour of branches of trees, hung around, and adorned as much as they can. Here they eat and drink, and some even lie; at least they pass as much time here as they used to pass in their houses, and this during the whole eight days of the festival. Sickness or old age is dispensed with from this ceremony; and when it rains very hard they retire to their houses; for these bowers are not made to keep out the weather.

TABI'THA, טַבִּיטָּה, Taḇiṭṭā, or Dorcas; signifies wild goat, or kid. The Syriac word Tabitha signifies clear-sighted. Tabitha was a Christian widow who lived at Joppa, who abounded in alms-deeds and other good works. She fell sick A.D. 40, of which sickness she died; after she had been washed, as customary, she was laid out on a table in an upper chamber, in order to be put into her coffin; and it being known that St. Peter was at Lydda, which was not far from Joppa, he was desired to come over. He soon came, and was conducted to the chamber where the corpse lay: the widows presented themselves to him weeping, and showed the clothes that Tabitha had made for them. Peter caused all to go out, betook himself to prayer, and turning to the body said, Tabitha, arise; she immediately opened her eyes, and, seeing Peter, sat up. Then he called the saints and widows, and presented Tabitha to them. (Acts ix. 36.)

TABLES of the law, given to Moses on mount Sinai; they were written by the finger of God; and contained the ten commandments. (Exod. xx.)

Many questions have been started about these tables, their matter, their form, their number, who wrote them, and what they contained. Some oriental authors, says D'Herbelot, make them ten in number, others seven; but the Hebrews reckon only two. Some suppose them to have been of wood, others of precious stone. Moses observes, that these tables were written on both sides. Many think they were transparent, so that they might be read through; on one side towards the right, and on the other side towards the left. Others, that the law-giver makes this observation, because generally, in writing tables, they only wrote on one side. Others thus translate, 'they were written on the two parts that were contiguous to each other:’ because, being shut upon one another, the two faces on which was the writing touched one another, so that no writing was seen on the outside. Some think the ten commandments were written on each of the two tables; others, that the ten were divided; five on one table, and five on the other. Some make the tables to have been of ten or twelve cubits in length.

Moses says that the tables were written by the finger of God. These words are diversely explained: some understand them literally, that they were written by the operation of God himself; others understand it by the ministry of an angel; others of the Spirit of God. Others explain it by an order of God to Moses to write them: this opinion may be maintained from Exod. xxxiv. 27, 28. where, speaking of the second tables which God gave to Moses, God orders him to write the words of the covenant which he had made with Israel; and a little after, Moses relates that he had written the words of the covenant upon tables. In the same chapter it is said, that he hewed other two tables like the former which he had broken. From hence some have concluded, that the second tables were not written by the hand of God, though the first were. But Moses, (Deut. x. 4.) repeating what had been said of the second tables that God gave him, takes express notice that God himself had written them. Whence it follows, that neither was writ by the finger of God, or that both were so written. But it is sufficient, that God inspired Moses, and by his Spirit enabled him to write them, in order to give authority to his words; and it is needless to have recourse to a new miracle.

TAB’OR, תבור, signifies separate. Tabor, or Thabor, is a mountain of Galilee, called by the Greeks, Ithaburius, or Athaburius. Eusebius says it was on the frontiers of Zebulun, in the middle of Galilee, ten miles from Diocæsarea, east; it was also in the confines of Issachar and Naphtali. Joshua (xix. 22.) puts it on the borders of Issachar. Tabor, in Hebrew, signifies an eminence, and the navel; because this mountain rises up in the midst of a wide champaign country, called the Valley of Jezreel, or the Great Plain. Josephus says, that the height of Tabor is thirty stadia, and that there is a plain on the top of it, of twenty-six stadia in circumference, surrounded with walls, and inaccessible on the north side.

‘Mount Tabor,’ says D’Arvieux, ‘is a single mountain, separate from all others; there are several near it on the north, but they are smaller than Tabor. Its shape is round, almost conical, like a low sugar loaf. It appears to be a full mile in height, and half a league in diameter. It is entirely covered with green oaks, and other trees, shrubs, and odoriferous plants. Roads and paths are made on the south side of the mountain, which lead to the top of it, by windings; and are sufficiently easy to admit of riding up to it. I chose this mode of ascent, leaving to those more devout the liberty of walking up the mountain, which they did, while our Arabs took charge of their horses and mules.

‘To a person standing at the foot of the mountain, it appears to terminate in a point; but when arrived at the top, we were astonished to find a plain which has full 3000 paces in circumference, full of noble trees. In this plain is a great inclosure of ruined walls, with remains of towers, and a ditch, partly filled up, which show that here has been a considerable castle, in the middle of which was a square place of arms, with cisterns, baths, cellars, &c. the vaults of which have resisted the injury of time.

‘There is a small height on the eastern side, which is the place where, according to tradition, our Lord was transfigured. St. Helena built a handsome church in this place, in memory of that event. That building having been ruined, it is replaced by another, which is apparently posterior, and may be of the time of the Crusades. It has three little chapels, beside each other: they appear to be in a grotto or cave, but the whole is encumbered with ruins. We found the door-way filled up, but caused it to be cleared by our Arabs, and we entered a small passage, which led into a little vestibule, composed of four arcades, crossing each other, the first of which was the entry. That in front of the entry was the place where our Lord was, and is called his tabernacle; those on each side of him are called the tabernacles of Moses and Elias. Each of them has an altar, at which the religious who were in our company said mass the following day, while our servants, armed, kept guard at the entry, to prevent surprise from the Arabs, or the people of the country, who take care of the flocks of goats which feed on this plain, or who come here in chase after the wild boars which feed on the acorns that fall from the trees. We afterwards walked about this delicious plain; the air was fresh and serene, and perfumed with the fragrance of the aromatic plants growing all around.’ Sacred Geography.

TAD’MOR, תדמור, signifies admirable, wonderful. Tadmor was a city of Syria, built by king Solomon. It was situated in a wilderness of Syria, on the borders of Arabia Deserta, towards the Euphrates. Josephus places it two days’ journey from the Upper Syria, one day’s journey from the Euphrates, and six days’ journey from Babylon. He says there is no water in the wilderness but in this place. At this day there are vast ruins of this city. There is nothing more magnificent in the whole east. There are a great number of inscriptions, most of which are Greek, the others in Palmyrenean characters. Nothing relating to the Jews is seen in the Greek inscriptions; and the Palmyrenean inscriptions are entirely unknown, as well as the language and the characters of that country.

The city of Palmyra preserved the name of Tadmor to the time of Alexander. It then received the name of Palmyra, which it preserved for several ages. About the middle of the third century it became famous, because Odenatus and Zenobia his queen made it the seat of their empire. When the Saracens became masters of the East, they restored its ancient name of Tadmor, which it has always preserved since. Its situation is much like that of Ammon in Libya, being in the midst of deserts; a kind of island in the main land, amidst an ocean of sand, and surrounded by sandy deserts on all sides. Its situation between two powerful empires, that of the Parthians to the east, and that of the Romans to the west, exposed it often to danger from their quarrels. But in time of peace it soon recovered itself, by its trade with both empires. For the caravans of Persia and of the Indies, which now unload at Aleppo, then used to stop at Palmyra. From hence they carried the merchandises of the East, which came to them by land, to the ports of the Mediterranean; and returned the merchandises of the West after the same manner. It is surprising that history gives no account, either when, or by whom, Palmyra was reduced to its present condition.

Volney says, that remote from every great road, it seems neither to have been calculated for a considerable mart of commerce, nor the centre of a great consumption. It overcame, however, every obstacle; and may be adduced as a proof of what popular opinion may effect in the hands of an able legislature, or when favoured by happy circumstances. Volney's Travels, vol. ii. p. 303; Sacred Geography.

TAHAPANES, תַּהַפָּנִיס, or Taphnis, signifies secret temptation, hidden flight, covered standard. Tahapanes, Tahpanhes, or Taphnis, a city of Egypt. Jeremiah speaks of it, and we are told he was buried there. (Jer. ii. 16.; xliii. 7, 8, 9.; xlv. 1.; xlv. 14.) It is thought to be the same as Daphnæ Pelusiæ, sixteen miles from Pelusium, south, according to the itinerary of Antoninus. Jeremiah, and the Israelites with him, retired to Taphnis, where the Lord revealed to Jeremiah that Nebuchadnezzar should take this city, and should set up his throne in the very place where the prophet had hid stones. (Jer. xliii. 7, 8, 9.) This was then a royal city.

TALENT. The weight of the Jewish talent, according to Dr. Arbuthnot, was 113 pounds, 10 ounces, 1 pennyweight, and 10½ grains, of our troy weight. Its value in English money was 342*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.* The talent of gold was of the same weight, and its value was 54,752*l.* sterling.

Mr. Bruce seems to be of opinion, that the talents appropriated to different commodities might be of different weights; and if a talent could be discovered, which, at the mine, was of less weight than the talent of Judea, perhaps we might be justified in estimating the riches in gold of David, or of Solomon, by the weight of that talent.

'David,' says that traveller, 'took possession of two ports, Eloth and Eziongeber, (1 Kings ix. 26. 2 Chron. viii. 17.) from which he carried on the trade to Ophir and Tarshish, to a very great extent, to the day of his death. We are struck with astonishment when we reflect upon the sum that prince received in so short a time from these mines of Ophir. For what is said to be given by king David, (1 Chron. xxii. 14, 15, 19.; xxix. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7.) (three thousand Hebrew talents of gold, reduced to our money is, twenty-one millions, six hundred thousand pounds, sterling,) and his princes, for the building of the temple of Jerusalem, exceeds in value eight hundred millions of our money, if the talent there spoken of is a Hebrew talent, and not a weight of the same denomination, the value of which was less, and peculiarly reserved for and used in the traffic of these precious metals, gold and silver. The value of a Hebrew talent appears from Exodus (xxxviii. 25, 26.) For 603,550 persons being taxed at half a shekel each, they must have paid in the whole 301,774; now that sum is said to amount to 100 talents, 775 shekels only; deduct the two latter sums, and there will remain 300,000, which divided by 100, will leave 3000 shekels for each of these talents. This talent was probably an African or Indian weight, proper to the same mine whence was gotten the gold, appropriated to fine commodities only, as is the case with our ounce troy, different from the avoirdupois.' Supplement. Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary of the Holy Bible.

TALMUD, תַּלְמוּד, signifies to teach. The Talmud is a collection of the doctrines of the religion and morality of the Jews. They have two works that bear this name: the first is called the Talmud of Jerusalem, and the other the Talmud of Babylon. Each of these is composed of two parts, the Mishna and the Gemara.

The Talmud of Jerusalem is shorter and more obscure than that of Babylon, but it is of an older date. The Talmud which was compiled at Babylon, the Jews prefer to that of Jerusalem, as it is clearer and more extensive.

The Talmud of Jerusalem, and the Mishna, after the Chaldee paraphrases of Onkelos, and of Jonathan, are the most ancient books of doctrine the Jews have, except the sacred authors. Lightfoot has derived a great deal of light from them, for explaining many passages of the New Testament, by comparing the expressions of the Mishna with those of the apostles and evangelists. Maimonides has made an extract, or abridgment of the Talmud of Babylon, which, in the judgment of the most knowing, is preferable to the Talmud itself; for he omits what is fabulous, childish, or useless, and collects only the decisions of cases, with which that great work abounds.

TAMAR, תמר, signifies palm, or palm-tree, TAMAR, or Thamar, was daughter-in-law to the patriarch Judah, wife of Er and Onan, and mother to Pharez and Zarah. The Scripture says, that Er was very wicked before the Lord, for which the Lord slew him. (Gen. xxxviii. 7.)

Judah then said to Onan, his second son, 'Go in unto thy brother's wife, and marry her, and raise up seed unto thy brother.' Onan took her in obedience to his father's command; but knowing that the children born from this marriage would not belong to him, but to his brother, he withheld from Tamar the means of becoming a mother. Therefore the Lord slew him also. Judah said then to Tamar, 'Remain a widow at thy father's house till Shelah my son be grown;' for he was afraid that Shelah also might die, as his brothers did. Tamar therefore lived with her father a considerable time, yet did not receive Shelah as her husband. Some years after, when Judah went to a sheep-shearing feast of his friend Hirah, the Adullamite, Tamar being informed of it, disguised herself as an harlot, and sat in a place where Judah would pass. Judah went in unto her, and gave her, as pledges, his ring, his bracelets, and his staff.

After some months her pregnancy began to show; Judah, being informed of it, would have had her burned alive. But when she produced the ring, the bracelets, and the staff, and said she was with child by him who owned those pledges, Judah acknowledged that she was more just than he had been. She had twins; of whom one was Pharez, the other Zarah. This happened about the year of the world 2277.

TAMAR, daughter of David and Maachah, and sister of Absalom, by courtesy reckoned among the king's children. (1 Chron. iii. 9.) Her extraordinary beauty was the occasion of her brother Amnon's falling desperately in love with her, dishonouring her, then hating her, and forcibly expelling her. Tamar strewed ashes on her head, rent her clothes, and covering her face with her hands, went homeward weeping. Absalom, her brother, by the same mother, met her in this distress, took her to his own house, bid her be quiet, and leave revenge to him. In fact, he kept the resentment of this injury so much in his heart, that he killed

Amnon some time after. See ABSALOM and AMNON.

TAM'MUZ, תמוז, signifies abstruse, concealed. Tammuz was a Pagan deity, thought to be the same as Adonis. Lucian, in his book of the Syrian goddess, gives us the following account of the ceremonious worship of this deity. 'The Syrians affirm, that what the boar is reported to have done against Adonis, was transacted in their country, and in memory of this accident, they, every year, beat themselves, and lament, and celebrate frantic rites, and great wallings are appointed throughout the country. After they have beaten themselves, and lamented, they first perform funeral obsequies to Adonis, as to one dead; and afterwards, on a following day, they feign that he is alive, and ascended into the air [or heaven], and shave their heads, as the Egyptians do at the death of Apis; and whatever women will not consent to be shaved, are obliged, by way of punishment, to prostitute themselves once to strangers, and the money they thus earn is consecrated to Venus.' Hence we may discern the flagrant iniquity committed, and that which was further to be expected, among the Jewish women who sat weeping for Tammuz, that is, Adonis. (Ezekiel viii. 14.)

A late writer asks, 'to what did the worship of Adonis refer?' Various have been the opinions on this subject. Most have thought the death of Adonis referred to the loss, or diminution, of the sun's effulgence, during the winter half year; and the resurrection of Adonis, the sun's return in spring. I cannot, however, wholly rest in this: 1. Because, the time of the year, the fifth day of the sixth month, August or September, is not remarkable for any diminution of solar light, and certainly not for total loss of solar heat. 2. Because the worship of the sun was, in my opinion, accidental, not primary. 3. Other ceremonies may give us light on this, and may lead us to a different opinion. According to Julius Firmicus, on a certain night, while the solemnity in honour of Adonis lasted, an image was laid in a bed, or rather on a bier; that is, as if it were a dead body; and great lamentation was made over it: but, after a proper time spent in this sorrow—light, a lamp, or candle, was brought in, and the priest, anointing the mouths of the assistants, whispered to them with a soft voice, as Godwin says, 'Trust ye in God; for out of pain [distress] we have received salvation [deliverance].' Now these rites seem to be precisely the same with those described in the Orphic Argonautica. If we can find in Scripture, a person described as eminently just, righteous, or pious, and such was the character of Noah (Gen. vi. 9.); if he be also characterized as one 'who shall comfort us concerning our work, and the toil our hands,' (Gen. v. 29.); if he was, as it were, entombed for a time, that is, in the ark; if he was restored from a bad to a better condition; to life and light from this floating grave; if a dove appears in his history to be a restorer of hope, and expectation of returning prosperity; then we may, I think, venture to suppose that this might be the person alluded to (even had he not been expressly mentioned) in the Orphic poem: and the ceremonies described in the poem seem to be precisely those which were practised in relation to Adonis or Tammuz. Fragments annexed to Calmet's Dictionary of the Holy Bible, No. 317. pp. 21, 22.

TARGUM, תרגום, signifies explanation. Targum, in the plural, targumim; that is, expositions, or explications. This name is given to the Chaldee paraphrases of the books of the Old Testament. They are called paraphrases, or expositions, because they are rather comments and explications than literal translations in the Chaldee tongue, which, after the captivity of Babylon, was more known to the Jews than Hebrew itself. So that when the Hebrew text was read in the synagogue or in the temple, they generally added an explication in the Chaldee tongue, for the advantage of the people. It is probable that this custom began from the time of Ezra; since that learned scribe, reading the law to the people in the temple, explained it, with the other priests who were with him, to make it understood by the people. (Nehem. viii. 8, 9.) Whether they explained it in the Hebrew language, or, which to us appears most probable, in the Chaldee, or Syriac; for these two languages had then a very great conformity, and were almost the same; even at this day they have a very near agreement.

But, though the custom of making these expositions in the Chaldee language be very ancient, yet they had no written paraphrases, or targumim, before Onkelos and Jonathan, who lived about the time of our Saviour. Jonathan is placed about thirty years before Christ, under the reign of Herod the Great: Onkelos something later. The Targum of Onkelos is the most esteemed, and copies are found in which it is inserted verse for verse with the Hebrew. It is so short and so simple, that it cannot be suspected of being corrupted. This paraphrast wrote only on the books of Moses, and his style approaches nearly to the purity of the Chaldee, as found in Daniel and Ezra. This Targum is quoted in the Mishna; but was not known either to Eusebius, Jerome, or Origen.

The Targum of Jonathan, son of Uziel, is on the greater and lesser prophets. He is much more diffuse than Onkelos, and especially on the lesser prophets, where he takes great liberties, and runs on in allegories. His style is pure enough, and approaches near to the Chaldee of Onkelos. It is thought that the Jewish doctors who lived above seven hundred years after him, have made additions to him. They ascribe to him a paraphrase on the Pentateuch also; but this is not his.

The Targum of Joseph the Blind, is on the Hagiographa. This author is much more modern, and less esteemed than the former. He wrote on the Psalms, Job, the Proverbs, Canticles, Ecclesiastes, Ruth, and Esther. His style is a very corrupt Chaldee, with a great mixture of foreign words.

The Targum of Jerusalem is only on the Pentateuch, nor is that perfect. There are whole verses wanting, others transposed, others mutilated; which has made many conclude that this is only a fragment of some ancient paraphrase now lost. There is no Targum on Daniel, Ezra, and Nehemiah.

TARSUS, Ταρσός, signifies winged, or having pinions. Tarsus was the capital city of Cilicia. St. Paul was a native of Tarsus. (Acts ix. 11.; xxi. 39.) Some think it obtained the privileges of a Roman colony, by its firm adherence to Julius Cæsar, which made the inhabitants citizens of Rome; whence St. Paul was free of Rome, by being born in Tarsus. Others maintain that Tarsus, though a free city, was not a Roman colony in the time of St. Paul; and that no trace is found of this on the medals, before the reign of Caracalla or Heliogabalus; therefore the privilege of being a citizen of Rome belonged to the Apostle, not as being a denizen of Tarsus, but by some personal right derived from his father or ancestors.

If we may not credit the fabulous account of its origin, at least it proves the great antiquity of this city. Strabo says, that in process of time it received a colony of Argives, and by the institutions they formed and supported for the study of arts and sciences, it became so illustrious, that he gives it the preference in that particular even over Athens and Alexandria. It was equally renowned for the power and the multitude of its inhabitants. Besides the title of metropolis, which it assumed, it derived surnames from five or six Roman emperors. Tarsus takes the title of governed by its own laws, as well as that of metropolis. Sacred Geography.

TEMPLE, the house of God, the sanctuary, the tabernacle of the Lord, the palace of the Most High, &c. These terms are often synonymous in Scripture, though, strictly speaking, they import very different things. For, the sanctuary was but one part of the tabernacle, or temple; and the word temple does not describe the tabernacle, or tabernacle the temple. The Hebrews, before Solomon, could not properly be said to have had a temple, yet they did not scruple to use the word temple for tabernacle: as, on the contrary, they sometimes by the tabernacle of the Lord, express the temple built by Solomon.

After the Lord had instructed David that Jerusalem was the place he had chosen, wherein to fix his dwelling, this pious prince began to think of executing his design of preparing a temple for the Lord, that might be something worthy of his divine Majesty. He opened his mind on this subject to the prophet Nathan; but the Lord did not think fit that David should execute his design, however laudable; but that honour was reserved for Solomon, his son and successor, who was to be a peaceable prince; whereas David had shed much blood in war. But David applied himself to collect great quantities of gold, silver, brass, iron, and other materials, for this undertaking.

Solomon laid the foundations of the Temple in the year of the world 2992, before Christ 1012, and it was finished in the year of the world 3000, and dedicated in 3001. The place chosen for erecting this magnificent structure was Mount Moriah. Its entrance stood towards the east, and the most holy, and most retired part, was towards the west. The first book of Kings, and the second of Chronicles, have chiefly described the Temple, properly so called; that is, the sanctuary, the holy place, and the apartments attached to them; also the vessels, the implements, and ornaments of the Temple, giving scarce any description of the courts and areas, which, however, made a principal part of the grandeur of this edifice. Ezekiel has supplied this defect, by the exact plan he has given of these necessary parts. Indeed, it must be owned, that the Temple, as described by Ezekiel, was never restored after the captivity of Babylon, according to the model and the mensurations of this prophet. But as the measures he sets down for the holy place, and the sanctuary, are within a small matter the same as those of the temple of Solomon; and as this prophet, who was himself a priest, had seen the first temple, it may be supposed the description he gives us of the Temple of Jerusalem, is that of the Temple of Solomon.

After the consecration, or dedication, of the Temple by Solomon, in the year of the world 3001, this edifice suffered many revolutions, which it is proper to notice here.

In the year of the world 3033, Shishak, king of Egypt, took Jerusalem, and carried away the treasures of the Temple. (1 Kings xiv. 25, &c. 2 Chron. xii.)

In the year of the world 3146, Joash, king of Judah, collected silver to repair the Temple; they began the work in earnest in 3148. (2 Kings xii. 4, 5, &c. 2 Chron. xxiv. 7, 8, &c.)

Ahaz, king of Judah, having bought the assistance of Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, against the kings of Israel and Damascus, who were at war with him, robbed the temple of the Lord of its riches, to give to this foreign king, (2 Chron. xxviii. 21, 22, &c.) in the year of the world 3264.

Not content with that, he profaned this holy place, by setting up therein an altar copied from one he had seen at Damascus, and taking away the brazen altar that Solomon had made. (2 Kings xvi. 10, 11, 12, &c.) He also took away the brazen sea from off the brazen oxen that supported it, and the brazen basins from their pedestals, and the king's throne, which was made of brass. These he took away to prevent their being carried off by the king of Assyria. Nor did he stop here, but carried his wickedness so far as to sacrifice to strange gods, and to erect profane altars in all the corners of the streets of Jerusalem. (2 Chron. xxviii. 24, 25.) He pillaged the Temple, broke the sacred vessels, and shut up the house of God, from the year of the world 3264.

Hezekiah, son and successor of Ahaz, opened again and repaired the gates of the Temple, which his father had shut up, and robbed of their ornaments, (2 Chron. xxxi. 3, 4, &c.) in the year of the world 3278. He restored the worship of the Lord, and sacrifices, and made new sacred vessels, in the place of those which Ahaz had destroyed. But in the fourteenth year of his reign, Sennacherib, king of Assyria, coming with an army into the land of Judah, Hezekiah was forced to take the riches of the Temple, and even the plates of gold that he himself had put on the gates of the Temple, to give them to the king of Assyria. But when Sennacherib was gone back into his own country, no doubt but Hezekiah restored all these things to their first condition.

Manasseh, son and successor of Hezekiah, profaned the Temple of the Lord, by setting up altars and idols, by which he worshipped the host of heaven, even in the courts of the house of the Lord, (2 Kings xxi. 4, 5, 6, 7. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 5, 6, 7.) in the year of the world 3306. God delivered him into the hands of the king of Babylon, who loaded him with chains, and carried him beyond the Euphrates, (2 Chron. xxxiii. 11, 12, &c.) in the year of the world 3328. Here he acknowledged, and repented of, his sins; and being sent back to his dominions, he redressed the profanations of the Temple which he had committed, taking away the idols, destroying the profane altars, and restoring the altar of burnt-offerings, upon which he offered his sacrifices.

Josiah, king of Judah, laboured with all his might in repairing the edifices of the Temple, which had been either neglected, or demolished by the kings of Judah, his predecessors. He also commanded the priests and Levites to replace the ark of the Lord in the sanctuary; and that it should not be moved from place to place, as it had been during the reigns of the wicked kings his predecessors. (2 Chron. xxxv. 3.)

Nebuchadnezzar took away a part of the sacred vessels of the Temple of the Lord, and placed them in the temple of his god at Babylon, under the reign of Jehoia-kim, king of Judah, (2 Chron. xxxvi. 6, 7.) in the year of the world 3398. He also carried away others under the reign of Jeconiah, (2 Chron. xxxvi. 10.) in the year of the world 3405. Lastly, he took the city of Jerusalem, and entirely destroyed the Temple, in the eleventh year of Zedekiah, in the year of the world 3416. (2 Kings xxv. 1, 2, 3, &c. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 18, 19.)

The Temple continued in its ruins fifty-two years, till the first year of the reign of Cyrus, at Babylon, in the year of the world 3468. Then Cyrus permitted the Jews to return to Jerusalem, and to rebuild the Temple of the Lord. (Ezra i. 1, 2, 3, &c.) The following year they laid the foundations of the second Temple; but they had hardly worked at it one year, when Cyrus, or his officers, gained over by the enemies of the Jews, forbade them to work, (Ezra iv. 5.) in the year of the world 3470. After the death of Cyrus and Cambyses, they were again forbid by the Magian, who reigned after Cambyses, and whom the Scripture calls Artaxerxes, (Ezra iv. 7, 17, 18.) in the year of the world 3483. Lastly, these prohibitions being superseded under Darius, son of Hystaspes, the Temple was finished and dedicated four years afterwards, in the year of the world 3489, twenty years after the return from the captivity.

This Temple was profaned by order of Antiochus Epiphanes, in the year of the world 3837. The ordinary sacrifices were discontinued, and the idol of Jupiter Olympius was set up near the altar. It continued in this condition three years. (1 Macc. i. 62.) Judas Maccabæus purified it, and restored the sacrifices and the worship of the Lord, in the year of the world 3840.

Herod the Great undertook to rebuild the whole Temple of Jerusalem; in the eighteenth year of his reign, in the year of the world 3986. He began to lay the foundation of it in 3987, forty-six years before the first passover of Jesus Christ, as the Jews observed to him by saying, 'Forty and six years was this temple in building; and wilt thou rear it up in three days?' This is not saying that Herod had employed forty-six years in building it; for Josephus assures us that he finished it in nine years and a-half. But, after the time of this prince, they still continued to make additions to it; and the same Josephus tells us that they continued working on it till the beginning of the Jewish war.

This Temple built by Herod did not subsist above seventy-seven years, being destroyed in the year of the world 4073. It was begun by Herod, in the year of the world 3987, finished in 3996, burnt by the Romans in 4073.

This Temple of Herod was very different from that of Solomon, and from that rebuilt by Zerubbabel after the captivity. The following is an abridgment of the description Josephus has left us of it, who himself had seen it.

The Temple was built upon a very hard rock, and the foundation laid with incredible expense and labour. The superstructure was not inferior to the grand work. The galleries above it were all double, supported by pillars of white marble, all of a piece, and five and twenty cubits in height, and wainscotted with cedar, which for the curiosity of the work, and smoothness of the grain, was a delightful object, without any additional ornaments, either of painting or carving. In the open air, where there was no covering overhead, the ground was paved and chequered with all sorts of stones. There were several pillars orderly disposed with inscriptions and precepts upon them, in Latin and Greek, on the subjects of continence and chastity, and forbidding strangers to enter that holy place.

The figure of the Temple was square, encompassed with a wall, which, though forty cubits without, was yet only five and twenty within; the place being covered with the steps that led to it. At the top of these steps was a plain level of three hundred cubits up to the wall, and thence five steps more to the gates of the Temple. The women had an oratory or place of worship by themselves, with a partition wall to it, and two gates, one on the south, the other on the north. Betwixt these gates, and near the treasury, were galleries with stately pillars to support them. Some of the gates were plated over with gold and silver; but there was one without the temple of Corinthian brass, which was by much the richest metal of the three. There were doors to every gate, each thirty cubits high and fifteen broad. Within the gates were drawing-rooms on each hand, thirty cubits square, and twenty cubits high, after the manner of turrets; and each of them was supported by pillars of twenty cubits in thickness. The Corinthian portal on the east side, where the women entered, was the largest and most magnificent of them all.

The Temple itself, or the sanctuary, was placed in the middle, and had twelve stairs to it. The height of it was an hundred cubits, and the breadth as many. The height of the first gate was seventy cubits, and five and twenty over; it had no doors to it, being designed to represent heaven, open and visible to the whole world. The front and outside were gilded all over. The inner part was divided into two partitions. The first partition was open to the top; it was ninety cubits in height, forty in length, and twenty in breadth. All the walls were plated with gold, with several curious carvings all in gold. The other partition of the Temple, being ceiled above, appeared the lower of the two. The doors of it were of gold, five and twenty cubits in height, and sixteen broad, with a piece of Babylonian tapestry hanging between them, curiously interwoven with a variety of colours. This entrance led into the lower part of the Temple; the height and length of it was sixty cubits, and the breadth twenty; which length was subdivided into two unequal parts, one of forty cubits, and the other of twenty. The former part had in it the candlestick, table, and altar of incense. The inner part of the Temple, being only twenty cubits in length, was divided by a veil from the other, and nothing was in it, neither was any man permitted to enter it; and it was called the sanctuary, or holy of holies. On the sides of this lower temple were several lodgings, leading from one to another, with three stories above, and passages into them out of the great portal.

The beauty of the Temple on the outside was charming beyond imagination; it being faced every way with substantial plates of gold, that glittered like the sun. The roof was covered with pointed spears of gold, to keep off the birds from resting upon it, or defiling it.

Josephus relates a circumstance, which he said he received by tradition from his fathers, that all the time they were at work upon the Temple, there fell no rain in the day time, but only in the night; so that the workmen were not hindered in their work. When the Temple was finished, the dedication of it was performed with great solemnity: the people rendered hearty thanks to God, and gave the king much praise and commendation, which he well deserved, for the execution of this great work. Herod offered to God three hundred oxen in sacrifice, and all the people, with great alacrity, brought their victims to celebrate this august ceremony.

We are informed by some or all of our ecclesiastical historians, who write of the emperor Julian, that he sent for some of the chief men of the Jewish nation, and inquired of them, why they did not now sacrifice as the law of Moses directed? They told him, 'that they were not to sacrifice at any place, except Jerusalem; and the Temple being destroyed, they were obliged to forbear that part of worship.' Upon this he promised to rebuild the Temple at Jerusalem; and we still have a letter of Julian inscribed, 'to the community of the Jews,' which, however extraordinary, must be reckoned genuine; for Sozomen expressly says, that 'Julian wrote to the patriarchs and rulers of the Jews, and to their whole nation, desiring them to pray for him, and for the prosperity of his reign.' That is an exact description of the letter which is so inscribed. It was written in the year 362, as La Bleterie supposeth; in the beginning of that year, say Tillemont and Bishop Warburton. Julian, in the close of the same letter, after the above recommendation to the Jews, adds, 'In this also you are deeply interested; that after having happily terminated the Persian war, I may dwell in the holy city of Jerusalem, which you have long desired to see inhabited, and in that, restored by my labours, may with you glorify the Most High.' Julian did not wait so long before he gave the Jews some proofs of his affection, or, rather, of his hatred to the Christians, by the project which he formed of rebuilding the Temple of Jerusalem; a project which, as Pagan writers themselves witness, was confounded by one of the most astonishing and best attested miracles mentioned in history. This particular event may be considered as closing the history of the Jewish Temple.

The Scripture speaks of several other temples in or near Palestine; as the temple of Dagon at Gaza (Judg. xvi. 23.), and another at Ashdod, or Azotus, (1 Sam. v. 1, 2, 3. 1 Macc. x. 24.); the temple of the Samaritans, upon Mount Gerizim, (2 Macc. v. 23.; vi. 2.); the temple of Ashtaroth, one of the chief of the Philistines, (1 Sam. xxxi. 10.); the temple of Baal, which Ahab built in Samaria, (1 Kings xvi. 32.); the temple of Rimmon, at Damascus, (2 Kings v. 18.); the temple of Nisroch, at Babylon, (Isaiah xxxvii. 38.); the temple of Bel at Babylon, (Dan. xiv. 9.); the temples of Chemosh, and of Moloch, built by Solomon upon the Mount of Olives, over against the Temple of the Lord, (1 Kings xi. 7.); the temple of Nannæa, which Antiochus Epiphanes attempted to plunder, (2 Macc. i. 13.); the temple of Babylon, in which Nebuchadnezzar laid up the vessels of the Temple of Jerusalem, (Dan. i. 2.); the temple of the golden calf, at Bethel, and at Dan.

Temple is also applied to the church of Jesus Christ: 'Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God.' (Rev. iii. 12.) And St. Paul says, (2 Thess. ii. 4.) that Antichrist 'As God, sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God.' Temple is sometimes put for heaven, (Psalm xi. 4.): 'The Lord is in his holy temple; the Lord's throne is in heaven.' The saints in heaven are said to be 'before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple.' (Rev. vii. 15.)

The temple of God, in a spiritual sense, is the soul of a righteous man. (1 Cor. iii. 16, 17.; vi. 19. 2 Cor. vi. 16.) Sacred Geography.

TEMPTATION signifies either a trial of our strength, for the improvement of our virtue, or an allurements to sin. In the former of these senses, God himself is said to tempt men; that is, to call them to some hard and severe conflict in the spiritual warfare; that their virtue, being tried like gold in the furnace, may shine forth with redoubled and increasing splendour. It was thus he tempted Abraham to sacrifice his only son. It was thus he proved the children of Israel in the wilderness, to try their obedience, and to know what was in their hearts. And for this reason, we are commanded in the Gospel, 'not to think it strange concerning the fiery trial that is to try us;' but rather to glory in tribulations, and to count it all joy when we fall into divers temptations; knowing that the trying of our faith worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope. But, however glorious these temptations may be, when overcome, we have all just reason to wish not to be led into them.

Temptation also signifies allurements to evil. In this sense, God cannot be properly said to tempt us; for he tempts no man to evil. Yet, since nothing can happen without his permissive Providence, we find even this kind of temptation figuratively ascribed to God in Scripture; and we therefore pray to him, that he would keep us from the hour of temptation; that he would not leave us to ourselves; that he would not suffer us to be led into those snares which may endanger our virtue. And this we have just reason to pray for, if we rightly consider our situation in life, for danger is around us, within us, and in every form.

If we think to fly from danger, where shall we find a place or situation in life that is not full of temptation? Are we in the sunshine of fortune, surrounded with its gilded titles and honours? How liable are we to grow giddy with eminence, and to forget God or ourselves! Are we surrounded with the gaieties of life, and neither want ability nor inclination to enjoy them? How likely are we to fall into riot and dissipation, or, if we escape this, to drag on a miserable existence, burthened with the follies and guilt of youth! If we are sunk in the vale of poverty, and surrounded with distress, how great is the temptation to murmur against God! Do we retire from the world, sick of its vanities, vexations, and deceptions? We may by so doing avoid the dangers of example and multitude, but we are not safe from the corrosions of malevolence, spleen, and discontent; we may have our passions to contend with, even in the retirement of the cloister, or the solitude of the closet:—though we fly the guilty haunts of public resort, yet the tempter can follow us into the cell, or the wilderness. Every age, too, as well as every state, has its temptations.

Since, then, life is ever thus full of dangers, and nature ever prone to fall a victim to temptation, we have just reason to pray that God would deliver us from evil; that is, either from the evil of sin, which is the consequence of being overcome by temptation; or from the evil one, that is the devil, who is ever ready to tempt and devour us; or, as it is well expressed in the Catechism of our church, 'that he would deliver us from all sin and wickedness, from our ghostly enemy, and from everlasting death;' always remembering that however willing the spirit may be to resist temptation, yet the flesh is too often weak and yielding, unguarded, and defenceless. Carr's Sermons.

TE/RAH, טרה, signifies to breathe, to scent, to blow. Terah was son of Nahor, and father of Nahor, Haran, and Abraham, (Gen. xi. 24.) born in the year of the world 1878. He begat Abraham at the age of seventy two years, in the year of the world 1950. He came with Abraham out of Ur of the Chaldeans, to settle at Haran in Mesopotamia, in the year of the world 2082. (Gen. xi. 31, 32.) He died there the same year, aged two hundred and five years.

The Scripture says plainly, that Terah had fallen into idolatry: (Josh. xxiv. 2—14.) 'Your fathers dwelt on the other side of the flood in old times; even Terah, the father of Abraham, and the father of Nahor; and they served other gods.' Some think that Abraham himself, at first, worshipped idols: but that afterwards God being gracious to him, convinced him of the vanity of this worship, and that he undeceived his father Terah.

The Arabians and Turks say, that one Azar was the father of Abraham, and that Terah was his grandfather. Justin says, that Adores, Abraham, and Israel, reigned successively at Damascus. Suidas assures us, that Abraham converted his father Terah, who was an idolater; and Georgius Syncellus acquaints us, that he threw his father Terah's idols into the fire, and that Haran, endeavouring to rescue them from the flames, was burnt with them; that Terah, having at first quitted the worship of these false gods, afterwards relapsed into his former idolatry, and continued obstinate in it till his dying day.

TER'APHIM, תרפים, signifies an image, an idol, burning. It is said (Gen. xxxi. 19.) that Rachel had stolen the images—Teraphim of her father. It is inquired what these Teraphim were? The Septuagint translate this word by oracle, and sometimes by vain figures. Aquila generally translates it by figures. It appears, indeed, from all the passages in which this word is used, that they were idols or superstitious figures. Some Jewish writers tell us the Teraphim were human heads placed in niches, and consulted by way of oracles. Others think, they were talismans or figures of metal cast and engraven under certain aspects of the planets, to which they ascribed extraordinary effects. All the eastern people are much addicted to this superstition, and the Persians still call them telefin, a name nearly approaching to Teraphim.

It is asked, why Rachel stole the Teraphim of her father Laban? Some have thought it was to receive reparation for the wrongs he had done her. Some imagine that she thought to deprive him of the means of discovering their flight, by taking away his oracles. Some say that with the Teraphim she thought to take away the prosperity of her father's house, and transfer it to her husband. Others think that she intended to remove the occasion of her father's superstitious worship, and to stop his idolatry; and some believe that both she and her sister Leah, were addicted to this idolatrous superstition, which they wished to continue in the land of Canaan. But Jacob compelled them to discard all these false deities, which he afterwards hid under the oak, near Shechem. (Gen. xxxv. 4.)

We are told that Michal put a Teraphim into David's bed, pretending he was there sick, (1 Sam. xix. 13.): 'And Michal took an image [teraphim] and laid it in the bed [duan.]'

'What,' says a late writer, 'did Michal mean, by placing the Teraphim on David's bed? 1. to commit him, as the person who usually slept there, to the protection of her household gods; 2. to procure a reverence and security for the place from her father's agents: as she probably foresaw her father would not respect even her female privacy. But that these Teraphim were not the size of a man, should appear from the consideration of the difficulty of moving such heavy goods, from the conspicuous idolatry they would have demonstrated in the family, from the consideration that the cushion would answer the purpose full as well, and was much more manageable, and from the time it would have occupied to have effected such a contrivance.'

We read in the book of Judges (xvii. 5, &c.) that one named Micah had a house of gods, and made an ephod and teraphim, and consecrated one of his sons, who became his priest. These teraphim were taken away by the men of Dan, and set up in Laish, and continued there till the captivity of Israel. Whatever the form of these images was, it is probable they were looked upon as oracles. The learned Spencer makes the word teraphim to be the same as seraphim, by a change of the s into t; whence it follows, that these images were representations of those angels called seraphim. M. Jurieu supposes them to have been a sort of Dii Penates, or household gods; and this appears to be, perhaps, the most probable opinion. Scripture Illustrated.

THANKSGIVING, the act of acknowledging the mercies of God. So various and so striking are the instances of the Divine goodness, which are common to all men in all nations and climes, that the most ignorant and savage people have seldom been found without some mode of expressing their gratitude and their praise. Whether intellectual man be placed in the torrid, the frozen, or the more temperate regions of the globe, he finds such a wise, and beneficent provision made for his happiness, and that of other creatures, suited to the relations in which they are placed, as will prompt his love and his acknowledgments to the Author of his being. There is no part of the universe in which the works of the creation are not sufficient to attest the goodness of the Creator.

Whatever may be the actual quantity of pain and suffering in the world, which may be considered as an indication of malevolence, without being viewed in connexion with the uses, physical and moral, temporal and eternal, to which it is subservient; still, among the millions by whom the world is peopled, there are, comparatively, but a few, who, when they lay down their heads at night, can truly declare that they have not experienced more ease than agony, more pleasure than pain, more happiness than misery, during the day. Now if this be the case, if on every day, or through the greater part of the days of our lives, our pleasure greatly preponderates over our pain, our happiness over our misery, what strong grounds have we to believe that he who made us desires our happiness, and what abundant reasons have we to be thankful to the Author of our being! Ought not the idea of the Divine goodness to be continually present to us, and the frequent object of our devout acknowledgments? Ought we to rise in the morning without making it our first thought, or go to bed at night without making it our last? By frequently and at regular intervals meditating on the divine goodness, we shall greatly favour the growth of a grateful disposition towards God in our souls. And, the more impressed we are with right notions of the divine goodness, the less liable we shall be to experience any uneasy sensations of distrust when things go wrong with us, when the world frowns upon us, and we are oppressed with trouble or perplexed with care. For must not the consciousness that God loves us mitigate our grief, assuage our discontent, repel our suspicions, and make us rely on his providence? And can we help trusting in God's goodness even in our most torturing hour, when we reflect on the many solid and convincing proofs of it which we see in so many instances, and when we ourselves have had so large an experience of it, ever since we were born? For are we not placed in a world not by our own will, nor by the will of man, but by the will of God, in which there is a great preponderance of happiness, and where only a very superficial observation is sufficient to teach us that the trouble and misery which are the inheritance of our condition, are conducive to our moral improvement?

The Scriptures are frequently enjoining us to be always thinking of God, always making his goodness and perfections the theme of our meditation, the song of our praise, the object of our thanksgiving. And this they do, not because the practice tends to God's benefit, but to our own. For of all our religious services, though the object is God, the profit is our own; and those acts which, in scriptural language, are said most to promote the glory of God, will be found ultimately the most conducive to our own individual advantage. The habit of thanksgiving, which St. Paul urges us to cultivate, when he tells us to be 'always giving thanks for all things to God and the Father,' will be found of this nature, which, while it gives glory to God in the highest, tends, in the highest degree, to promote the best interests of man. It is the habit of thanksgiving, the habitual feeling of gratitude towards God, which the Scripture is so desirous of producing in us, and which can be produced only by a frequent performance of particular acts and exertions of thanksgiving and gratitude. The favours of God towards us are more in number than the sand on the sea shore, and it would be impossible to recount every particular act of the Divine goodness which might in justice claim our devout acknowledgments, and our humble adoration. But we can in most cases thank God only for the aggregate of his gifts in time past, or in time present, since we are unable to remember or to enumerate every single benefit. Let each of us, and particularly those who are more advanced in life, as far as they are able, recal the memory of the days that are past. From how many dangers and calamities, which, perhaps, threatened their destruction, will they find that they have been rescued; in how much sickness, and in how many cares, assisted and comforted! Has not the Divine arm been often stretched out to save them? Has not his good providence often so disposed events as to extricate them from the most imminent perils, and delivered them from impending penury and ruin? And ought we not often to think of these things?

The ordinary favours of God, and those which make the least impression, are perhaps the greatest; though it is their greatness, the frequency of their recurrence, or the length of their continuance, which causes us to think slightly of them, or not to regard them with as much devotion and gratitude as we ought. Consider how inestimable are the blessings of sight, hearing, smell, taste, touch; and yet of these blessings and privileges of nature, because they are so familiar and so universal, we seldom know the value, except by their privation. What would the wisest among the heathens have given to have enjoyed that clear manifestation of the will of God, which is placed before us in the Gospel of Christ! Yet how seldom do we, who have the light of immortality shining around us, reflect, with suitable devotion and gratitude, on our exemption from the thick darkness which covered the heathen world! When we consider the disconsolate state, and never-ending doubts, of the best and wisest among the heathens, respecting the pardon of sin, the immortality of the soul, and a state of future retribution, what reason have we to exclaim with St. Peter, 'Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, according to his abundant mercy, hath begotten us again unto a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away!' (1 Pet. i. 3, 4.) Blessed be the eternal Father who sent his Son into the world to die for our sins, and to rise again for our justification. Whether we look to the present, or to the future, we shall find abundant reason to give glory, and honour, and praise; to offer up the most grateful oblations of our minds and hearts to God for his unspeakable gift.

To him are we to return thanksgiving, who, to redeem us from misery, and advance us to happiness, did infinitely debase his only begotten Son, the brightness of his glorious majesty; and who did not disdain to assume us into a perfect union with himself, to inhabit our frail and mortal nature, to converse, as it were, on equal terms with us, and at last to taste the bitter cup of a most painful ignominious death for us: to him who is merciful, gracious, and liberal; who bestows more gifts, pardons more debts, forgives more sins, than we live minutes; who with infinite patience endures our manifold infirmities and imperfections, our follies and obstinate tempers; who overlooks our careless and wilful neglects; forgives the very many affronts and injuries continually offered to his Supreme Majesty by us, whom he can reduce to nothing at his pleasure; 'who giveth freely, and upbraideth no man:' in a word, to him whose benefits are immense, innumerable, inexpressibly good and valuable. 'For who can tell the mighty acts of the Lord? Who can show forth all his praise?' To this God, this our great, our only Patron and Benefactor, we owe this most natural, easy, just, and pleasant duty of giving thanks. Fellowes's Body of Theology, vol. i. pp. 534—546; Dr. Isaac Barrow's Works, vol. i. p. 103.

THAR'SHISH or TARSHISH, תַּרְשִׁישׁ, signifies a bruiſe, that is, to the enemy: from the Syriac. There is a multitude of opinions concerning the country of Tharshish, whither Solomon sent his fleet. (1 Kings x. 22. 2 Chron. ix. 21.) Josephus, and the Chaldee and Arabic paraphrasts, explain it of Tarsus, a city of Cilicia. The Septuagint, Jerome, and Theodoret, understand it of Carthage. Eusebius derives the Spaniards from Tharshish. The Arabian geographer thinks it was Tunis in Africa. Bochart makes it Tartesus, an island in the Straits of Gades. Le Clerc understands Thassus, an island and city in the Ægean Sea. Gro-tius thinks the whole ocean was called Tharshish, because of the famous city of Tartesus, now mentioned. Sanctius believes the sea, in general, to be called Tharshish, and that ships of Tharshish are those employed in voyages at sea, in opposition to small vessels used only in rivers.

The Seventy sometimes translate Tharshish by the sea; and Scripture gives alike the name ships of Tharshish to those fitted out at Ezion-geber, on the Red Sea, and which sailed to the ocean, as to those fitted out at Joppa, and in the ports of the Mediterranean, which was usually called the Great Sea.

When, therefore, we see ships fitted out on the Red Sea, or at Ezion-geber, in order to go to Tharshish, we must conclude, either that there were two countries called Tharshish, one on the ocean, another on the Mediterranean, which seems by no means probable; or, that ships of Tharshish, in general, signifies ships able to bear a long voyage; large ships, in opposition to small craft intended for a home-trade in navigable rivers; or ships built in a particular manner—Tharshish-built.

THEOPHILANTHROPISTS, from the Greek θεός, φίλος, and ἄνθρωπος, the love of God and man. The Theophilanthropists may be ranked among the enthusiasts of the day, though of a more dangerous cast. They professed their principles in France, at the beginning of the Revolution. They were properly Deists, had their places of worship, as they called them, and for a time attracted some notice in Europe. It was an effort to make Deism the religion of France, instead of Christianity; but they have dwindled into obscurity, and are known only by the common term of Deist. According to them, the temple most worthy of the Divinity is the universe. Abandoned sometimes under the vault of heaven, to the contemplation of the beauties of nature, they render its Author the homage of adoration and gratitude. They, nevertheless, have temples erected by the hands of men, in which it is more commodious for them to assemble, to hear lessons concerning his wisdom. Certain moral inscriptions; a simple altar, on which they deposit, as a sign of gratitude for the benefits of the Creator, such flowers or fruits as the seasons afford; a tribune for the lectures and discourses; form the whole of the ornaments of their temples.

First inscription. We believe in the existence of God, in the immortality of the soul.—Second inscription. Worship God, cherish your kind, render yourselves useful to your country.—Third inscription. Good is every thing which tends to the preservation or the perfection of man. Evil is every thing which tends to destroy or deteriorate him.—Fourth inscription. Children honour your fathers and mothers; obey them with affection, comfort their old age. Fathers and mothers instruct your children.—Fifth inscription. Wives regard your husbands, the chiefs of your houses. Husbands love your wives, and render yourselves reciprocally happy.

The concluding part of the manual of the Theophilanthropists is still further explanatory of their tenets and conduct. 'If any one ask you,' say they, 'what is the origin of your religion, and of your worship, you can answer him thus: open the most ancient books which are known, seek there what was the religion, what the worship of the first human beings of which history has preserved the remembrance. There you will see that their religion was what we now call natural religion, because it has for its principle even the Author of nature. It is He that has engraven it in the heart of the first human beings, in ours, in that of all the inhabitants of the earth; this religion, which consists in worshipping God, and cherishing our kind, is what we express by one single word, that of Theophilanthropy. Thus our religion is that of our first parents; it is yours; it is ours; it is the universal religion. As to our worship, it is also that of our first fathers. See even in the most ancient writings, that the exterior signs by which they rendered their homage to the Creator were of great simplicity. They dressed for him an altar of earth, they offered to him, in sign of their gratitude and of their submission, some of the productions which they held of his liberal hand. The fathers exhorted their children to virtue; they all encouraged one another, under the auspices of the divinity, to the accomplishment of their duties. This simple worship the sages of all nations have not ceased to profess, and they have transmitted it down to us without interruption.

'If they yet ask you of whom you hold your mission, answer, We hold it of God himself, who in giving us two arms, to aid our kind, has also given us intelligence to mutually enlighten us, and the love of good to bring us together to virtue; of God who has given experience and wisdom to the aged to guide the young, and authority to fathers to conduct their children.

'If they are not struck with the force of these reasons, do not farther discuss the subject, and do not engage yourself in controversies, which tend to diminish the love of our neighbours. Our principles are the eternal truth; they will subsist, whatever individuals may support or attack them; and the efforts of the wicked will never prevail against them. Rest firmly attached to them, without attacking or defending any religious system; and remember that similar discussions have never produced good, and that they have often tinged the earth with the blood of men. Let us lay aside systems, and apply ourselves to doing good. It is the only road to happiness.'

The Christian reader will admire the practical tendency of this new species of Deism, at the same time that he will lament the defects by which it stands characterized. It stands in need of the broad basis of revelation, the want of which nothing else can compensate. Bellamy's History of all Religions, p. 319; Evans's Sketch of the Denominations of the Christian World, pp. 19—21.

THESSALONIANS, Θεσσαλονικείς, people of Thessalonica. St. Paul, being obliged to quit Thessalonica, retired to Berea, where he left Timothy and Silas, to confirm the churches of Macedonia. From thence he went to Athens, and from Athens to Corinth, where, after some months, Silas and Timothy came to him, and informed him of the state of the church at Thessalonica, which persisted in the faith, notwithstanding persecutions and sufferings. They told him also of some among them who afflicted themselves too much for the death of their relations, and who were not sufficiently instructed concerning the coming of our Lord, and the last judgment. They reported, also, that some of them were vain, inquisitive, and restless.

St. Paul therefore wrote to them, probably in the year 52; and this First Epistle to the Thessalonians is the first in order of time of all St. Paul's Epistles. The series of the history of St. Paul's journeys sufficiently shows that it was sent from Corinth. The apostle instructs them concerning the last judgment, and about the manner, and measure, with which Christians should be afflicted for the death of their relations. He expresses much affection and tenderness for them, and an earnest desire of coming to see them. He reproves them with much mildness and prudence, mixing strokes of praise, and marks of tenderness, with his reprehensions.

The Second Epistle to the Thessalonians was written from Corinth, a little time after the First, and probably at the end of the year 52. In this St. Paul animates the Thessalonians against the fears occasioned by a false interpretation of a passage in his First Epistle, as if he had said, that the day of the Lord was at hand. He exhorts them to continue stedfast in the doctrine he had taught them, and to suffer with constancy under persecution. He reproves, more vehemently than before, those who lived in idleness and vain curiosity; he would have them notice these people, and separate from them, that at least they might be ashamed of their trifling, and reform it. He signs the letter with his own hand, and desires them to mark it well, that they might not be imposed on by supposititious letters, written in his name; by which they had perhaps been deceived.

THESSALONICA, Θεσσαλονίκη, signifies the other victory of God; or rather, the place or position of the other victory. (Acts xvii. 1.)

Thessalonica was a famous city in Macedonia, and capital of this kingdom, standing on the Thesmaick Sea. Stephen of Byzantium says, it was improved and beautified by Philip king of Macedon, and called Thessalonica, in memory of his victory over the Thessalians. Its old name was Thesma; but Strabo and others affirm that it was named from Thessalonica, the wife of Cas-sander, and daughter of Philip. Here were a number of Jews, who were in possession of a synagogue. (Acts xvii. 1, 2, 3, &c.) St. Paul came hither, A.D. 50, and entering the synagogue, according to his custom, he preached to the congregation, out of the Scriptures, three sabbath-days successively. Some Jews were converted, and many Gentiles that feared God, and some women of quality. But the rest of the Jews, hurried away by false zeal, raised a tumult, and came to the house of Jason, to seize Paul and Silas, who lodged there, and to take them before the magistrates. But finding neither Paul nor Silas, they laid hold of Jason and others. However, Jason and the rest giving security, were set at liberty; and the same night the brethren conducted Paul and Silas out of the city toward Berea.

Thessalonica is now called Salonica. Its walls give a very remarkable appearance to the town, and cause it to be seen from a great distance; as they are white-washed, and what is still more extraordinary, also painted. They extend in a semi-circular manner from the sea, enclosing the whole of the buildings within a peribolus, whose circuit is five or six miles; but a great part of the space within the walls is void. It is one of the few remaining cities that have preserved the form of its ancient fortifications;—the mural turrets yet standing, and the walls that support them being entire. Their antiquity is perhaps unknown. Like all the ancient and modern cities of Greece, its wretched aspect within is forcibly contrasted with the beauty of the external appearance, rising in a theatrical form, upon the side of a hill surrounded with plantations of cypress, and other evergreen trees and shrubs. The houses are generally built of unburnt bricks, and, for the most part, they are little better than so many hovels. In the days of its prosperity Thessalonica boasted of an amphitheatre for gladiators, and also a hippodrome for the solemnization of the public games.

Salonica is governed by a pasha, who in his absence appoints a musulin. Its population, according to a work published by Beaujour, in 1800, amounts to sixty thousand souls. In this number are comprehended 30,000 Turks, 16,000 Greeks, 12,000 Jews, and a mixed population of Gipsies and Ethiopian slaves, amounting to 2000. In some respects Thessalonica is the same now as when Christianity was first planted in this city: a set of turbulent Jews constituted a very principal part of its population; and when St. Paul came hither from Philippi, where the Gospel was first preached, to communicate the 'glad tidings' to the Thessalonians, the Jews were in sufficient number 'to set all the city in an uproar.' (Acts xvii. 5.) In the several jurisdictions afterwards established for the government of the church, we find Aristarchus constituted by that apostle himself to preside at Thessalonica, and Epaphroditus at Philippi. In the Second Epistle which St. Paul sent to the busy, commercial inhabitants of Thessalonica, we may gather, from his mode of arguing with them, something of their Jewish propensities, and covetous disposition; and viewing what this city now is, it is impossible not to be struck with the force of this appeal: 'We behaved not ourselves disorderly among you; neither did we eat any man's bread for nought; but wrought with labour and travail, night and day, that we might not be chargeable to any of you.' (2 Thess. iii. 7, 8.) The major part of the Thessalonians of the present day, that is to say, the Jews, are precisely the sort of men to be influenced by such a style of persuasion; and there is not one of them whose way of life does not afford a reasonable comment on this passage of St. Paul. Clarke's Travels, vol. vii. pp. 443—473.

THEUDAS, Θεῦδας, or Theodas, signifies given of God, or the gift of God. Gamaliel (Acts v. 36.) says, A.D. 33, that one Theudas set himself up some time before for some great person: about four hundred men joined him; but he was killed; all that believed in him were dispersed, and the matter came to nothing. Usher thinks this Theudas was the same as Judas, who revolted at the death of Herod, mentioned by Josephus.

THOMAS the Apostle, otherwise called Didymus, that is, in Greek, a twin. The Hebrew name Thomas, signifies also, a twin.

No doubt but Thomas was a Galilean, as well as the other apostles; but the place of his birth, and the circumstances of his vocation, are unknown. He was appointed an apostle, A.D. 31. (Luke vi. 13, 14, 15.)

and continued to follow our Saviour during the three years of his preaching. We know no particulars of his life till A.D. 33, a little before the passion of our Saviour; when Jesus Christ intended to go to Judea to raise up Lazarus, Thomas said to the rest, 'Let us also go that we may die with him.' (John xi. 16.) Let us die with Lazarus, or, Let us die with Jesus Christ; for interpreters take it in both senses. Thomas meant, that by going to Judea they should be exposed to certain death; for he knew the hatred and malice of the Jews against Jesus Christ. Some explain these words as if he intended to encourage the apostles to this resolution; but others understand them as a token of fear.

At the last supper, (John xiv. 5, 6.) Thomas asked Jesus Christ whither he was going, and what way? Our Saviour answered, 'I am the way, and the truth, and the life.' After the resurrection, when Jesus Christ appeared to his apostles in the absence of Thomas, he so far expressed his diffidence of what they assured him, as to tell them, 'Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into his side, I will not believe.' (John xx. 19—29.) Eight days after, Jesus appeared to the apostles, and to Thomas who was among them. Then Thomas, having both seen and touched him, no longer doubted, but cried out, 'My Lord, and my God.' Jesus said to him, 'Thomas, because thou hast seen, thou hast believed: blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed.' A few days after, when Thomas and some other disciples went a-fishing on the Sea of Galilee, Jesus appeared to them, caused them to take a very great draught of fishes, manifested himself to them, and dined with them.

THYATIRA, Θῡάτιρα, signifies fragrance; otherwise, the sacrifice of labour, or of contrition. Thyatira, a city which some ascribe to Mysia, and others to Lydia, or to the Lesser Asia, because it is on the frontiers of these three provinces. St. John writes to the bishop, or angel, of Thyatira (Rev. ii. 18, 19, &c.): 'I know thy works,' &c.

TIBERIAS, Τιβερίας, signifies good sight, or the navel, or breaking. Tiberias, a famous city of Galilee, at the southern extremity, on the western shore of the lake of Genesareth, otherwise the Sea of Tiberias. It is thought its old name was Cinnereth, or Hammath, or Emath, or Rakkath, or Recchath: but Reland shows, that this is very doubtful, and is only founded on the Sea of Cinnereth being afterwards called the Sea of Tiberias; which by no means proves that Cinnereth and Tiberias are the same town: Besides, he observes that the portion of Naphtali did not begin towards the south, but at Capernaum: Matthew (iv. 13.) says that Capernaum was on the con-finest of Zebulun and Naphtali; and Joshua says, (xix. 34.) that Naphtali passes into Zebulun, towards the south, which is more to the north than Tiberias; yet Cinnereth, Hammath, and Rakkath, belong to the portion of Naphtali. (Josh. xix. 35.) Tiberias, therefore, could not; since we know that it was south of the lake of Tiberias.

Josephus tells us that this city was built in honour of Tiberias, by king Herod Agrippa. Pretty near it were baths of hot water; and it stood in a place where were many tombs and dead bodies, which was contrary to the usages and customs of the Jews. Tiberias was thirty furlongs from Hippos, sixty from Gadara, and a hundred and twenty from Scythopolis, and thirty from Tarichea.

The present town of Tiberias, or Tabareeah, as it is now called, is in the form of an irregular crescent, and is enclosed towards the land by a wall flanked with circular towers. It lies nearly north and south along the western edge of the lake, and has its eastern front opposed to the water, on the brink of which it stands, as some of the houses there are almost washed by the sea. Its southern wall approaches close to the beach; but the north-western angle of the northern wall, being seated upon a rising ground, recedes some little distance from the water, and thus gives an irregular form to the inclosure. The whole does not appear a mile in circuit, and cannot contain more than five hundred separate dwellings, from the manner in which they are placed. There are two gates visible from without, one near the southern, and the other in the western wall, the latter of which is in one of the round towers, and is the only one now open; there are appearances also of the town having been surrounded by a ditch, but this is filled up with cultivable soil.

To the northward of the town is the road to Nazareth, along the Lake of Tiberias; to the southward, the ruins of the ancient city, and a hot bath, still frequented, as well as the burying-ground of the Mahometans and the Jews; on the east, the broad expanse of the lake stretches over to the opposite shore; and on the west, it has a small space of plain fit for cultivation, from whence the land suddenly rises into the lofty hills which almost overhang the town.

The interior presents only few objects of interest besides the ordinary habitations, which are, in general, small and mean. There is a mosque, with a dome and minaret. There is also an ancient church, of an oblong square form, to which is a descent by steps. There is reason to believe that this was the first place of Christian worship erected in Tiberias, and that it was constructed as early as the fourth century. It has even been thought by some to be the oldest place of Christian worship now extant in Palestine. It is a vaulted room, about thirty feet by fifteen, and perhaps fifteen feet in height; and it stands nearly east and west, having its door of entrance at the western front, and its altar immediately opposite in a shallow recess. Over the door is one small window, and on each side four others, all arched and open. The masonry of the edifice is of an ordinary kind. During Mr. Buckingham's visit to this church, morning mass was performing by the 'Abuna, with whom he lodged, and the congregation consisted of only eleven persons, young and old, and the furniture and decorations of the altar and the priest were exceedingly scanty and poor.

This edifice, which is called 'The House of Peter,' is thought by the people here to have been the very house which Peter inhabited at the time of his being called from his boat to follow Christ. It, however, has evidently been constructed for a place of worship, though it may have been erected on the spot which tradition had marked as the site of Peter's more humble habitation. 'If,' says Dr. Clarke, 'it be not the building erected by Helena, on the spot where our Saviour is said to have appeared to St. Peter after his resurrection, it is probably that which Epiphanius relates to have been built by a native of Tiberias, one Josephus, who, under the auspices of Constantine, erected the churches of Sephoris, and Capernaum.'

The whole population of Tiberias does not exceed two thousand souls, according to the opinion of the best-informed residents. Of these, about the half are Jews, many of whom are said by Mr. Buckingham to be from Europe, particularly from Germany, Russia, and Poland, and the rest are Mahometans, exclusively of about twenty Christian families of the Catholic communion. Dr. Clarke, however, thinks that the Jews 'are perhaps a remnant of refugees, who fled hither after the capture of Jerusalem by the Romans.' He likewise observes, that 'the Christian inhabitants of this town are also numerous: of this we were convinced, by the multitude we saw coming from the morning service of the church.' Dr. E. D. Clarke's Travels, vol. iv. pp. 213—233; Buckingham's Travels in Palestine, vol. ii. pp. 355—359.

TIDAL, תִּדְלָל, θάπυλλ, signifies that breaks the yoke; otherwise, knowledge of elevation. Tidal wasking of nations, or of Goin. (Gen. xiv. i.) Some think he was king of Galilee, of the Gentiles, beyond Jordan. Symmachus translates it king of Pamphylia; the Syriac, king of the Galites; Joshua speaks of a king of the nations of Gilgal, or of Galilee, according to the Septuagint. (Josh. xii. 23.)

TIG'LATH-PILE'SER. תִּגְלַת-פִּלְזֶסֶר, תִּגְלַת-פִּלְזֶסֶר, θηλαθ-φιλασαρ, signifies that binds or takes away captivity, miraculous, or ruinous. Tiglath-pileser, or Tiglath-pilneser, king of Assyria, was son and successor of Sardanapalus; he began to reign at Nineveh in the year of the world 3257. (1 Chron. v. 6. 2 Kings xv. 29.; xvi. 10.) He restored the kingdom of Assyria, after the dismembering of it by Belesis and Arbaces.

Ahaz, king of Judah, finding himself pressed by Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel, and unable to oppose them, sent ambassadors to Tiglath-pileser, to desire his assistance against these kings. (2 Kings xvi. 7, 8, 9, &c.) At the same time, he sent him all the gold and silver found in the treasuries of the temple, and of the palace. Tiglath-pileser marched against Rezin, killed him, plundered Damascus, and transported the inhabitants to places on the river Cyrus. Ahaz went to meet this prince at Damascus, (2 Chron. xxviii. 20, 21.) but Tiglath-pileser was not satisfied with the presents of Ahaz, but entered Judea, where he found no opposition, and ravaged the whole country.

He did the same in Samaria, carried away the tribes of Reuben and Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, and transplanted them to Halah, Habor, and Hara, upon the river Gozan. (1 Chron. v. 26.) He took also the cities Ijon, Abel-bethmaachah, Janoah, Kedesh, Hazor, Galilee, and the countries of Gilead and Naphtali, and carried away the inhabitants into Assyria. (2 Kings xv. 29.) Tiglath-pileser reigned nineteen years at Nineveh; he died in the year of the world 3276. His successor was his son Shalmaneser.

TIMOTHY, Τιμόθεος, signifies honour of God, or valued of God. Timothy was a native of Lystra in Lycæonia; his father was a Gentile; but his mother, whose name was Eunice, was a Jewess, (Acts. xvi. i.) and educated her son with great care in her own religion. (2 Tim. i. 5.; iii. 15.) Paul calls Timothy his 'own son in the faith' (1 Tim. 1, 2.); from which expression it is inferred, that Paul was the person who converted him to the belief of the Gospel; and as, upon Paul's second arrival at Lystra, Timothy is mentioned as being then a disciple, and as having distinguished himself among the Christians of that neighbourhood, his conversion, as well as that of Eunice his mother, and Lois his grandmother, must have taken place when St. Paul first preached at Lystra, in the year 46. Upon St. Paul's leaving Lystra in the course of his second apostolical journey, he was induced to take Timothy with him, on account of his excellent character, and the zeal which, young as he was, he had already shown in the cause of Christianity; but before they set out, Paul caused him to be circumcised; not as a thing necessary to his salvation, but to avoid giving offence to the Jews, as he was a Jew by the mother's side, and it was an established rule among the Jews, that 'partus sequitur ventrem.' Timothy was regularly appointed to the ministerial office by the laying on of hands, not only by Paul himself, (2 Tim. i. 6.) but also by the presbytery. (1 Tim. iv. 14.) From this time Timothy acted as a minister of the Gospel; he generally attended St. Paul, but was sometimes employed by him in other places; he was very diligent and useful, and is always mentioned with great esteem and affection by St. Paul, who joins his name with his own in the inscription of six of his Epistles. He is sometimes called bishop of Ephesus, and it has been said that he suffered martyrdom in that city some years after the death of St. Paul.

Several learned men think that the First Epistle to Timothy was written subsequent to St. Paul's first imprisonment at Rome, and therefore, after the period at which the Acts of the Apostles end: and as St. Paul was liberated in the year 63, the writing of this Epistle, and the journey to which it refers, have been placed in the year 64. The principal design of this Epistle was to give instructions to Timothy concerning the management of the church of Ephesus; and it was probably intended that this Epistle should be read publicly to the Ephesians, that they might know upon what authority Timothy acted.

That the Second Epistle to Timothy was written while Paul was under confinement at Rome, appears from the two following passages:—'Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me his prisoner.' (i. 8.) 'The Lord give mercy unto the house of Onesiphorus, for he oft refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my chain, but when he was in Rome he sought me out very diligently, and found me,' (i. 16, 17.) And if we have done rightly in dating the First Epistle to Timothy, after St. Paul's first imprisonment at Rome, it will follow that this Second Epistle must have been written during his second imprisonment in that city, and probably in the year 65, not long before his death. It is by no means certain where Timothy was, when this Epistle was written to him. It seems most probable that he was somewhere in Asia Minor, since St. Paul desires him to bring the cloak with him which he had left at Troas (iv. 13.); and also, at the end of the first chapter, he speaks of several persons whose residence was in Asia. St. Paul, after his usual salutation, assures Timothy of his most affectionate remembrance; he speaks of his own apostleship, and of his sufferings, exhorts Timothy to be steadfast in the true faith (i.); to be constant and diligent in the discharge of his ministerial office; to avoid foolish and unlearned questions; and to practise and inculcate the great duties of the Gospel (ii.); he describes the apostacy and general wickedness of the last days, and highly commends the Holy Scriptures (iii.); he again solemnly exhorts Timothy to diligence; speaks of his own danger, and of his hope of future reward; and concludes with several private directions, and with salutations, (iv.) Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. i. pp. 423—442.

TIRHAKAH, תִּרְחָקָה, signifies inquirer, examiner, or dull observer, whose eyes are stopped, or whose sight is disturbed; otherwise, turtle, or law made dull. Tirhakah, king of Ethiopia, was of the land of Cush, bordering on Palestine and Egypt. This prince, at the head of a powerful army, attempted to relieve Hezekiah, then attacked by Sennacherib. (2 Kings xix. 9.) in the year of the world 3291. Sennacherib was then engaged in the siege of Lachish; yet he raised the siege, and went out to meet him. But the angel of the Lord smote his army that night, and killed of them to the number of a hundred and eighty-five thousand men. It does not appear that this prince had given Tirhakah battle; his army was routed before he came up to him. Tirhakah is called Thearchon by Strabo. This geographer quotes Megasthenes, who related that this prince had carried his conquests as far as Europe, and even to the pillars of Hercules.

TITUS, Τίτος, signifies honourable. Titus, a disciple of St. Paul, was a Gentile by religion and birth, (Gal. ii. 3.) but was probably converted by St. Paul, who calls him his son. (Tit. i. 4.) St. Paul took him with him to Jerusalem, A. D. 49. (Gal. ii. 1.) about the time of the question, Whether the converted Gentiles should become subject to the ceremonies of the law. Some would then have obliged him to circumcise Titus; but neither he nor Titus would consent. He probably accompanied St. Paul in his second apostolical journey, and from that time he seems to have been constantly employed by him in the propagation of the Gospel: he calls him his partner and fellow-helper. (Gal. ii. 1, &c.) Paul sent him from Ephesus with his First Epistle to the Corinthians, and with a commission to inquire into the state of the church at Corinth; and he sent him thither again from Macedonia, with his Second Epistle, and to forward the collections for the 'saints in Judea.' From this time we hear nothing of Titus till he was left by Paul in Crete, after his first imprisonment at Rome, 'to set in order the things that were wanting, and to ordain elders in every city.' (Tit. i. 5.) It is probable that he went thence to join St. Paul at Nicopolis, (Tit. iii. 12.) that they went together to Crete to visit the churches there, and thence to Rome. During St. Paul's second imprisonment at Rome, Titus went into Dalmatia, (2 Tim. iv. 10.); and after the apostle's death, he is said to have returned into Crete, and to have died there in the ninety-fourth year of his age: he is often called bishop of Crete by ecclesiastical writers. St. Paul always speaks of Titus in terms of high regard, and entrusted him, as we have seen, with commissions of great importance.

It is by no means certain from what place St. Paul wrote his First Epistle to Titus. But as he desires Titus to come to him at Nicopolis [probably in Epirus], and declares his intention of passing the winter there, some have supposed that, when he wrote it, he was in the neighbourhood of that city, either in Greece or Macedonia (Titus iii. 12.); others have imagined that he wrote it from Colosse. As it appears that St. Paul, not long before he wrote this Epistle, had left Titus in Crete, for the purpose of regulating the affairs of the church, and at the time he wrote it had determined to pass the approaching winter at Nicopolis, and as the Acts of the Apostles do not give any account of St. Paul's preaching in that island, or of visiting that city, it is concluded that this Epistle was written after his first imprisonment at Rome, and probably in the year 64. The principal design of this Epistle was to give instructions to Titus concerning the management of the churches in the different cities of the island of Crete, and it was probably intended to be read publicly to the Cretans, that they might know upon what authority Titus acted. St. Paul, after his usual salutation, intimates that he was appointed an apostle by the express command of God, and reminds Titus of the reason of his being left in Crete; he describes the qualifications necessary for bishops, and cautions him against persons of bad principles, especially Judaizing teachers, whom he directs Titus to reprove with severity; he informs him what instructions he should give to people in different situations of life, and exhorts him to be exemplary in his own conduct; he points out the pure and practical nature of the Gospel, and enumerates some particular virtues which he was to inculcate, avoiding foolish questions and frivolous disputes; he tells him how he is to behave towards heretics, and ends with salutations.—Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. i. pp. 444—447.

TOLERATION, says Dr. Paley, 'is of two kinds; the allowing to dissenters the unmolested profession and exercise of their religion, with an exclusion from offices of trust and emolument in the state; which is a partial toleration: and the admitting of them, without distinction, to all the civil privileges and capacities of other citizens; which is a complete toleration. The expediency of toleration, and consequently the right of every citizen to demand it, as far as relates to liberty of conscience, and the claim of being protected in the free and safe profession of his religion, is sufficiently evident. The advancement, and discovery of truth, is that end to which all regulations concerning religion ought principally to be adapted. Hence, every species of intolerance which enjoins suppression and silence, and every species of persecution which enforces such injunctions, is adverse to the progress of truth, since it causes that to be fixed by one set of men, at one time, which is much better, and with much more probability of success, left to the independent and progressive inquiries of separate individuals. Truth results from discussion and from controversy; is investigated by the labours and researches of private persons. Whatever, therefore, prohibits these, obstructs that industry and that liberty, which it is the common interest of mankind to promote. In religion, as in other subjects, truth, if left to itself, will almost always obtain the ascendancy. If different religions be professed in the same country, and the minds of men remain unfettered and unawed by intimidations of law, that religion which is founded in maxims of reason and credibility, will gradually gain over the other to it. It is not meant that men will formally renounce their ancient religion, but that they will adopt into it the more rational doctrines, the improvements and discoveries of the neighbouring sect; by which means the worse religion, without the ceremony of a reformation, will insensibly assimilate itself to the better.

‘Concerning the admission of dissenters from the established religion to offices and employments in the public service, which is necessary to render toleration complete, doubts have been entertained, with some appearance of reason. It is possible that such religious opinions may be holden, as are utterly incompatible with the necessary functions of civil government; and which opinions consequently disqualify those who maintain them from exercising any share in its administration. I perceive, however, no reason why men of different religious persuasions may not sit upon the same bench, deliberate in the same council, or fight in the same ranks, as well as men of various or opposite opinions upon any controverted topic of natural philosophy, history, or ethics. There are two cases in which test-laws are wont to be applied, and in which, if in any, they may be defended. One is, where two or more religions are contending for establishment; and where there appears no way of putting an end to the contest, but by giving to one religion such a decided superiority in the legislature and government of the country, as to secure it against danger from any other. I own that I should assent to this precaution with many scruples. If the dissenters from the establishment become a majority of the people, the establishment itself ought to be altered or qualified.

‘The second case of exclusion, and in which the measure is more easily vindicated, is that of a country in which some disaffection to the subsisting government happens to be connected with certain religious distinctions. The state undoubtedly has a right to refuse its power and its confidence to those who seek its destruction. If, therefore, the generality of any religious sect entertain dispositions hostile to the constitution, and if government have no other way of knowing its enemies than by the religion which they profess, the professors of that religion may justly be excluded from offices of trust and authority. But even here it should be observed, that it is not against the religion that government shuts its doors, but against those political principles, which, however independent they may be of any article of religious faith, the members of that communion are found in fact to hold. Nor would the legislator make religious tenets the test of men’s inclinations towards the state, if he could discover any other that was equally certain and notorious. The result of our examination of those general tendencies, by which every interference of civil government in matters of religion ought to be tried, is this: that a comprehensive national religion, guarded by a few articles of peace and conformity, together with a legal provision for the clergy of that religion; and with a complete toleration of all dissenters from the established church, without any other limitation or exception, than what arises from the conjunction of dangerous political dispositions with certain religious tenets, appears to be, not only the most just and liberal, but the wisest and safest system which a state can adopt; inasmuch as it unites the several perfections which a religious constitution ought to aim at:—liberty of conscience, with means of instruction; the progress of truth, with the peace of society; the right of private judgment, with the care of the public safety.’

Milton, whose tenets will not be suspected as adverse either to civil or religious liberty, contends that Papists are not proper subjects of toleration, on the following political and religious considerations: 1. Their intolerance and avowed hostility to the members of all other Christian churches except their own, counting them both heretics and schismatics, excluding them from salvation, and persecuting them, when in their power, with the utmost barbarity; 2. Their mischievous state-activities (as he quaintly styles their political intrigues) incessantly labouring to undermine and overturn, either covertly or openly, all Protestant governments that have been so incautious or imprudent as to give them footing. The Pope, ever since we have shaken off his Babylonish yoke, has incessantly endeavoured to destroy the government, and seduce and pervert the people from their allegiance. 3. The idolatrous nature of their worship, such as cannot be exercised pub-lily without grievous scandal to all conscientious Christians, and neither publicly nor privately, without the most heinous offence to a jealous God, who abhors all manner of idolatry, in public, (Exod. xx. 5.) and in private. (Isaiah lxvi. 17. Ezek. viii. 7—16.) Such abominations, wherever they are licensed or countenanced by the state, tend, sooner or later, to draw down God's judgments upon that people or nation. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book ii. p. 1369; Paley's Moral and Political Philosophy, vol. ii. pp. 334—345.

TORMENTS, future. Different opinions have been formed respecting the duration of future torments. By some it is said, that 'since God is a Being, whose goodness and mercy are indisputably infinite, he may naturally be expected to overlook inconsiderable errors; and even when he does punish, to observe a proportion between offences and punishments, and not punish temporary sins by inflicting eternal suffering, because that is unjust; he is bound by his nature and attributes to be merciful as well as just; and therefore not to make the greater portion of his intelligent creatures for ever unhappy.' But to this it is replied, that the Scriptures sufficiently caution us against relying on mere mercy, 'uncovered mercy,' by being assured that 'the wrath of God abideth on' unbelievers, and that 'he shall have judgment without mercy, that hath showed no mercy.' (John iii. 36. James ii. 13.) If God is bound by his own nature to be merciful to his frail creatures, and to restore them to his favour after they have expiated their sins by intense suffering of limited duration, the work of redemption by Jesus Christ must be unnecessary. Hence this argument nearly destroys all obligation to Jesus Christ for dying to expiate human guilt; and it imputes to a Being of unbounded wisdom, justice, and love, the injustice of bruising his dearly-beloved Son, of putting him to grief and shame, and leading him to an ignominious death, to cancel the sins of mankind, which he was bound to forgive without any such sacrifice. The loss of the chief good, and exclusion from heaven, are the necessary consequences of transgression; and a consciousness of this loss, as well as remorse and self-condemnation on account of it, naturally follow from the existence of the soul; these may constitute the venom of 'the worm that never dies,' and the fierceness of 'the fire that is not quenched;' and it is easy to see that it may be perfectly equitable in the Divine Being, to suffer these to continue. It by no means follows that, because impenitent sinners will be eternally punished, God makes the greater portion of his intelligent creatures for ever unhappy. Let it be recollected, that at least half the children which are born, die before they are seven years old, and are, doubtless, happy in a future world, their faculties being expanded so as to prepare them for the full enjoyment of heaven; that such of the heathen as 'do by nature the things contained in the law,' and whose consciences 'excuse' or acquit them, conformably to the true meaning of the apostle, (Rom. ii. 14, 15.) will be admitted into bliss for the Redeemer's sake; that though, for ages, true Christians may have been the minority, yet a time will come, and that not of short duration, when 'the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea' (Isaiah xi. 9.): let these, I say, be recollected, and duly considered, and there will not remain the shadow of a suspicion, that the greater part of mankind will be eternally miserable.

The grand current of the arguments against the eternal duration of future torments, flows from the affirmed limited meaning of the words αἰὼν αἰώνιον, &c. There is certainly no allusion to either ultimate virtue or happiness in the express declaration, 'these shall go away into everlasting punishment; but the righteous into life eternal;' or, at least, if the wicked may extract a grain of hope from so strong a passage, the righteous have equal reason to dread that, after a similar duration, they may lapse from virtue and happiness into wickedness and misery; and thus the good and the bad may change places at the termination of that æonian period, which is here alike placed before each class of persons. It can never be consistent with sound criticism, to interpret the same word used twice, in the same sentence and connexion, and in both directly applicable to the soul, which is naturally immortal, so as to indicate eternity in the one instance, and terminable in the other. But we are told that the word αἰώνιος is sometimes employed to express a limited but very long duration, and is three or four times, perhaps, so used in Scripture; being, indeed, derived from αἰών, which denotes duration or continuance of time, but with great variety; and therefore it can never mean eternity. This Greek word, which is so frequently used in Scripture with regard to a future world, expresses correctly a proper eternity. In Rev. xx. 10. the phrase εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων, is so energetic, that if it do not fully signify eternity to come, nothing in the Greek language does. In 2 Cor. iv. ult., the things which are seen, all things visible or material, the world and every thing in it, are put in complete opposition to the unseen future state; the things which are seen being said to be for a short time (or temporary) while the things which are not seen are everlasting.

The awful picture of the duration and terrible nature of future torments exhibited in St. Mark's Gospel, is calculated to produce the deepest conviction in the minds of all who receive the Scriptures as the word of God. 'If thy hand offend thee, cut it off: it is better for thee to enter into life maimed, than having two hands, to go into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched: where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. And if thy foot offend thee, cut it off: it is better for thee to enter halt into life, than having two feet, to be cast into hell, into the fire that never shall be quenched: where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. And if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out: it is better for thee to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye, than having two eyes, to be cast into hell fire: where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched. For every one shall be salted with fire.' (Mark ix. 43—49.) The expression, 'where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched,' is reiterated with solemn and dreadful energy: and the declaration, 'every one shall be salted with fire,' implies, if it imply any thing, that as salt preserves from putrefaction flesh to which it is applied, so those unhappy victims of Divine justice, shall be salted with fire, and, instead of being consumed by it, shall, in the wretched abodes to which they are consigned, continue immortal in the midst of their flames. How far the misery of the eternal state will be corporeal, and how far mental, cannot be so easily determined.

A late writer observes, that 'though future torments are most evidently and expressly revealed in Holy Scripture, yet men are very unwilling to believe it, and strive all they can to cavil at and oppose what really is most clear and certain. There are some who conjecture that sinners will be consumed in hell-fire, or turned into nothing. But this is a vain imagination; it being evident, that mankind are endued with immortal souls, and designed to endure for ever. This is the excellency and dignity of our nature; and the Scriptures also assure us, that there will be a resurrection both of the just and unjust. The bodies of wicked men will be raised and re-united to their immortal souls; and at the resurrection, what before was corruptible, will then become incorruptible and immortal. But this need not be, were they not to endure for ever. For can we suppose, that the bodies of wicked men should be raised immortal, only to appear before God's tribunal, and immediately after judgment to be consumed in hell-fire? Besides, the Scripture assures us, that the torments of sinners are everlasting; but this is only possible on beings that exist to all eternity; for what does not exist, cannot be said to suffer torment. The apostle declares, that sinners shall be punished with everlasting destruction; which would be a very improper expression, if they were only to be everlastingly destroyed.'

Some will not believe what they cannot comprehend;—others what cannot be demonstrated;—many what opposes their corrupt passions and inclinations;—others what militates against human pride and self-righteousness:—and others what must fill their guilty consciences with the most alarming fears. Hence the denial, as of other fundamental truths of Christianity, so also of the eternal duration of future punishments: and, as has been well observed on this subject by an able divine, few complain 'that eternal punishments are too severe, but those for whom they are not severe enough to keep them from them.' This is one thing, it is true, of which we cannot have ocular demonstration; but to believe punishment to be not eternal, is to return to the discarded notion of purgatory; or that those who have not duly repented and believed upon earth, may be reformed by sufferings after death. TRACHONITIS, Τραχωνίτις, signifies rough, strong. St. Luke (iii. 1.) speaks of Trachonitis; he says, that in the fifteenth year of Tiberius, Philip, son of Herod the Great, was tetrarch of Iturea, and of Trachonitis. This province had Arabia Deserta east, Batanea west, Iturea south, and the country of Damascus north. Trachonitis is often ascribed to Arabia; to which it rather belongs than to Palestine. Josephus says, it is situated between Palestine and Cælo-Syria, and was peopled by Hush, or Chush, the son of Aram. The road to Trachonitis lay toward the lake Phiala, where were the sources of the Jordan. This province was full of rocks, which served to harbour a great number of thieves and robbers, who often found employment for Herod the Great, as may be seen in Josephus. Eusebius says, that the tribe of Manasseh extended into Trachonitis, towards Bostra, and elsewhere, that Iturea penetrated also into Trachonitis, and into the desert that was near Bostra. Jerome says, that Trachonitis is beyond Bostra, inclining towards Damascus. Strabo speaks of two mountains called Trachones, which were above Damascus, towards Arabia and Iturea, where are steep mountains with caves in them that would afford retreats to a thousand men.

TRANSFIGURATION. After our Saviour had inquired of his disciples, what men thought of him? and, what they themselves thought of him? St. Peter answered, That he was the Son of the living God. Then Jesus Christ began to speak of his passion, which was at hand. (Matt. xvi.

28.) adding, 'Verily, I say unto you, there be some standing here which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom.' Six days after this promise, 'Jesus taketh Peter, James, and John his brother, and bringeth them up into an high mountain apart, and was transfigured before them, and his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light: and behold there appeared unto them Moses and Elias talking with him.' It is observable, that Matthew (xvii. 1.) says, this took place six days after the promise; but Luke (ix. 28.) mentions eight days, probably because he counted inclusively, reckoning the day of the promise, and the day of the execution; whereas, the other evangelist had regard only to the six intermediate days. One evangelist also says about eight days; the other, after six days.

Mount Tabor, in Galilee, is usually supposed to have been the scene of this wondrous transaction, in which Jesus unveiled a portion of his divine glory, even in the flesh, as the only genuine Son of God. But there is reason to doubt the correctness of the tradition. It seems rather to have been some mountain near Cesarea Philippi; for Jesus did not return to Galilee until some time after this transaction. (Matt. xvii. 22. Mark ix. 30.) Lightfoot on Mark (ix. 2.) ingeniously conjectures that it was the highest mountain of that country, according to Josephus, hanging over the springs of Jordan, at the foot of which Cesarea Philippi was built; which had been the scene of the early idolatry of the Danites, but now of the presence of the eternal Son of God. Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book ii. p. 795.

TRANSUBSTANTIATION, the conversion or change of the substance of the bread and wine in the eucharist into the body and blood of Jesus Christ, which the members of the Church of Rome suppose to be wrought by the consecration of the priest. They 'profess, that in the mass there is offered unto God, a true, proper, and propitiatory sacrifice for the quick and the dead, and that, in the most holy sacrament of the eucharist, there is truly, really, and substantially, the body and blood, together with the soul and divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ; and that there is a conversion made of the whole substance of the bread into the body, and of the whole substance of the wine into the blood; which conversion the whole Catholic Church call Transubstantiation.'

The idea of Christ's bodily presence in the eucharist was first started in the beginning of the eighth century, and it owed its rise to the indiscretion of preachers and writers of warm imaginations, who, instead of explaining judiciously the lofty figures of Scripture language upon this subject, understood and urged them in their literal sense. Thus the true meaning of these expressions was grossly perverted; but as this conceit seemed to exalt the nature of the holy sacrament, it was eagerly received in that ignorant and superstitious age: and when once introduced, it soon spread, and was by degrees carried farther and farther, by persons still less guarded in their application of these metaphorical phrases, till at length, in the twelfth century, the actual change of the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ, by the consecration of the priest, was pronounced to be a Gospel truth, by the pretended authority of the Church of Rome.

In arguing against this doctrine, we may first observe, that it is contradicted by our senses, since we see and taste that the bread and wine after the consecration, and when we actually receive them, still continue to be bread and wine without any change or alteration whatever. And again, was it possible for Christ, when he instituted the Lord's Supper, to take his own body and his own blood into his own hands, and deliver them to every one of his apostles? Or was it possible for the apostles to understand our Saviour's command to drink his blood literally, when they were forbidden, under the severest penalties, to taste blood by the law of Moses, of which not only they themselves, but Christ also, had been strict observers? They expressed not the slightest surprise or reluctance, when Christ delivered to them the bread and wine; which could not have been the case, had they conceived themselves commanded to eat the real body, and drink the real blood, of their Lord and Master. The bread and wine must have been considered by them as symbolical; and indeed the whole transaction was evidently figurative in all its parts; it was instituted when the Jews, by killing the paschal lamb, commemorated their deliverance from Egyptian bondage by the hand of Moses, which was typical of the deliverance of all mankind from the bondage of sin by the death of Christ, the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world; and as the occasion was typical, so likewise were the words used by our Saviour: 'This is my body which is broken, and this is my blood which is shed.' But his body was not yet broken, nor was his blood yet shed; and therefore, the breaking of the bread, and the pouring out of the wine, were then figurative of what was about to happen, as they are now figurative of what has actually happened. He also said, 'This cup is the New Testament in my blood,' (1 Cor. xi. 25.) which words could not be meant in a literal sense; the cup could not be changed into a covenant, though it might be a representation or memorial of it. Our Saviour called the wine, after it was consecrated, the 'fruit of the vine,' (Matt. xxvi. 29.) which implied that no change had taken place in its real nature. The fathers constantly call the consecrated elements, the figures, the signs, the symbols, the types, and antitypes, the commemoration, the representation, the mysteries, and the sacraments of the body and blood of Christ; which expressions plainly show that they did not consider the bread and wine as changed into the very substance of Christ's body and blood. Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. ii. pp. 480—486; Nightingale's Portraiture of the Roman Catholic Religion, p. 310.

TRINITARIANS, is a name applied to all those who profess to believe the doctrine of the Trinity, in opposition to Arians and Socinians, who style themselves Unitarians and Anti-Trinitarians. A great proportion of the Trinitarians receive the creed that goes under the name of Athanasius; and to these only should the term Athanasian be applied, and not to all Trinitarians, as is sometimes the case. The Presbyterians in Scotland, and the three classes of Protestant dissenters in England in general, with many others, both at home and abroad, are Trinitarians, but do not receive the Nicene or the Athanasian creeds, though they hold the substance of the doctrine which they contain; they therefore cannot properly be called Athanasians.

Notwithstanding the strongest evidence that is constantly given them to the contrary, the Jews and others still insist that Trinitarians destroy the Divine Unity, and worship three Gods, and, of consequence, are Tritheists; a name which is not, perhaps, applicable to any class of Christians in our day. Even Crellius, who has been reckoned the most acute of the Socinians, is candid enough to acknowledge, that they who hold the Trinity, are not justly chargeable with believing more Gods than one, because of the strict unity which they maintain to subsist in the Divine Essence.

The enemies of the doctrine of the Trinity insist, that it was an invention of the first ages of the church; or, that it was borrowed from the Platonic school. But in the opinion of its friends, the understanding of man can never be more grossly insulted, than when such people labour to persuade them, that a truth, so awfully sublime as that of the Trinity, could ever be the offspring of human invention; nor, according to them, can history be more violated, than when it is made to assign the origin of this doctrine to Plato, or to any of the schools of Greece.

Most writers, before Vossius, took it for granted, that what is called the Athanasian Creed, was drawn up by Athanasius, Bishop of Alexandria, in the fourth century; but it is now generally thought not to be his, and to have been written originally in Latin, for the use of some part of the Western Church. It is commonly attributed to Vigilius, the African, who lived about the end of the fifth century; but Dr. Waterland concludes, from five reasons which he assigns, that Hilary, Bishop of Arles, about the year 430, composed the Exposition of Faith, which now bears the name of the Athanasian Creed, for the use of the Gallican clergy, and particularly those of the diocese of Arles.' This creed obtained in France, about A.D. 850, and was received in Spain and Germany about 100 or 180 years later. It was in common use in some parts of Italy in 960, and was received at Rome about 1014. And we have clear proofs of its having been sung alternately in the churches of Britain in the tenth century. We do not learn, however, that it ever had the sanction of any council; nor is it yet to be fully ascertained, how far it is acknowledged by the Greek and Eastern churches. As to the matter of this creed, according to all those that embrace its doctrines, it is a summary of the true orthodox faith, and a condemnation of all heresies, respecting the object of our faith, both ancient and modern. But, unhappily, it has proved a fruitful source of controversy; for, because there are some clauses in it which threaten damnation to all those who do not give their assent to the doctrines laid down in it, some, even of those who do assent to them, have taken occasion from thence to object against the use of it altogether. It is not, however, so much from a dislike to these clauses, that a great proportion of Trinitarians, namely, the Presbyterians, &c. have not formally adopted this and the Nicene Creed; as from the difficulty, in their minds, of reconciling some passages in them to the Scriptural doctrine of Three Persons in one Essence: particularly, 'Light of Light, God of God'; as, say they, 'there can be no communication of the Divine Essence,—no derivation of essence, but of personality only.' By following up these expressions far beyond their original design, they further observe, some have fallen into Arianism, even when writing against it. See ATHANASIAN and NICENE CREEDS.

Whilst Unitarians address God in the person of the Father only, Trinitarians and Athanasians pray to one God in three persons; and they, in general, look for acceptance, and an answer to their prayers, only through the merits and mediation of Christ. Almost all professing Christians, the Sabellians, Arians, and Socinians, excepted, believe in the Trinity; but the Greek Church differs from other Trinitarians in maintaining, that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father only, and not from the Father and the Son. See TRINITY. Adam's Religious World Displayed, vol. ii. pp. 101—111.

TRINITY is not a Scriptural term, but was introduced into the church in the second century, to express the union of the three persons in the Godhead. 'Equally above the boldest flight of human genius to invent, as beyond the most extended limit of human intellect fully to comprehend, is the profound mystery of the ever-blessed Trinity. Through successive ages it has remained impregnable to all the shafts of impious ridicule, and unshaken by the bolder artillery of blasphemous invective. It is ever in vain that man essays to pierce the unfathomable arcana of the skies. By his limited faculties, and superficial ken, the deep things of eternity are not to be scanned. Even among Christians the Sacred Trinity is more properly a subject of belief than of investigation; and every attempt to penetrate into it, farther than God, in his holy word, has expressly revealed, is at best an injudicious, and often a dangerous effort of mistaken piety. If we extend our eye through the remote region of antiquity, we shall find this very doctrine, which the primitive Christians are said to have borrowed from the Platonic school, universally and immemorially flourishing in all those Eastern countries where history and tradition have united to fix those virtuous ancestors of the human race, who, for their distinguished attainments in piety, were admitted to a familiar intercourse with Jehovah, and the angels, the divine heralds of his commands,' &c. Mr. Maurice supposes, that the doctrine of a Trinity was delivered from the ancient patriarchs, and diffused over the East, by the migration and dispersion of their Hebrew posterity.

It is, however, evident that the devotions of the ancient church in the apostolical, and every succeeding age, were paid to every person of the Trinity. St. Stephen, the Protomartyr, breathed his last in a prayer to Christ (Acts vii. 59, 60.); and St. Paul always baptized in the name of Christ. (1 Cor. i. 13.) In the second century, Pliny, who took the confession of some revolting Christians, tells us, they declared to him, that they used to meet on a certain day, before it was light, and, among other parts of their worship, sing a hymn to Christ, as their God. Not long after this lived Polycarp, who joins God the Father, and the Son, together, in his prayers for grace and benediction upon men. Soon after lived Justin Martyr, who, to exculpate Christians from the charge of Atheism brought against them, declares that they worshipped the God of righteousness, and his Son, as also the Holy Spirit of prophecy. Minucius Felix, in answer to an objection, that the Christians worshipped a crucified man, says, He whom they worshipped was God, and not a mere mortal man. Irenæus, speaking of the miracles wrought by the Christians in his time, assures us, they were done, not by magic or enchantment, but by invocation of the name of Christ. To these may be added the testimonies of Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Tertullian, the last writer of the second age. In the third century, we have an illustrious testimony of the worship of Christ, as God, in the fragments of Caius, a Roman presbyter, preserved by Eusebius. And Origen, in particular, asserts the worship of Christ, against the common objection, renewed by Celsus, that the Christians worshipped one who had but lately appeared in the world. Add to these the testimonies of St. Cyprian, Arnobius, and Lactantius. And as that age abounded in martyrs, so those holy men usually directed their last prayer to Christ, in imitation of St. Stephen; instances of which practice are innumerable. Polycarp's doxology is to the whole Trinity; and Justin Martyr declares, that the object of their worship was the whole Trinity. To this they add the testimony of Origen, who, comparing the practice of heathens and Christians, says, that the former having forsaken the Creator, worshipped the creature; but the latter worshipped and adored no creature, but only the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

The doctrine of the Trinity, as professed in the Christian church, is briefly this:—That there is one God, in three distinct Persons, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost: the term Person here characterizing the mode of subsistence in the Essence, which the Greek Fathers called Hypostasis. The Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, are believed to be three distinct Persons in the Divine nature, because the Holy Scriptures, in speaking of these Three, do distinguish them from one another, as we use, in common speech, to distinguish three several persons; and each of these Three Persons is affirmed to be God, because the names, properties, and operations of God, are, in Scripture, attributed to each of them.

The Athanasian Creed makes the Supreme Being to consist of Three Persons, the same in substance, equal in power and glory. The first of those Three Persons it makes to be the Father; the second Person is called the Son, and is said to be descended from the Father, by an eternal generation of an ineffable and incomprehensible nature in the essence of the Godhead; the third Person is the Holy Ghost, derived from the Father and the Son, but not by generation, as the Son is derived from the Father, but by an eternal and incomprehensible procession. Each of these Persons is very and eternal God, as much as the Father himself; and yet, though distinguished in this manner, they do not make three Gods, but one God. 'The Catholic faith is this,—that we worship one God in Trinity, and Trinity in Unity: for there is one Person of the Father, another of the Son, and another of the Holy Ghost. But the Godhead of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, is all one; the glory equal, the majesty co-eternal.'

This system also includes in it the belief of two natures in Jesus Christ, namely, the divine and human, subsisting in one person. The Divinity of Jesus Christ is proved from the following texts, among many others. St. John says, 'The Word was God' (John i. 1.); St. Paul, that 'God was manifested in the flesh, (1 Tim. iii. 16.); that Christ is 'over all, God blessed for ever.' (Rom. ix. 5.) Eternity is attributed to the Son; 'the Son hath life in himself' (John v. 26.) Perfection of knowledge; 'As the Father knoweth me, so know I the Father.' (John x. 15.) The creation of all things; 'All things were made by him, and without him was not any thing made that was made.' (John i. 3.) And we are commanded to 'honour the Son, as we honour the Father.' (John v. 23.) St. Paul exhorts the Philippians to the practice of humility from the example of Christ Jesus, 'who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God; but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men; and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross: wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.' (Phil. ii. 6—11.) In this text, the divinity of Christ, both before his incarnation and after his ascension, is clearly pointed out: 'Being in the form of God,' signifies being really God, just as, 'took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men,' signifies that he was really a man in a low and mean condition; and the following words, 'thought it not robbery to be equal with God,' expressly declare Christ's equality with God. Indeed this passage, taken in its its obvious sense, so decisively proves the divinity of Christ, that those who deny that doctrine give a different meaning to one part of it, and assert that another part is wrongly translated. But the reasoning, according to the common interpretation, is clear and strong; for the apostle exhorts the Philippians to imitate the example of Christ's humility, who, though a divine person, voluntarily condescended to assume the lowest condition of human nature, and to submit to a cruel and ignominious death. The latter part of the passage states, that in consequence, and as a reward of his humiliation, 'God highly exalted him, and gave him a name which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.' This exaltation of Christ, after his ascension into heaven, seems to indicate the glorified state of his human nature, just as his appearance and sufferings upon earth, were the humiliation of his divine nature.—St. Peter, in his First Epistle, represents Christ as enabling the prophets to foretell his own coming, with his sufferings, and the glory which was to succeed them: 'of which salvation the prophets have inquired and searched diligently, who prophesied of the grace that should come unto you: searching what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow' (1 Pet. i. 10, 11.): this passage, therefore, proves both the pre-existence and divinity of Christ. 'Without controversy,' says St. Paul, 'great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory.' (1 Tim. iii. 16.) All these six propositions, of which God is the subject, are true of Christ, and of no other person; he was 'manifest in the flesh;' Christ appeared upon earth in a human form, with the flesh and all other properties of a man, sin only excepted:—'Justified in the Spirit;' the visible descent of the Holy Ghost upon Christ at the time of his baptism; the extraordinary powers which he then received, and afterwards exercised, and the performance of his promise by sending the Holy Ghost to his Apostles, and enabling them to work miracles, proved him to be the true Messiah, and justified those high pretensions which he asserted during his ministry: 'seen of angels;' angels worshipped Christ at his first appearance upon earth, announced his birth to the shepherds, ministered to him in the desert, and strengthened him in his last agony in the garden:—'preached unto the Gentiles;' the doctrines taught by Christ to the Jews only, were by his command afterwards preached by his apostles to the Gentiles also, who were invited to embrace the Gospel, thus declared to be the universal religion of all mankind: 'believed on in the world;' that many believed Jesus to be the true Messiah, is a fact admitted by all, and indeed the rapid propagation of the Gospel is always urged by Christians as one of the many evidences by which its divine origin is established:—'received up into glory;' Christ having completed his ministry, and continued upon earth forty days after his resurrection, was received up into glory by visibly ascending into heaven in the presence of his apostles. Since then these six propositions are applicable to Christ, and to Christ alone, and since St. Paul affirms them to be true of God, it follows that Christ is God. 'All these propositions,' says Bishop Pearson, 'cannot be understood of any other, which either is, or is called, God; for, though we grant the divine perfections and attributes to be the same with the divine essence, yet are they never in the Scriptures called God, nor can any of them, with the least show of probability, be pretended as the subject of these propositions, or afford any tolerable interpretation. When they tell us that God, that is, the will of God, was manifested in the flesh, that is, was revealed by frail and mortal men, and received up into glory, that is, was received gloriously on earth, they teach us a language which the Scriptures know not, and the Holy Ghost never used; and as no attribute, so no person but the Son, can be here understood under the name of God; not the Holy Ghost, for he is distinguished from him as being justified in the Spirit; not the Father, who was not manifested in the flesh, nor received up into glory. It remaineth therefore, that whereas the Son is the only person to whom all these clearly and undoubtedly belong, which are here jointly attributed unto God, as sure as the name of God is universally expressed in the copies of the original language, so that absolutely and subjectively taken must it be understood of Christ.'

On the divinity of the Holy Ghost, see HOLY GHOST.

The doctrine of the Trinity is called a mystery, because we are not able to comprehend the particular manner of the existence of the three persons in the divine nature. But though a doctrine be above reason, Trinitarians observe, it is not, therefore, contrary to reason; and the Divine nature being infinite, must consequently be above our comprehension. As to the seeming contradiction of an Unity in Trinity, and Trinity in Unity, that is, of One being Three, and Three One, it is not affirmed, that they are one and three in the same respect; that the Divine essence can be but one, and, therefore, there can be no more Gods than one; but because the Scriptures, which assure us of the unity of the Divine essence, do likewise with the Father join the Son and Holy Ghost, in the same attributes, operations, and worship, therefore they are capable of number, as to their relation to each other, though not as to their essence, which is but one.

But notwithstanding all that is revealed on the subject of the ever-blessed Trinity, (and it must be admitted on all hands, that enough is revealed for our necessary information, in our present state of existence,) it is allowed that there is still much above our comprehension, and that whatever may be inexplicable should be charged to the weakness of our understandings, and not to the absurdity of the doctrine itself. 'He,' says Bishop Taylor, 'who goes about to speak of the mystery of the Trinity, and does it by words and names of man's invention, talking of essences and existences, hypostases, and personalities, priorities in co-equalities, and unity in pluralities, may amuse himself, and build a tabernacle in his head, and talk something he knows not what; but the good man that feels the power of the Father, and to whom the Son is become wisdom, sanctification, and redemption, in whose heart the love of the Spirit of God is shed abroad; this man, though he understands nothing of what is unintelligible, yet he alone truly understands the Christian doctrine of the Trinity.'

The Christian Trinity is not a trinity of principles, like that of the Persian philosophers; it does not consist of mere logical notions, and inadequate conceptions of the Deity, like that of Plato; but it is a Trinity of subsistences or persons, joined by an indissoluble union. 'By person is not meant,' says Bishop Burnet, when speaking on this subject, 'such a being as we commonly understand by that word, a complete intelligent being, distinct from every other being; but only that every one of that blessed Three, has a peculiar distinction in himself, by which he is truly different from the other two.'

'Say not,' observes Bishop Horne, that the doctrine of the Trinity is a matter of curiosity and amusement only. Our religion is founded upon it; for what is Christianity, but a manifestation of the three divine persons, as engaged in the great work of man's redemption, begun, continued, and to be ended by them, in their several relations of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, Creator, Redeemer, and Sanctifier, three persons one God? If there be no Son of God, where is our redemption? If there be no Holy Spirit, where is our sanctification? Without both, where is our salvation? And if these two persons be any thing less than Divine, why are we baptized, equally, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost? Let no man therefore deceive you: "This is the true God, and eternal life." TRO'AS, Τρωάς, signifies penetrated. Troas was a city of Phrygia, or of Mysia, on the Hellespont, between the city of Troy north, and the city of Assos south. Sometimes the name of Troas, or the Troad, signifies the whole country of the Trojans, the province where the ancient city of Troy had stood. But in the New Testament, in which the word Troas is found, it signifies a city of this name, which also is sometimes called Antigonía and Alexandria. Sometimes both names are united, Alexandria-Troas. St. Paul was at Troas A.D. 50, (Acts xvi. 8, &c.) when he had a vision in the night, of a man of Macedonia, who requested Gospel assistance. He embarked, therefore, at Troas, and passed over into Macedonia: the apostle was several other times at Troas; but we know nothing of his transactions there. (Acts xx. 5, 6. 2 Cor. ii. 12.) He left behind him at Troas, in the custody of Carpus, some clothes and books, which he desired Timothy to bring with him to Rome, A.D. 65, a little before St. Paul's death. (2 Tim. iv. 13.)

TROPHIMUS, Τρόφιμος, signifies well-educated or brought up. Trophimus was a disciple of St. Paul, a Gentile by religion, and an Ephesian by birth. After St. Paul had converted him, he adhered constantly to him, nor quitted him ever after. He came from Ephesus to Corinth with the apostle, and accompanied him in his whole journey from Corinth to Jerusalem, A.D. 58. (Acts xx. 4.) When St. Paul was in the temple there, the Jews laid hold of him, crying out, he hath 'brought Greeks also into the temple, and hath polluted this holy place:' this they said, because certain Jews of Ephesus having seen St. Paul in the city, accompanied by Trophimus, whom they looked upon as a Gentile, imagined that St. Paul had introduced him into the temple. Trophimus afterwards accompanied St. Paul; for that apostle wrote to Timothy, that he had left Trophimus sick at Miletus. (2 Tim. iv. 20.) This circumstance proves, if any proof were wanting, that St. Paul was twice a prisoner at Rome; for Trophimus, at the time of his first journey to Miletus, had not been left there, since we read of his arrival in Judea. (Acts xx. 15.) Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. p. 629.

TRUST IN GOD, signifies that confidence in, or dependence we place on him. Trust in God is a duty we owe him as our creator, and the supreme governor of the world. This duty implies an entire resignation to the wisdom, a dependence on the power, and a firm assurance of the goodness and veracity of God. On him we must rely to supply us with all things needful and proper; to give food to our bodies, pardon and grace to our souls. Should our temporal projects be full of danger, or the days of sorrow actually overtake us, we must still repose ourselves on God, who loves us as his children; and when he corrects us, does it with the mercy of a father, and will, in the end, make all things work together for our good. 'Though he slay me,' says Job, 'yet will I trust in him.' Nay, if we have offended him by our sins, provoked him to withdraw the comforts of his Holy Spirit, and to hide his face from us; yet still we must place our whole trust in him, and depend on the promises he has made through Christ, that he will forgive the truly penitent, and again receive him to mercy and favour.

This duty also implies, that we should not confide in any inferior beings. In order to this, we must put off all trust in ourselves, in our parts, abilities, or acquisitions, how great soever: nor must we solely confide in the friendship, assistance, or services of other men. For no man, how mighty, good, or virtuous soever he is, must be suffered to rival God, as to our trust and confidence in him. For the Holy Spirit hath pronounced him accursed, 'who trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord.' Though we are permitted to cultivate the friendship, and engage the benevolence of men, yet our confidence must terminate in God, from whose bounty we receive, and at whose pleasure we enjoy every blessing; whose appointment every creature, good or evil, is bound to obey, who only is the mighty Lord, that hath power to save and to destroy.

If our inquiries be after present felicity only, how much better is it secured to that man who trusts in God, rather than to him who depends on the creature? The hope of the former is founded on a rock, his soul dwells at ease, secure in the power and affection of his Governor, calm and unconcerned in his pursuits. He commits the event to God, who perfectly knows, and is both able and willing to do, what is best for him. He cheerfully and contentedly enjoys his present blessings, without any solicitude for the future. If things happen contrary to his expectations, he considers that it is the allotment of infinite wisdom and goodness, and therefore submits to the disappointment without murmuring. In times of danger his heart standeth fast. He knows that all things are under the direction of Him, whose power ruleth over all, and who can defend him as with a shield. He considers that God does not willingly grieve his creatures, but has wise and gracious ends in all his dispensations, though at present they may not appear so to us. But how different from this is he who trusts in the creature? Uneasiness and vexation attend him in every stage and event of life; he is in perpetual fear, lest those he relies on should deceive, or be disabled from serving him. When danger becomes imminent, he finds the vanity of his confidence; fearfulness and trembling seize him; he is distracted, irresolute, and diffident of every resource. But when the day of adversity actually overtakes him, he is then completely miserable; he flies from one dependence to another, and finds all either weak or treacherous. The riches and honours in which he gloried avail him nothing; and even the friend on whom he relied, proves false and forsakes him, or looks on with useless pity, and cannot help him. 'He is like a man distressed with thirst in the parched places of the wilderness, in a salt land and not inhabited.' This is the man who has not God for his hope, but trusteth in the multitude of his riches, and strengthens himself in his ungodliness.

Hence it appears, that he who trusts in God has much the advantage as to present felicity; and with respect to futurity he stands alone in his hope and pretensions. His views are to another world, and therefore he regards this with the indifference of a guest, whose stay is uncertain. Yet, he enjoys that peace of conscience and confidence towards God, which afford a perpetual spring of comfort to his soul. He triumphs over death, disarms it of its sting, and even longs to appear in the presence of that God in whom he has trusted, and through whose mercies in Christ he hopes to receive a blessed immortality. Warner's System of Divinity and Morality, vol. iii. pp. 28—33.

TUBAL, תבול, θοβιλ, signifies the earth, the world; otherwise, that is carried, or led; otherwise, confusion. Tubal was the fifth son of Japheth. The Scripture commonly joins together Tubal and Meshech, which makes it thought that they peopled countries bordering on each other. The Chaldee interpreters, by Tubal and Meshech understand Italy and Asia, or rather Ausonia. Josephus thinks Iberia and Cappadocia. Jerome affirms that Tubal represents the Spaniards, heretofore called Iberians. Borchart is very copious to prove, that by Meshech and Tubal are intended the Muscovites and the Tibarenians. (Gen. x. 2.)

TYPE, TYPICAL. These words are not frequently used in Scripture; but what they signify is supposed to be very frequently implied. We usually consider a type as an example, pattern, or general similitude to a person, event, or thing which is to come: and in this it differs from a representation, memorial, or commemoration of an event, &c. which is past.

In the nature of commemorative ordinances, Jews and Christians are agreed: but Christians say further, that many, or most, if not all the sacred institutions among the Jews, were figures, examples, hints, or notices of what was to happen under a more perfect dispensation. Hence a sacrifice, whose blood was shed before God, prefigured a more noble, more dignified blood, which should be shed before God, at some future time: that as such blood was shed to reconcile man and God, to mediate between those otherwise distant parties, so the nobler blood should mediate, with the greatest success, in restoring amity between God and man. They say also, that the dwelling in tabernacles, or booths, prefigured the appearance of a great personage, whose residence in human nature was to him, like a temporary dwelling; as much below his true dignity, as a mere hut or booth is below the dignity of a palace. In like manner, the passover lamb was an instance of a sacrifice, which exempted from evil, while it also prefigured a nobler deliverer (and deliverance) from divine wrath and anger, than could possibly be accomplished in the exemption of Israel from the stroke of the destroying angel which smote the first-born of the Egyptians,—a nobler deliverance from the moral tyranny of sin, than that of the Israelites was from the oppressive dominion of Pharaoh: which deliverance is accomplished by the blood of 'the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world.'

Types also differ from signs, in that signs were occasional, and did not look backward but forward; usually to a point of time but little distant, in the first place, though ultimately to a much more distant event, of whose accomplishment, the accomplishment of the sign was a token, an earnest, and, in some sense, a proof; as it manifested a divine interposition in the subject to which the signs related. So, when Ezekiel, at a great distance from Jerusalem, brought out his goods, and digged through his house, he signified the fate of Jerusalem. So, when Isaiah was ordered to beget a child (a son) by a young woman then a virgin, this being accomplished, was a sign of a much greater birth to be expected in the person of Emmanuel, to whom the prophet expressly directs the reference.

If this be correct, what should prevent types also from looking forward? If it pleased God to encourage the faith and hope of his people by occasional signs, why not also by permanent and lasting (signs) types? Why may not the same ideas be conveyed every day, every year, on public occasions, as now and then, in a less conspicuous manner? But that may be true of public services under a general idea, which it would be imprudent and unadvisable to apply to every minute circumstance attending them. The holy of holies in the Jewish temple may be a figure emblematic of heaven, the residence of God; but it will not therefore be prudent to consider whatever may at any rate, and by any construction, bear a reference to the holy of holies, as therefore assimilated to a correspondent anti-type in heaven.

Whether certain histories which happened in ancient time, were designed as types of future events, it is not presumed to determine: but (1.) it is likely that such histories are recorded, being selected from among many which had occurred, as might be useful lessons, &c. &c. to succeeding ages. (2.) That there being a general conformity in the dispensations of Providence, and grace to different persons, though in different ages, instances of former dispensations may very usefully be held up to the view of later times, and may encourage, or may check, may direct, or may control, those whose circumstances, &c. may be similar to what is recorded, though their times and their places may be widely separated. We have New Testament authority for this practice.

Types may be considered as differing in degrees of that clearness which determines their reference to their anti-type: some may be evident and palpable: some more obscure: others may be referrible in a general or leading sense, or under some particular view; but, if only that general (or that particular) view was originally designed, it is not for us to particularize every division, every ramification, seen under every aspect, and tinged with every hue which the multiplying glass of a fertile imagination may offer to our inspection, or may induce us to admire.

Types should be referred from a less to a greater, as from the death of a beast to the death of a man; from a lower to a higher, as from earth to heaven; from time present to futurity, as from this world to the eternal state; from lesser degrees of perfection to more absolute, as from man to God. If the sacrifice of a lamb availed to restore peace, and to conciliate favour, the sacrifice of a Man in whom dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead, must be infinitely more available to mediate reconciliation: if pardon and exemption from punishment in this world be desirable, justification and deliverance from eternal misery is infinitely more desirable: if the tender feelings of a father in this unequal state, and amidst all the imperfections of the social principles be energetic, what must be the paternal affections of the great Father of all, the Father of our spirits! Whatever is divine is infinite, whatever is infinite eludes our comprehension, and mocks our panting toil, however urged by the most vehement imagination; under this reflection, types may be useful by offering a similitude adapted to our powers; but when that which is perfect is come, that which is imperfect, and partial, that which is feeble and unsatisfactory, shall be done away. Supplement. Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary of the Holy Bible.

TYRE, צור, τύρος, signifies a rock. Tyre or Tyrus, was a famous city of Phenicia. Its Hebrew name is צור, Tsor, or צר, Zor, which signifies a rock. The city of Tyre was allotted to the tribe of Asher (Josh. xix. 29.) with the other maritime cities of the same coast; but it does not appear that the Asherites ever drove out the Canaanites. Isaiah (xxiii. 12.) calls Tyre the daughter of Sidon, that is, a colony from it. Homer never speaks of Tyre, but only of Sidon. Josephus says, that Tyre was built not above two hundred and forty years before the temple of Solomon; which would be in the year of the world 2760, two hundred years after Joshua. Herodotus says, that it was affirmed by the priests of Tyre, that the temple of Hercules, in this city, was built at the same time as the city itself, which was 2300 years before the time of his writing, in the year of the world 3596. By this account Tyre must have been built 656 years before the deluge; which by no means can be admitted. But it may be queried, whether in the passage of Herodotus, we should not read 1300 years. Dr. Hales thinks it probable, that the numeral letter denoting a thousand, has been dropped from the text of Josephus; and this being restored, would give the date of the foundation of Tyre, 2267 years before Christ; which he inclines to consider as correct.

Tyre was twofold, Insular and Continental. Insular Tyre was certainly the most ancient; for this it was which was noticed by Joshua: the continental city, however, as being more commodiously situated, first grew into consideration, and assumed the name of Palætyrus, or Old Tyre. Want of sufficient attention to this distinction has embarrassed both the Tyrian Chronology and Geography. Insular Tyre was confined to a small rocky island, eight hundred paces long, and four hundred broad, and could never exceed two miles in circumference. But Tyre, on the opposite coast, about half a mile from the sea, was a city of vast extent, since many centuries after its demolition by Nebuchadnezzar, the scattered ruins measured nineteen miles round, as we learn from Pliny and Strabo. Of these, the most curious and surprising are, the cisterns of Roselayne, designed to supply the city with water; of which there are three still entire; about one or two furlongs from the sea, so well described by Maundrell, for their curious construction and solid masonry. 'The fountains of these waters,' says he, after the description, 'are as unknown as the contriver of them. According to common tradition, they are filled from a subterraneous river, which king Solomon discovered by his great sagacity; and that he caused these cisterns to be made as part of his recompence to king Hiram, for the materials furnished by that prince towards building the temple at Jerusalem. It is certain, however, from their rising so high above the level of the ground, that they must be brought from some part of the mountains, which are about a league distant; and it is as certain that the work was well done at first, seeing it performs its office so well, at so great a distance of time; the Turks having broken an outlet on the west side of the cistern, through which there issues a stream like a brook, driving four corn mills between it and the sea.' From these cisterns was an aqueduct, which led to the city, supported by arches, about six yards from the ground, running in a northerly direction about an hour, when it turns to the west at a small mount, where anciently stood a fort, but now a mosque, which seems to ascertain the site of the old city; and thence proceeds over the isthmus that connects insular Tyre with the main, built by Alexander, when he besieged and took it.

Old Tyre withstood the mighty Assyrian power, having been besieged in vain, by Shalmaneser, for five years; although he cut off their supplies of water from the cisterns; which they remedied, by digging wells within the city. It afterwards held out thirteen years against Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, and was at length taken; but not until the Tyrians had removed their effects to the insular town, and left nothing but the bare walls to the victor, which he demolished. What completed the destruction of the city was, that Alexander afterwards made use of these materials to build a prodigious causeway, or isthmus, above half a mile long, to the insular city, which revived, as the phoenix, from the ashes of the old, and grew to great power and opulence as a maritime state, and which he stormed after a most obstinate siege of five months. Pococke observes, that 'there are no signs of the ancient city; and as it is a sandy shore, the face of every thing is altered, and the great aqueduct is in many parts almost buried in the sand.' Thus has been fulfilled the prophecy of Ezekiel: 'Thou shalt be built no more: though thou be sought for, yet shalt thou never be found again,' (xxvi. 21.)

The fate of Insular Tyre has been no less remarkable. When Alexander stormed the city, he set fire to it. This circumstance was foretold; 'Tyre did build herself a stronghold, and heaped up silver as the dust, and fine gold as the mire of the streets. Behold the Lord will cast her out, and he will smite her power in the sea, and she shall be devoured with fire.' (Zech. ix. 3, 4.) After this terrible calamity, Tyre again retrieved her losses. Only eighteen years after, she had recovered such a share of her ancient commerce and opulence, as enabled her to stand a siege of fourteen months against Antigonus, before he could reduce the city. After this, Tyre fell alternately under the dominion of the kings of Syria and Egypt, and then of the Romans, until it was taken by the Saracens, about A.D. 639, retaken by the Crusaders, A.D. 1124; and at length sacked and rased by the Mamelukes of Egypt, with Sidon, and other strong towns, that they might no longer harbour the Christians, A.D. 1289.

Maundrell, the most intelligent of modern travellers, who visited the Holy Land A.D. 1697, describes it thus: 'This city, standing in the sea upon a peninsula, promises at a distance something very magnificent; but when you come to it, you find no similitude of that glory for which it was so renowned in ancient times, and which the prophet Ezekiel describes (chap. xxvi. xxvii. xxviii.). On the north side, it has an old Turkish ungarrisoned castle; besides which you see nothing here but a mere Babel of broken walls, pillars, vaults, &c.; there being not so much as one entire house left! Its present inhabitants are only a few poor wretches harbouring themselves in the vaults, and subsisting chiefly by fishing: who seem to be preserved in this place by Divine Providence as a visible argument how God has fulfilled his word concerning Tyre, namely, that it should be as the top of a rock; a place for fishers to dry their nets upon.' (Ezek. xxvi. 14.)

Hesselquist, who saw it in A.D. 1751, observes as follows: 'None of those cities which were formerly famous, are so totally ruined as Tyre (now called Zur), except Troy. Zur now scarcely can be called a miserable village, though it was formerly Tyre, the queen of the sea. Here are about ten inhabitants, Turks and Christians, who live by fishing.'

The following, however, is Mr. Buckingham's description of Zur or Soor, the ancient Tyre, which he visited in the year 1816: 'On approaching the modern Soor, whether from the sea, from the hills, from the north, or from the south, its appearance has nothing of magnificence. The island on which it stands is as low as the isthmus which connects it with the main land, and, like this, all its unoccupied parts present a sandy and barren soil. The monotony of its grey and flat-roofed buildings is relieved only by the minaret of one mosque, with two low domes near it, the ruins of an old Christian church, the square tower without the town to the southward or south-east of it, and a few date-trees scattered here and there among the houses. At the present time the town of Soor contains about eight hundred substantial stone-built dwellings, mostly having courts, wells, and various conveniences attached to them, besides other smaller habitations for the poor. There are within the walls one mosque, three Christian churches, a bath, and three bazaars. The inhabitants are, at the lowest computation, from five to eight thousand; three-fourths of whom are Arab Catholics, and the remainder Arab Mahometans and Turks. In the fair season, that is, from April to October, the port is frequented by vessels from the Greek islands, the coasts of Asia Minor, and Egypt; and the trade is considerable in all the productions of those parts, as Soor is considered one of the marts of supply from without for Damascus, for which its local situation is still, as formerly, extremely eligible.'—Buckingham's Travels in Palestine, vol. i. pp. 73—75; Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. i. pp. 440—444.

V, or U.

VISTNOU, an idol, or false god, of the Indian Bramins. He is considered as the sovereign deity by the sect, thence called Vistnouvas; whilst the Seyvias, another sect of Bramins, ascribe the sovereignty to Eswara.

The Vistnouvas pretend that Vistnou has assumed ten corporeal shapes. He appeared, first, like Matja, or a fish: for a devil having carried off the Vedam, or sacred book of the Bramin religion, threw himself into the sea with the booty; when immediately Vistnou, changing himself into a fish, pursued and killed him; by which means the Vedam was preserved.

His second transformation was into Courma, or a tortoise; for the mountain Merouva being thrown into the sea, it was so prodigiously heavy, that the world, unable to support the weight of it, was beginning to sink in the abyss; when immediately Vistnou, changing himself into a tortoise, took the world on his back, and kept it from sinking.

3. He appeared like Warraha, or a hog. No reason is assigned for this metamorphosis. However, among his idols is generally found the head of a hog, to which the Bramins pay great honours.

4. He took the shape of Narasimha, or half a man and half a lion.

His 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, and 9th shapes were human; in which he assumed the names of Vainana, Paresje-Rama, Dejer-rata-Rama, Kristna, and Bouddha. The Bramins tell many fabulous stories concerning his adventures in all these shapes.

Lastly, he assumed the shape of Kelki, or a horse.

This god, they pretend, is carried on the back of the bird Garrouda, in the same manner as the Jupiter of the Greeks and Romans was mounted upon an eagle.—Broughton's Dictionary of all Religions, vol. ii. pp. 495, 496.

UNICORN. The unicorn is frequently mentioned in Scripture, and the Hebrew word ראם Reem, which is translated unicorn, has been understood of a variety of animals, as the rhinoceros, the urus, the deer, the roebuck, and the oryx. We know that there are several kinds of animals in Ethiopia and the Indies, which have a single horn, some upon the nose, others upon the forehead, and others upon the head. Dalechamp has observed as far as seven species of this sort. Chardin saw a rhinoceros in Persia, which had a horn on his nose, nearly of the bigness and shape of a small sugar-loaf. The colour of this horn was a dark grey, as also the skin of the animal. The snout of the rhinoceros is round, turned downward. He has but four teeth, two above, and two below. His eyes are set very low, almost over against his lips. His tail is small, and made up of nine or ten joints. His whole hide, except his back and head, is covered with little knobs or protuberances. His feet are short and thick, having three toes, or stubbed hoofs before, and a callus behind.

It appears that the double-horned rhinoceros was known anciently in Rome, and if in Rome, why not in Egypt? Since he is extant in Ethiopia; and if in Egypt, why not to the writer of the Book of Job? Since this is clearly the African species. It has been objected, that the rhinoceros stands connectedly distinguished from the beeve kind in Sacred Scripture. But he might even be reckoned by the Arabians, &c. in the days of Job, among the beeve kind, since Pausanias, who was many centuries later, calls him 'Ethiopian Bull,' or 'bull of Ethiopia,' as if he was known in Ethiopia by the name of a bull: but this name would not alter his character, or his form; the creature, though called a bull, and ranged among the beeve kind, might nevertheless be the rhinoceros. Again, it is said that the rhinoceros does not push with his horns as the reem is said to do, but rips up boughs of trees, &c. into laths. In answer, it may be observed, that the Hebrew word negar, properly signifies to drive forward, to propel, and some have rendered it by toss up, to elevate. As to the domestic labours, &c. mentioned by way of antiphrasis, as not to be entrusted to the reem, they suit the rhinoceros quite as well as the urus; since the rhinoceros, when of full age, is perhaps as untameable and untractable as any creature living. In Bengal, Siam, and other southern parts of India, where the rhinoceros is perhaps still more common than in Ethiopia, and where the natives are accustomed to tame elephants, he is regarded as an irreclaimable animal, of which no domestic use can be made. Mr. Bruce mentions the rhinoceros as found in Abyssinia; and Dr. Sparrman mentions him in South Africa. We find him also in the East Indies. It appears that the north African species of folding-skin rhinoceros has usually a single horn, but that in this country some are found with two horns; that the rhinoceros of Bencoolen (East India) has much less of those folding skins, but has two horns; and that the South African rhinoceros has no folding skins, yet has two horns. Scripture Illustrated; Parkhurst's Hebrew and English Lexicon, p. 667.

UNITARIANS. Names.—This sect received the name of Socinians, from Lælius, and Faustus Socinus, or Sozzini, uncle and nephew, of Sienna in Tuscany, who both taught the same doctrines; but the latter who died in Poland in 1604, is generally considered its founder. The modern Socinians, however, being strenuous advocates for the Divine Unity, now generally claim the appellation of Unitarians, as more descriptive of their tenets than that of Socinians, since they do not acknowledge all the doctrines of Socinus. But though they claim this designation, it is not generally admitted by others, because they claim it as contrasted with that of Trinitarians. It may indeed distinguish them, except from Sabellians, and from Jews, Mahometans, and Deists, as allowing only One Person in the Divine Essence; yet they can lay no particular claim to the term among Christians, for it confounds them with Arians, and even Trinitarians, who are equally strenuous for the Divine Unity, and acknowledge, as well as they, 'that there is none other God but one.' As they are zealous advocates for the simple humanity of Christ, or maintain that our Saviour is merely a Human Being, some of them have taken the name of Humanitarians; and we are told that in Wales, &c. they are also known by the name of Priestleians, from Dr. Priestley, the modern Coryphæus of the sect.

Rise, Progress, and History.—It is difficult to trace the origin of this denomination. Many are inclined to think that the doctrines by which its members are chiefly distinguished, were first maintained by Paul of Samosata, who was Bishop of Antioch about the middle of the third century, and by Artemon, his contemporary. They themselves lay claim to a very high antiquity, and even venture to say, 'that there is no such thing as a Trinitarian Christian mentioned or supposed, in the New Testament; all there named being perfect Unitarians, the blessed Jesus himself, his apostles, and all his followers.' Their sect may doubtless be traced to a very early period of the Reformation; and we are told by Mosheim, that they have been thought to have originated among the Anabaptists; a name by which those in Poland, who afterwards received the title of Socinians, were for some time known.

John Campanus, and Michael Servetus, a Spanish physician, whose unhappy fate is well known, who both flourished about the middle of the sixteenth century, were among the first of the Reformers that distinguished themselves as Anti-Trinitarians, and according to some, in behalf of those doctrines which were afterwards embraced by L. and F. Socinus; under whom, particularly the nephew, the jarring opinions of their predecessors began to assume the appearance of a regular system. A society near Venice, to which Lælius belonged, whose members discussed many points of religion, and particularly those relating to the Trinity, with great freedom, being discovered, and its members dispersed, they sought a refuge in Switzerland, Germany, Moravia, and other countries; while he escaped into Poland in 1551, where he sowed the seeds of his doctrine, which grew apace, and produced a rich and abundant harvest. Such is the account of the origin of Socinianism, as generally given by the writers of this sect, who date it from the year 1546, and place it in Italy; but Dr. Mosheim, who partly rejects it, remarks that the Socinians first formed themselves into a distinct congregation, or sect, in Poland, in 1565, when, in consequence of some violent contest between them and the Lutherans, and Swiss Calvinists, with whom they had been principally connected, they were required, by a resolution of the diet of Petrikow, to separate from those denominations.

The followers of Lælius became so numerous and powerful, that they soon assumed almost the consequence of an establishment, under the protection of Jo. Sienienius, palatine of Podolia, who gave them a settlement in Racow, which he had just built in the district of Sandomir. In this station the Socinians enjoyed peace and prosperity, until towards the middle of the succeeding century, when (in 1638) owing to the imprudence of some of their students at Racow, in breaking a crucifix with stones, the terrible law was enacted by the senate of Poland, by which, to appease the Roman Catholics, it was resolved, 'that the academy of Racow should be demolished, its professors banished with ignominy, the printing-house of the Socinians destroyed, and their churches shut.' Yet these were but the beginning of evils to this society; a still more terrible catastrophe awaited them; for, by a public and solemn act of the diet, held at Warsaw, A.D. 1658, they were banished for ever from the territory of Poland, and capital punishment was denounced against all those who should either profess their opinions, or harbour their persons. In 1661 this cruel act was renewed, and all the Socinians that yet remained in Poland, were barbarously driven out of that country, 'some with the loss of their goods, others with the loss of their lives, as neither sickness, nor any domestic consideration, could suspend the execution of that rigorous sentence.'

From Poland their doctrines had made their way into Hungary; and, about A.D. 1563, into Transylvania, where they were embraced by Sigismund, the reigning prince, and by many of the nobility, chiefly by the address and industry of George Blandrata, the prince's physician; and though they afterwards met with opposition from the Batori, who were chosen dukes of that country, yet they had there acquired so deep a root, that they never could be entirely eradicated. Hence, some of those unhappy exiles from Poland sought for a refuge among their brethren in Transylvania, while a considerable part of them were dispersed through the provinces of Silesia, Brandenburg, and Prussia; and in all these provinces their posterity are to be found at this day. Others went in search of a convenient settlement for themselves and their brethren, into Holland, England, Holstein, and Denmark, but with little success. Several other attempts also were made in different countries, in favour of their peculiar doctrines; but the success of those who engaged in them is said to have been still less considerable; 'nor could any of the European nations,' says Dr. Mosheim, 'be persuaded to grant a public settlement to a sect whose members denied the divinity of Christ.'

Socinians were scarcely heard of in England till the time of Charles the First, when the famous John Biddle, who erected an independent congregation in London, adopted, and openly avowed, their tenets, for which he suffered various persecutions, and at last died in prison in 1662. The same tenets were soon afterwards embraced by several others, particularly among the dissenters; but their abettors, in England, never made any figure as a community till towards the end of the last century, when they began to increase, and to acquire some distinction, from the writings and influence of Dr. Priestley and his associates. "I have, indeed, no hesitation in stating it as my firm conviction," says Mr. Belsham, 'that, in consequence of his (Dr. Priestley's) personal exertions, and his admirable writings, in connexion, with those of his able and learned associate in the same cause, the venerable Theophilus Lindsey, whom I am proud to call my revered friend, the number of converts to a pure and rational Christianity have been multiplied a hundred fold, and are daily increasing among all ranks of society.' Dr. Priestley having met with much opposition, and perhaps with some ill treatment, in England, retired to America in 1794, where, in consequence of his exertions, in conjunction with those of his fellow labourer, Mr. William Christie, and others, some Unitarian congregations have been formed. But however much he may have been respected by many individuals in that country, it does not appear that he met with much success in his favourite object, the propagation of Unitarianism, or that his friends have much cause to boast of their triumphs in that quarter.

Distinguishing Doctrines.—The predecessors of the modern Unitarians generally believed in a Trinity of some kind or other; and the extreme of heresy among them seems to have been Arianism, till about the year 1566, before which time the denomination of Socinianism was unknown: but after they became a distinct sect, it soon appeared that they had totally divested Jesus Christ of his divinity, and wholly forsaken the Arian doctrine. They also denied the plenary inspiration of the sacred writers, and insinuated that mistakes had crept into their writings; and, having proceeded thus far, they endeavoured to strip revealed religion of every circumstance not clearly intelligible by human reason; and hence some of their successors now call themselves Rational Christians, and, in this country, Rational Dissenters. With regard to the grand point on which the more ancient Socinians differed from other Christians, they maintained that the Father, and he only, is truly and properly God; that Jesus Christ had no existence whatever, before he was conceived by the Virgin Mary; and, that the Holy Ghost is no distinct person, but that the phrase is merely a figurative mode of expression, to denote the power or energy of God. They owned that the name of God is given in the Holy Scriptures to Jesus Christ; but contended that it is only a deputed title, which, however, invests him with a great authority over all created beings; they owned him to have been an extraordinary person, miraculously produced, and commissioned as a divine teacher, in whom the prophecies relating to the Messiah were completely, though not literally, fulfilled. They admitted also the whole history of his ascension and glorification in its literal acceptation; but, believing him to be a mere man like ourselves, though endowed with a large portion of the divine wisdom, they asserted that the only objects of his mission were,—to teach the efficacy of repentance, without any atonement or satisfaction, as a means of recovering the Divine favour; to exhibit, in his life and conduct, an example for our imitation; to seal his doctrine with his blood; and, in his resurrection from the dead, to indicate the certainty of our resurrection at the last day. They affirmed that nothing is requisite to make men objects of the Divine favour, but such moral conduct as he has made them capable of. Their doctrine respecting the atonement is, 'that God requires no consideration or condition of pardon, but the repentance of the offender; and that, consequently, the death of Christ was no real sacrifice for sin, but is called so in Scripture, merely in a figurative sense, by way of allusion to the Jewish sin-offerings; as our praises, and other good works, are called sacrifices, because they are something offered up to God.' With the Pelagians of old, they denied the necessity of divine grace; they also exploded the doctrines of original sin, predestination, and our Saviour's mediation, and reckoned the sacraments nothing more than simple ceremonies, unaccompanied by any inward operations. We are told by Vossius, that F. Socinus wrote a treatise on baptism, which he considers as a visible ceremony, admitting men into Christianity when they have been Jews or Pagans, 'but not to be used in a family already Christian.' Some of them likewise maintained the sleep of the soul, which, they say, 'becomes insensible at death, and is raised again with the body at the resurrection, when the good shall be established in the possession of eternal felicity, while the wicked shall be consigned to a fire that will not torment them eternally, but for a certain duration, proportioned to their demerits.'

Such were the principles of the more ancient Socinians. There is, however, a considerable difference of opinion between them and the modern Unitarians; for, while the latter hold all these articles, or the substance of them, one or two excepted, they have adopted several alterations in regard to some of them, and have also made considerable additions to their creed. Thus they believe the Scriptures to be faithful records of past transactions, but deny that their authors were divinely inspired as writers; and they reject the miraculous conception, and the worship of Christ, both of which were held by Socinus. The Socinians also believed, that though Jesus had no existence before his birth, yet that since his resurrection he has been advanced to the government of the universe, 'a notion unscriptural, and most incredible,' in Mr. Belsham's opinion, who adds, that 'a consistent Unitarian, acknowledging Jesus as a man in all respects like to his brethren, regards his kingdom as entirely of a spiritual nature, and as consisting in the empire of his Gospel over the hearts and lives of its professors.' Modern Unitarians 'allow the inspiration of the writers of the New Testament in no cases where they do not themselves expressly claim it; and are not sparing of the labour necessary to distinguish, even in the canonical books, what is of divine authority, from that which is of human origin.' Hence they do not believe in our Lord's miraculous conception, but are of opinion, that he was the legitimate son of Joseph and Mary; and Dr. Priestley has taken the liberty of wholly rejecting the first two chapters of St. Matthew's Gospel, in which that doctrine is taught; and also, of maintaining the consequence of this opinion, namely, that what was born of Mary was not an 'holy thing,' but was 'naturally as fallible and peccable as Moses, or any other prophet.'

Their hypothesis of the partial inspiration of the writers of the New Testament, he extends not only to Moses, but even to our blessed Lord himself; for he saw no reason, we are told, 'for believing that either Moses, or Jesus Christ, were inspired with supernatural knowledge, or endued with supernatural power, beyond the immediate objects of their missions. When the reason and the occasion ceased, the supernatural gifts would cease too. They were given for a certain purpose; we are not warranted, therefore, in extending them beyond the occasion that called them forth.' But does not this imply, that God gave the Spirit by measure unto him? and if so, how does it accord with St. John, (iii. 34.) to say nothing of some other texts?

In withholding worship from Christ, the Unitarians doubtless act more consistently with their principles, and in a more rational manner, than their predecessors, who worshipped a person whom they conceived to be a mere man like themselves. Mr. Lindsey tells us, that he thereby means no 'want of respect to that kind Saviour of men,' whom he trusts he 'is disposed to love and honour, now and for ever, with the affection and reverence so justly due to him, for his perfect virtue and benevolence. But,' adds he, 'I cannot make him the Supreme God, or invoke, or pray to him, as such; because I am persuaded that if he could hear, and make himself known to me, he would call out from heaven, as he did formerly to Paul,—"I am Jesus of Nazareth;" one who was once a mortal man like thyself: worship God.'

'The Unitarians believe, upon grounds common to all Christians, that Jesus of Nazareth was a divinely commissioned teacher of truth and righteousness; and that, having been publicly crucified by his enemies, he was raised from the dead on the third day. They regard it as an indispensable duty to believe whatever he was commissioned to teach. And particularly upon the evidence of his doctrine and resurrection, they expect a general resurrection of the dead, 'both of the just and of the unjust;' and a subsequent state of retribution, in which all shall be treated in exact correspondence with their moral characters. The Unitarians believe Jesus to have been a man, for the same reasons for which they believe the proper humanity of Peter and Paul, of Moses and Abraham. He appeared as a man, he called himself a man, he was believed by all his companions and contemporaries to be a man; he had all the accidents of a man; he was born, he lived, he ate and drank, he slept; he conversed, he rejoiced, he wept, he suffered, and he died, as other men. That he was nothing more than a man, possessed of extraordinary powers, and invested with an extraordinary divine commission, and that he had no existence previous to his birth, they believe, simply upon this ground, that there is no evidence to prove the contrary. It is not incumbent upon them, nor do they pretend, to produce proof, that a person who appeared as a man was really such. If any maintains that Jesus of Nazareth was something more than a human being, whether an angelic, super-angelic, or divine person, it is their business to prove their assertion.¹ In this scheme of theology, along with our Lord's divinity, and the distinct personal existence of the Holy Ghost, the doctrines of original sin, and the atonement, also fall to the ground. According to Dr. Priestley, the pardon of sin is represented in Scripture 'as dispensed solely on account of men's personal virtue, a penitent upright heart, and a reformed exemplary life, without the least regard to the sufferings or merit of any being whatever.' Having rejected the personal existence of the Holy Spirit, whose office it is to sanctify the heart, it is natural to suppose, that the Unitarians would also reject the doctrine of a Divine influence upon the mind for moral and religious purposes. Accordingly Dr. Priestley tells us that, at an early period of his theological career, and while he was yet an Arian, he became 'persuaded of the falsity of the doctrine of atonement, of the inspiration of the authors of the books of Scripture as writers, and of all idea of supernatural influence, except for the purpose of miracles.' Mr. Belsham even ventures to say, 'it has never yet been proved, that any supernatural influence upon the mind is necessary under the Divine government, or that it has ever existed, except in a few very extraordinary cases.'

Such are the grand and leading doctrines of the Unitarian system. Several other dogmas are maintained by most Unitarians, as the rejection of the existence and agency of the devil;—of the spirituality and separate existence of the soul;—of an intermediate state between death and the general resurrection;—and of the eternity of future punishment: but these, not being essentially connected with their system, and being held by them in common with some others, ought not to be viewed, exclusively, as Unitarian doctrines. The same remark should also extend to the doctrines of Necessity and Materialism; for though both of these, particularly the former, are held by the most distinguished Unitarians of the present day, Mr. Belsham insists that they have no more connexion with their peculiar Creed, 'than they have with the mountains in the moon.' Dr. Priestley, however, seems to have held a different opinion. See MATERIALISTS and NECESSITARIANS.

Mr. Belsham tells us, that 'the existence of an evil spirit is no where expressly taught as a doctrine of Revelation;' and, with that openness and candour which seem to be natural to him, he also says, that he, for one, is not ashamed to avow, that he regards the notion of a devil, and his agency, 'as an evanescent prejudice, which it is now a discredit to a man of understanding to believe.' Dr. Priestley's opinions respecting the soul, of course, led him to disbelieve the doctrine of an intermediate state. Believing that as the whole man died, so the whole man would be called again to life at the appointed period of the resurrection of all men, he regarded the intermediate portion of time as a state of utter insensibility; as a deep sleep, from which the man would awaken, when called on by the Almighty, with the same associations as he had when alive, without being sensible of the portion of time elapsed. With regard to the doctrine and the duration of future punishments, Dr. Priestley, we are told, 'had no notion of punishment, as such, in the common acceptation of the term. The design of the Creator, in his opinion, was the ultimate happiness of all his creatures, by the means best fitted to produce it.' Punishment he considered to be merely 'the medicina mentis, exhibited for our good by the Physician of souls, nor have we any reason to believe that it is greater in degree, or longer in duration, than is necessary to produce the beneficial effect for which it is inflicted. It is the sort of punishment which a kind but wise parent inflicts on a beloved child.'

With regard to their moral code, the principles of the Unitarians do not seem to admit their loosening, in the least, the bonds of duty. On the contrary, they appear to be actuated by an earnest desire to promote practical religion. The practice of virtue is represented by them as the only means of attaining happiness both here and hereafter; and they teach, that the Christian religion 'requires the absolute renunciation of every vice, and the practice of every virtue.' Love is with them the fulfilling of the law, and the habitual practice of virtue, from a principle of love to God, and benevolence to man, is, in their judgment, 'the sum and substance of Christianity.'

Yet the Unitarians hold so few opinions which are peculiarly Christian, that many will not allow them to be reckoned among Christian sects, but would class them with Jews, Mahometans, and Deists, with whom they hold common principles. But should they not have forfeited all right to be ranked among Christians, if their religion be not what Bishop Warburton regarded it, 'a sort of infidelity in disguise;' nor altogether what Mr. Wilberforce represents it, as a 'sort of half-way house from nominal orthodoxy to absolute infidelity;' it is, at least, in the opinion of most Christians, what Mrs. Barbauld is said to have called it, 'Christianity in the Frigid Zone.' Nor do their doctrines seem to be tenable on the ground of their moral tendency, when compared with those of a more orthodox description. Morality, however excellent as a rule of life, will not become a living principle in the heart of man, if it be not mixed with faith, in those who are instructed in it; and, notwithstanding Mr. G. Blunt may have overlooked the passage, it is expressly declared in the Bible, that 'without faith it is impossible to please God.'

Worship, Rites, and Ceremonies.—It has been already observed, that the modern Unitarians, with perhaps more consistency than their predecessors, reject the worship of Christ; and, as they deny the personality of the Holy Ghost, and call him merely a property or virtue, the only object of their religious worship is God the Father. They reject every thing in Christianity that has but the appearance of mystery, or that surpasses the limits of human comprehension; and neither seeing nor feeling any need of Divine grace to enable them to will and to do what is necessary, on their part, towards their salvation, they, of course, do not seek for it in the appointed means.

'Bound on a voyage of awful length,

And dangers little known,

A stranger to superior strength,

Man vainly trusts his own.

But oars alone can ne'er prevail,

To reach the distant coast;

The breath of heaven must swell the sail,

Or all the toil is lost.'—Couper.

Mosheim remarks, in his account of the last century, that 'the Socinians, who were dispersed through the different countries of Europe, have never hitherto been able to form a separate congregation, or to celebrate publicly divine worship, in a manner conformable to the institutions of their sect: though it is well known, that, in several places, they hold clandestine meetings of a religious kind.' He should doubtless have excepted those in Transylvania, who have long had separate congregations, and have upwards of 160 at this day.

The worship of the Unitarians in England and America is, in general, liturgical, or conducted by forms.

The form prepared by Mr. Lindsay in 1774, for the use of his congregation in the Unitarian Chapel, Essex Street, Strand, is 'The Book of Common Prayer, reformed according to the plan of the late Dr. Samuel Clarke;' or, as it is expressed in the advertisement prefixed to it, the 'Liturgy of the Church of England, with the amendments of Dr. Clarke, and such further alterations as were judged necessary to render it unexceptionable with respect to the object of religious worship.' This form, which has already gone through five or six editions, contains almost all the offices in the Book of Common Prayer, except Communion; and in some of them, as the Thanksgiving of Women after Child-birth, and the Burial of the Dead, but few alterations are made; the grand object in the publication of it being plainly to address the whole worship to God the Father, and thereby to avoid that idolatry which the Unitarians conceive has long corrupted almost the whole mass of Christianity, and particularly the Church of England; and which mars all the odour of the incense of her devotions. In the beginning of the Litany, which seems to be here used only 'on such days as the Lord's Supper is administered,' the Deity is, indeed, three times invoked; but the joint invocation of the three persons of the Trinity is left out, and the second and third invocations, or addresses to the Father, are expressed in these words:—'O God! who, by the precious blood of thy only begotten Son, hast purchased to thyself an holy church, and placed it under thy continual protection, have mercy upon us miserable sinners.'—'O God, who, by thy holy Spirit, dost govern, direct, and sanctify the hearts of all thy faithful servants, have mercy,' &c. In the room of the doxologies proposed by Dr. Clarke, the following is introduced:—'Now unto the King, eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honour and glory, through Jesus Christ, for ever and ever. Amen.' Children are baptized, as by Mr. Carpenter, into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit; and in the form of administration of the Lord's Supper, the elements are delivered with these words—'Take and eat this in remembrance of Christ;'—'Take and drink this in remembrance of Christ.'

It may be further remarked, in regard to this Book of Common Prayer Reformed, that the words 'For his sake,' towards the end of the General Confession, are left out; that the Absolution, the Te Deum, the Nicene and Athanasian Creeds, together with the Apostles' Creed; the Epistles and Gospels, the Catechism, &c. &c., are also left out: that the phrase, 'all the ministers of the Gospel,' is adopted instead of 'all bishops, priests, and deacons,' in the supplication for the clergy in the Litany; and that the Litany itself is made to conclude with the petition that it would please God 'to give us true repentance,' &c., here changed into—that it may please him 'to accept our sincere repentance,' an amendment, which all sincere penitents, who have no occasion to petition God to give them true repentance, will, no doubt, approve and adopt.

Dr. Priestley drew up a set of forms for all the parts of public worship, and also for all other occasions of a Christian society, such as are commonly used by dissenters in England. In this work, intitled Forms of Prayer, and other offices, for the use of Unitarian Christians, Birmingham, 1783, besides forms for the morning and evening service of the Lord's day, the Doctor has given offices for infant and adult baptism,—a form for the celebration of the Lord's Supper,—addresses to the communicants for a second and third service,—a funeral service,—prayers for a fast day,—a prayer respecting the present state of Christians, to be used on the morning of Easter Sunday, &c. To these is prefixed an introduction, in which he warmly recommends the formation of Unitarian societies, in which all the parts of public worship are to be conducted by mere laymen, without the assistance of ministers of any description. The doctor conceived that ministers regularly ordained, are by no means indispensably necessary to the constitution of a religious society, or the right administration of the Christian ordinances of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, 'in which there is nothing peculiarly sacred.' 'Our Saviour,' says he, 'gives no hint of any difference between clergy and laity among his disciples.' 'Every man who understands the Christian religion, I consider as having the same commission to teach it, that I myself have; and I think my own commission as good as that of any bishop in England, or in Rome.' The Doctor seems to view it as a matter of little consequence, not only whether the rite of baptism be considered as obligatory on the descendants of professing Christians, or not; but also whether both Baptism and the Lord's Supper were to be discontinued after the apostolic age, or meant to be standing ordinances in the church. 'Yet,' says he, 'I much approve of both of those ordinances, and think them very valuable, for the reasons which may be found in my History of the Corruptions of Christianity, and I have accordingly drawn up forms for the administration of them.'

Church Government and Discipline.—Dr. Mosheim observes, 'that the most eminent writers and patrons of the Socinians give no clear or consistent account of the sentiments of that sect in relation to ecclesiastical discipline and government, and the form of public worship.' 'All that we know is,' adds he, 'that they follow in these matters, generally speaking, the customs received in the Protestant churches.' Transylvania is the only country in which they are not only tolerated, but have their rights and privileges secured by express laws, and possess a sort of establishment. Their church government, in that country, consists of one superintendent and two consistories. The higher consistory is composed partly of laymen, partly of the inspectors or superintendents special of the eight dioceses into which the 164 Unitarian churches in that country are divided. It appoints persons for all the livings, and receives reports from the inferior consistory, to which the church discipline is entrusted. The superintendent general presides in the inferior consistory, but occupies only the second place in the higher. Matrimonial affairs, &c. are under the jurisdiction of these courts. It appears very likely that the Unitarians, both in England and America, are, in general, Independents.

With regard to religious establishments, it seems to be a common principle of the Unitarian system, but by no means universal, that they are in every form, and under every modification, unjust and unscriptural:—that the civil magistrate assumes an authority quite foreign to his character and office, when he interposes in any manner, or under any pretext, in matters purely religious; and that it is his incumbent duty to protect, without distinction or partiality, all classes and descriptions of men in the enjoyment of their religious, as well as civil rights and privileges.

Countries where found, and Seminaries.—According to Unitarians themselves, their number was never so great as it is at this day, and their cause is still progressive. They are said to be numerous in Germany; but it is not certainly known whether they have yet formed a distinct society in that country. In Transylvania they were, at one time, the most numerous party of Christians, but their number there has decreased of late years, and does not now exceed 32,000. They are principally Hungarians, and live divided in 194 places or villages, and have about 164 houses of public worship. In Clausenburg, perhaps the same as Coloswar, they have a new, large, and handsome church, built in 1796, with a steeple and bells. They have, also, at the same place, a printing-office, and a college, which is among the most respectable institutions of Transylvania, and consists of about 300 scholars, who usually remove from this Unitarian college, to the University of Clausenburg, to finish their studies. They have likewise a small college at Thorda, and a considerable number of inferior schools in the different villages which they inhabit.

The Unitarians also occupy the village of Andreaswalde in Prussia, where they have free exercise of religion, and a proper house of public worship, but are obliged to pay all the parochial fees to a neighbouring Lutheran parish.

They may be found in most other parts of Europe, but, perhaps, no where in greater numbers than in England. Their body has become large by the numbers that have joined their ranks, both from the Church and Protestant Dissenters, particularly the Presbyterians; and no small accession has been made to its respectability, erudition, and virtue, by several clergymen of the Establishment, who, having embraced the Unitarian doctrine, have either, from a principle of honour and conscience, voluntarily resigned, or else been forced to quit, their situations in the church. And yet say they, 'besides those thousands who are not ashamed to avow the Unitarian doctrine, there is reason to believe that there are thousands more, both in the church and out of it, who think with us, but who are deterred by secular considerations, and the harsh spirit of the times, from avowing their real principles: 'Loving the praise of men more than the praise of God.'" Besides their college at Hackney, in which their youth are trained up in the Unitarian doctrine, and fitted for future service in a world still lying in wickedness and idolatry, the Unitarians have a society in London for the distribution of books and tracts, entitled, 'The Unitarian Society of Great Britain, for promoting Christian Knowledge, and the Practice of Virtue.'

Miscellaneous Remarks.—Whatever opinion should be formed of Unitarian principles, and by whatever name their professors should be called, I can see no good reason for calling their sincerity in question; nor can I doubt that they firmly believe theirs to be the cause of God and of true religion. Some of them have doubtless given strong proofs of their sincerity, and others assure us, that they will not be backward to exhibit equal proofs of it, were it to be put to the test. That it has not been more severely tried, may be ascribed to the mildness of the government under which they live; and it might be well that their sense of the privileges which they even now enjoy, were to become more apparent, by their refraining from all appearance of disrespect towards the religion of their country, by their not holding up its doctrines to public odium, as unscriptural, idolatrous, palpably absurd, and the like; and, by their no longer telling the world, that 'Christianity, in this country, is not only not established, but not tolerated by legal authority.'

'I believe in God, and Mahomet his prophet,' says the disciple of the celebrated oriental impostor. 'I believe in God, and Jesus Christ, a prophet and teacher,' is the creed of the Unitarian. But the member of the Established Church will not reduce his faith to a level with that of Mahomet; nor will he look for salvation in the Manual of Epictetus, or in any Offices of Cicero. No, he finds a fuller faith in Scripture, which is the anchor of his soul, both sure and certain; a faith, which has God for its object, in the most perfect state of unity, but in whose essence are Jesus Christ, the Son of his love, without whose meritorious death and sufferings, sinners never could have been reconciled to the Almighty, and Alljust; and the Holy Spirit, without whose inspiration the best of men could neither think a good thought, nor perform a good action. The language of Scripture is rendered consistent by thus considering the great object of religious adoration. The true state of man's condition is laid open, his utter incapability of redeeming himself from the penalty of sin is rendered clear and perspicuous, his sole dependence on a Saviour is manifest, in whose person are united both the human and divine natures, that he might at once, though sinless himself, represent that nature which had sinned, and at the same time afford an adequate propitiatory sacrifice; and his gratitude is inflamed by a revelation of that holy divine Comforter, who descends into his heart with gifts and graces, the precious fruits of faith, and the blessed assurance of immortal happiness. 'What have heathen morals, what have the corrupted doctrines of Christianity to offer equal to these great invaluable blessings? Man, who knows his own weakness, relies not on his own merits, but on the merits of his Saviour; man, whose carnal heart sinks under worldly oppressions, and worldly temptations, rises superior to them all, in the confidence of spiritual assistance. "If ye live after the flesh, ye shall die; but if ye, through the Spirit, do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live. For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. For ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father.'" UNIVERSALISTS. Those who believe that, as Christ died for all, so, before he shall have delivered up his mediatorial kingdom to the Father, all shall be brought to a participation of the benefits of his death, in their restoration to holiness and happiness, are called Universal Restorationists, or Universalists; and their doctrine, the doctrine of Universal Restoration. Some of its friends have maintained it also under the name of Universal Salvation; but perhaps the former name, which Mr. Vidler seems to prefer, is that by which it should be distinguished; for the Universalists do not hold any universal exemption from future punishment, but merely the recovery of all those that shall have been exposed to it. They have likewise a just claim to this title on other grounds; for their doctrine, which includes the restoration, or 'restitution of all the intelligent offspring of God,' or of all 'lapsed intelligences,' seems to embrace even the fallen angels.

From the earliest days of Christianity, it has been the general opinion throughout Christendom, that this life is the only state of probation with which men shall be indulged, and that after death the wicked and impenitent will pass into a state of endless misery, to be made examples of the justice of God in asserting the authority of his laws.

But though this has been the general, it has perhaps never been (at least it was not long) the universal opinion among Christians. In almost every period, and more especially of late, different sentiments have been entertained upon this mysterious subject, and different theories of future punishment have been proposed. Origen, a Christian father of the third century, seems to have been the first that openly espoused the doctrine of the temporary duration of future punishments; St. Augustine, bishop of Hippo, about the beginning of the fifth century, mentions some divines in his day, whom he calls the merciful doctors, who held it; and it was also propagated by many of the German Baptists, even before the Reformation. From that time many, who have not been able to discover any principle in the divine conduct but that of benevolence, nor any ultimate view in his dispensations towards his creatures but that of their happiness, have concluded that eternal misery could not possibly enter into the divine plan; that God could never choose to create any on whom it would be necessary to inflict it; and that every degree of suffering, either in this world, or that which is to come, will be emendatory, and terminate in the final happiness of such as are the subjects of it. Indeed, the doctrine of the final happiness of mankind, which presents the prospect of the termination of all evil, and of a period in which the deep shades of guilt and misery, which have so long enveloped the universe, shall be for ever dispelled, is so pleasing a speculation to a benevolent mind, that we need not wonder it has met with many who have maintained it. From the earliest period it may readily be supposed that the belief of it may have been secretly entertained by some who, in the face of opposition and danger, had not resolution to avow it. Now, however, it has broken through every restraint, and walks abroad in every form that is most likely to convince the philosophic, to rouse the unthinking, and to melt the tender.

The Universalists admit the reality and equity of future punishment; but they contend that it will be corrective in its nature, and limited in its duration. They 'teach the doctrine of election, but not in the exclusive Calvinistic sense of it. They suppose that God has chosen some, for the good of all; and that his final purpose towards all is intimated by his calling his elect the first born and the first fruits of his creatures; which, say they, implies other branches of his family, and a future ingathering of the harvest of mankind. They teach also, that the righteous shall have part in the first resurrection, shall be blessed and happy, and be made priests and kings to God and to Christ in the millennial kingdom, and that over them the second death shall have no power; that the wicked will receive a punishment apportioned to their crimes; that punishment itself is a mediatorial work, and founded upon mercy; consequently, that it is a means of humbling, subduing, and finally reconciling the sinner to God. They add, that the words rendered eternal, everlasting, for ever, and for ever and ever, in the Scriptures, are frequently used to express the duration of things that have ended, or must end: and if it is contended, that these words are sometimes used to express proper eternity, they answer, that then the subject with which the words are connected, must determine the sense of them; and as there is nothing in the nature of future punishment which can be rendered as a reason why it should be endless, they infer that the above words ought always to be taken in a limited sense, when connected with the infliction of misery.'

They say that their doctrine is most consonant to the perfections of the Deity, most worthy of the character of Christ, as the Mediator; and that upon no other plan can the Scriptures be made consistent with themselves. They teach their followers ardent love to God; and peace, meekness, candour, and universal love to men, they observe, are the natural result of their views. Their scheme appears to them to be the only one that in the least bids fair to unite two great bodies of Christians that have long and bitterly opposed each other (the Arminians and the Calvinists) by uniting the leading doctrines of both, as far as they are found in the Scriptures: from which union they think the sentiment of universal restoration naturally flows. They reason thus: 'The Arminian proves from Scripture, that God is love; that he is good to all; that his tender mercy is over all his works; that he gave his Son for the world; that Christ died for the world, even for the whole world, and God will have all men to be saved. The Calvinist proves also from Scripture, that God is without variableness or shadow of turning; that his love, like himself, alters not; that the death of Christ will be efficacious towards all for whom it was intended; that God will perform all his pleasure, and that his counsel shall stand. The union of these scriptural principles is the final restoration of all men. Taking the principles of the Calvinists and Arminians separately, we find the former teaching, or at least inferring, that God doth not love all, but that he made the greater part of men to be endless monuments of his wrath; and the latter declaring the love of God to all, but admitting his final failure of restoring the greater part. The God of the former is great in power and wisdom, but deficient in goodness, and capricious in his conduct. Who that views this character can sincerely love it? The God of the latter is exceeding good, but deficient in power and wisdom. Who can trust such a being? If, therefore, both Calvinists and Arminians love and trust the Deity, it is not under the character which their several systems ascribe to him; but they are constrained to hide the imperfections which these views cast upon him, and boast of a God, of whose highest glory their several schemes will not admit.'

The Universalists have to contend, on one hand, with such as believe in the eternity of future misery; and on the other, with those who teach that destruction or extinction of being will be the final state of the wicked. In answer to the latter, they say, 'That, before we admit that God is under the necessity of striking any of his rational creatures out of being, we ought to pause and inquire, first, whether such an act is consistent with the Scriptural character of the Deity, as possessed of all possible wisdom, goodness, and power? Secondly, whether it would not contradict many parts of Scripture; such, for instance, as speak of the restitution of all things, the gathering together of all things in Christ, the reconciliation of all things to the Father by the blood of the cross, the destruction of death,' &c. ? These texts, they think, are opposed equally to endless misery and to final destruction. 'Thirdly, whether those who will be finally destroyed, are not in a worse state through the mediation of Christ, than they would have been without it? This question is founded on a position of the friends of destruction; namely, that extinction of being, without a resurrection, would have been the only punishment of sin, if Christ had not become the resurrection and the life to man; consequently, the resurrection and future punishment spring from the system of mediation: but they ask, is the justification to life, which came upon all men in Christ Jesus, nothing more than a resurrection to endless death to millions? Fourthly, whether the word destruction will warrant such a conclusion? It is evident that destruction is often used in Scripture to signify a cessation of present existence only, without any contradiction of the promises that relate to a future universal resurrection. They think, therefore, that they ought to admit an universal restoration of men, notwithstanding the future destruction which is threatened to sinners; because, say they, the Scriptures teach both.'

Those who deny the eternity of future punishments have not formed themselves into any separate body or distinct society; but are to be found in most Christian countries, and among many denominations of Christians. Their doctrines form part of the creed of some Arians, as of Mr. Whiston; of many Deists, as of Mr. Hobbes, Mr. Tindal, &c.; and of most Socinians, as of Socinus, Dr. Priestley, Mr. Fellows, &c. Nor need we be surprised that libertines and Atheists hold it, and that they strive to bring others over to their opinion. 'The tyranny of priests,' says Dupont, the Atheist, in the National Convention, December 1792, 'extends their opinion to another life, of which they have no other idea than that of eternal punishment; a doctrine which some men have hitherto had the good nature to believe. But these prejudices must now fall: we must destroy them, or they will destroy us.'

The Mennonites in Holland have long held the doctrine of the Universalists; the people called Dunkers, or Tunkers, in America, descended from the German Baptists, hold it, and also the Shakers; Dr. Rust, bishop of Dromore, in Ireland, defended it in his 'Lux Orientalis,' about the end of the seventeenth century; and, in England, soon after, Mr. Collier and Mr. Jeremiah White wrote in defence of it. Archbishop Tillotson seems to countenance it; as does Dr. T. Burnet, master of the Charter House, more openly, in his work 'On the State of the Dead.' Mr. William Law seems to have maintained it. The writers who have treated the subject most fully of late, are, Bishop Newton; Mr. Stonehouse, rector of Islington; Dr. Chauncy, of Boston in America; Dr. Hartley, in his 'Observations on Man;' Mr. Purves of Edinburgh; Mr. E. Winchester, in his 'Dialogues;' Mr. William Vidler; and Mr. N. Scarlett, in his new Translation of the New Testament, in which the Greek term αἰών is rendered age; and in his Appendix, he has proposed that its derivative αἰώνιον, should be rendered age-lasting, instead of everlasting or eternal.

Many deny that the punishment of eternal death was implied in the sentence denounced against Adam; and many churchmen, it is feared, explain away the strong language of Scripture, and of the church of England, respecting the punishment of finally impenitent sinners, and suggest doubts, whether 'all men' may not 'be happy ultimately.' Among these may be reckoned the late Dr. Paley, and Mr. William Gilpin. By teaching this doctrine of the final restoration of all men, divines greatly undermine and weaken a main bulwark against the general overflows of immorality and vice. With their extenuated views of the effects of the fall, and of the rigour of the law, and of the malignity of sin, they do not readily conceive that the worst of men can deserve to suffer 'the bitter pains of eternal death.' It is a doctrine not very reconcileable with their notions of the object of God in our creation, and their resolution of all the divine attributes into those of pure mercy and benevolence; and from the little use they make of it themselves, and the severity with which they treat the ordinary Scripture use of it by others, there certainly remains a doubt whether they really believe the doctrine or not. But whatever may be said to the contrary, and however ungrateful the subject may be, if the doctrine is really believed, nay, if it is only thought probable, or even possible, so far is its extreme awfulness from furnishing a reason for generally concealing it, that this consideration is the very strongest reason why impenitent sinners should hear it honestly proclaimed.

It is maintained by the friends of the non-eternity of future punishment, that it cannot be eternal, 'because there is no proportion between temporary crimes and eternal punishments;' and hence some of the ablest of them, as Chauncy, Petitpierre, Winchester, &c., have strenuously opposed the doctrine of endless punishment, on the ground of its injustice; but if such punishment be threatened by God, and any where recorded in Scripture, it cannot surely be unjust; for 'shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?' Hence Mr. Vidler very properly places the question on other grounds, and asserts that 'it is not whether endless punishment be in itself just, but whether God has any where threatened any description of sinners with it.' And here they insist, that the word everlasting is 'not to be taken in its utmost extent; and that it signifies no more than a long time, or a time whose precise boundary is unknown.' In answer to this it is alleged, that the same word is used, and that sometimes in the very same place, to express the eternity of the happiness of the righteous, and the eternity of the misery of the wicked; and that there is no reason to believe that the words express two such different ideas, as standing in the same connexion. See TORMENTS FUTURE, and RELLYAN UNIVERSALISTS. Adam's Religious World Displayed, vol. iii. pp. 375—389; Evans's Sketch of the Denominations of the Christian World, pp. 183, &c.

VOW, a promise made to God, of doing some good thing hereafter. The use of vows is observable throughout Scripture. When Jacob went into Mesopotamia, he vowed to God the tenth of his estate, and promised to offer it at Bethel, to the honour of God. (Gen. xxviii. 22.) Moses enacts several laws for the regulation and execution of vows. A man might devote himself, or his children, to the Lord. Jephthah devoted his daughter, and some think he offered her in sacrifice. (Judg. xi. 30, 31.) Samuel was vowed and consecrated to the service of the Lord, and was really offered to him, to serve in the tabernacle. (1 Sam. i. 21, 22, &c.) If a man or woman vowed themselves to the Lord, they were obliged to adhere strictly to his service, according to the conditions of the vow; but in some cases they might be redeemed. A man from twenty years of age till sixty, gave fifty shekels of silver; and a woman, thirty. (Levit. xxvii. 3.) From the age of five years to twenty, a man gave twenty shekels, and a woman ten: from a month old to five years, they gave for a boy five shekels, and for a girl three. A man of sixty years old, or upwards, gave fifteen shekels, and a woman of the same age gave ten. If the person was poor, and could not procure this sum, the priest imposed a ransom upon him, according to his abilities.

If any one had vowed an animal that was clean, he had not the liberty of redeeming it, or of exchanging it, but was obliged to sacrifice it to the Lord. If it was an unclean animal, and such as was not allowed to be sacrificed, the priest made a valuation of it; and if the proprietor would redeem it, he added a fifth part to the value, by way of forfeit. They did the same in proportion, when the thing vowed was a house, or a field. They could not devote the first-born, because in their own nature they belonged to the Lord. (Levit. xxvii. 28, 29.) Whatever was devoted by way of anathema, could not be redeemed, of whatever nature or quality it was. An animal was put to death, and other things were devoted for ever to the Lord. The consecration of Nazarites was a particular kind of vow.

The vows and promises of children were void of course, except they were ratified, either by the express or tacit consent of their parents. It was the same with the vows of a married woman; they were of no validity, except confirmed by the express or tacit consent of her husband. (Numb. xxx. 1, 2, 3, &c.) But widows, or liberated wives, were bound by their vows, whatever they were.

UR, אור, oûr, signifies light, or fire. Ur was a city of Chaldea, the country of Terah, and of Abraham. (Gen. xi. 28.) God ordered Abraham to leave Ur, that he might bring him into the land of Canaan, which he intended to give him and his posterity. As he was going thither, with his father Terah, and Lot his nephew, at Haran, a city of Mesopotamia, Terah fell sick and died. After Abraham had paid his last duties to him, he continued his journey into the land of Canaan, in the year of the world 2082. The city of Ur was in Chaldea, as the Scripture assures us in more places than one; but its true situation is unknown. Some think it was Camarina in Babylonia; some, the Orcha, or Orchoe, in Chaldea, according to Ptolemy and Strabo; others, the Ura, or Sura, in Syria, on the Euphrates. Bochart and Grotius maintain it is Ura in Mesopotamia, two days' journey from Nisibe. It is observed that Chaldea and Mesopotamia are often confounded together, and that it is said indifferently, that this city is in one or the other of these two provinces.

The word Ur in Hebrew signifies fire; and some have pretended, that when Moses says, 'God brought Abraham out of Ur of the Chaldees,' he alluded to a fire into which the Chaldees had cast him.

Respecting Ur, however, a late writer observes as follows: 'It is usually said that Aur, or Ur of the Chaldees was a city; but we may be permitted to doubt this: because, 1. it is no where, that I can find in Scripture, called a city. 2. It is usually coupled with the word land, or country, or district; as where it first occurs, (Gen. xi. 28.) 'Haran died in the land of his nativity, in Aur of the Chaldees;' where it should seem that Aur is the same place as the land; or else it would have been said, one should think, 'in the city of Aur in the land of his nativity.' The omission of the term city here seems to be of considerable weight. As Aur, or Ur, signifies fire, or light, it seems to agree with the description of the sun-rising province, and as the Auritæ, wherever they are found, are children of the sun, and worshippers of the sun, it seems to confirm our notion, of their deriving rather from a province than from a city.' Mr. Bryant finds these persons and Ethiopians in many places. It is certain the Chaldeans were called Ethiopians, but they never were thought to be natives of either Arabian or African Ethiopia; they must therefore appertain to Caucasian Ethiopia; wherein also we find a country of Auritæ.

The city of Orfah, however, is thought by all the learned Jews and Mahometans, as well as by the most eminent scholars among the Christians, to have been the Ur of the Chaldees, from whence Abraham went forth to dwell in Haran. This capital of the country between the Euphrates and the Tigris, the Padan-Aram, and Aram-Nahraim of the Hebrews, and the Mesopotamia of the Greeks, received from its Macedonian conquerors the name of Edessa; and an abundant fountain which the city enclosed, and called in Greek Callirrhoe, communicated this name to the city itself.

'Orfah,' says Tavernier, 'is the capital city of Mesopotamia, built, as they say, in the place where Abraham lived, and where stood the ancient Edessa, where the people of the country report that king Abgarus held his court. There are still to be seen the ruins of a castle, from whence, they add, that the same king sent to Christ for his picture.'

Orfah is seated on the eastern side of a hill, at the commencement of a plain; so that while its western extremity stands on elevated ground, its eastern is on a lower level; and, with very trifling variations, the whole of the town may be said to be nearly flat. The wall by which it is surrounded encloses a circuit of from three to four miles, and appears to trace out, in its course, an irregular triangle. The houses are all built of stone, and are of as good masonry, and as highly ornamented, as those of Aleppo. The bazaars are numerous, and well supplied, and are separated, as usual, into departments, each appropriated to the manufacture and sale of particular commodities. Most of the bazaars are covered, and are always fresh, cool, and sheltered both from rain and sunshine. That in which muslins, cottons, and other piece-goods are sold, is equal to any of the bazaars either at Smyrna, Cairo, Damascus, or Aleppo.

The population of Orfah may be estimated at fifty thousand inhabitants, among whom are about two thousand Christians, and five hundred Jews; the rest being all Mahometans. The Christians are chiefly Armenians and Syrians, each of whom have a separate church, and live in a separate quarter; and they are so distinct, that, besides their different rites, their language, and the very character in which it is written, are totally unlike each other. The Armenian and Syriac tongues are confined, however, to their domestic circles, and their religious duties; for, in their intercourse with strangers, Turkish is the language chiefly used by the former, and Arabic by the latter. Both the Christians and the Jews are merchants and traders; the one moving more frequently from place to place with caravans, and the other remaining stationary with the bazaars. The language of Orfah is mostly Turkish. In the bazaars scarcely any other tongue is understood; but Hebrew, Armenian, Syriac, Koordish, Arabic, and Persian, are all spoken by their respective classes of people.

The lake called, 'Birket el Ibrahim el Khaleel,' from being in the native city of that patriarch, 'Abraham the Beloved, or the Friend of God,' is filled from a clear spring which rises in the south-west quarter of the town. It then forms a canal, which is two hundred and twenty-five paces long, by twenty-five paces broad; and generally from five to six feet deep. At the west end, where it commences, a room is built to hang over the stream; and at the east, where a small bridge terminates the greater canal, the waters run into a lesser one, which divides itself into many branches, and is dispersed in streams throughout the town, for the convenience of manufactories, private dwellings, and public khans. The eastern half of the northern bank is occupied by the grand façade of the mosque of the patriarch, whose name it bears; and its foundations are washed by the waters of the lake, which are also considered to be sacred to him. This lake is filled with an incredible number of fine carp, some of which are two feet in length, and of a proportionate thickness. As they are forbidden to be caught or molested, they multiply exceedingly; it being regarded as a sacrilege of the most unpardonable kind, for any one to use them as food. Indeed the people here believe, that, even if these fish were taken, no process of cooking would make any impression on their bodies, or render them at all fit for food. Buckingham's Travels in Mesopotamia, vol. i. pp. 109—154; Taylor's Sacred Geography. Geographical Excursions, No. X.

URIJAH, אוריח, signifies the Lord is my light or fire, or light of the Lord. Urijah, chief priest of the Jews under Ahaz, king of Judah. Ahaz going to Damascus to meet Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, saw there an altar, whose form pleased him so much, that he sent a model of it to the high priest Urijah, with orders to set up such a one in the temple of Jerusalem, which Urijah too well performed. (2 Kings xvi. 10, 11, 12.) Ahaz also ordered the high-priest to remove the brazen altar from before the Lord; and on this new altar to offer the morning and evening sacrifices, &c. reserving to himself to dispose of the great brazen altar at his pleasure. Urijah obeyed the orders of this wicked king in every thing, in the year of the world 3264. Urijah succeeded Zadok the Second, and was succeeded by Shallum.

URIJAH, a prophet of the Lord, son of Shemaiah of Kirjath-jearim, (Jer. xxvi. 20, 21.) who prophesied at the same time as Jeremiah, and declared the same things against Jerusalem and Judah. Jehoiakim, king of Judah, and his great men, resolved to secure him, and put him to death; but Urijah escaped into Egypt. Jehoiakim sent messengers after him, who brought him out of Egypt; he then put him to death by the sword, and ordered him to be buried dishonourably in the graves of the meanest of the people, in the year of the world 3395.

URIM and THUMMIM: the literal signification of these two words is, according to the Hebrew, (Exod. xxviii. 30.) lights and perfections; or, the shining and the perfect; according to Jerome, doctrine and judgment; according to the seventy, ἀλήθεια καὶ ἀλήθειαν, declaration (or manifestation) and truth. Some think Urim and Thummim are only epithets, or explanations, of the stones on the breast-plate of the high-priest; as if it were said, 'Thou shalt put therein stones that are shining and perfect.' Others believe that these two words are rather Egyptian than Hebrew.

But Josephus, and after him several others, as well ancient as modern authors, maintain that the Urim and Thummim were the precious stones of the high-priest's breast-plate, which discovered the will of God by their extraordinary lustre, thereby predicting the success of events to those who consulted them. For when these stones gave no extraordinary lustre, it was concluded that God did not approve of the matter in question. Josephus adds, that it was two hundred years, at the time of his writing, since these stones had left off showing this lustre; so that this oracle had ceased about one hundred and ten years before Jesus Christ.

Others believe that the Urim and Thummim was something belonging to the breast-plate, but they are not agreed what it was; neither Moses, nor any other sacred writer, has distinctly expressed what it might be. Epiphanius and Suidas think, that, beside the twelve stones of the breast-plate, there was a diamond of extraordinary beauty; which by the liveliness of its lustre indicated to the high-priest whether the enterprise in hand was pleasing to God or no. Procopius, Arias Montanus, and some others, place two stones therein, beside the twelve mentioned by Moses. But St. Austin does not approve of these additional stones; nor of that pretended miraculous splendour of these stones; since the Scripture says nothing about the matter.

St. Cyril seems to say that manifestation and truth were written on two precious stones, or on a plate of gold: which is an opinion pretty much followed, both by ancients and moderns. Others held that the words Urim and Thummim were written in embroidery on the breast-plate, between the rows of the stones, or on two borders; one above, the other below, the pectoral. Rabbi Solomon, followed in this by Euginus, believes that the name Jehovah, written on a plate of gold, was the Urim and Thummim. Spencer, in his dissertation on these words, believes they were two little golden figures which gave responses, which were shut up in the pectoral as in a purse, and which answered with an articulate voice such questions as were put to them by the high-priest. M. Le Clerc supposes that Urim and Thummim were the names of some precious stones which composed a great collar, hanging down on the breast of the high-priest; which might be imitated from the Egyptians, among whom the chief officer of justice wore about his neck a figure of truth, engraved on precious stones, and hanging by a golden chain.

There is a great diversity of opinions concerning the manner in which God was consulted by Urim and Thummim. It is agreed, first, that this way of consultation was used only in affairs of very great importance. Secondly, that the high-priest was the only officiating minister in it; and that for this he was clothed in all his pontifical habits; particularly he was to have on his pectoral, to which the Urim and Thummim was affixed. And thirdly, that he was not allowed to perform this solemn consultation for a private person, but only for the king, for the president of the Sanhedrim, for the general of the army of Israel, or other public persons. And even then not on any affair of a private nature, but for the public welfare of church or state; for the common interest of the twelve tribes, whose names the high-priest wore on his pectoral.

When the Urim and Thummim was to be exercised, the high-priest put on his robes, and presented himself, not in the sanctuary, where he could enter but once a year, but in the holy place, before the curtain that parted the sanctum from the sanctuary. There, standing upright, and turning his face towards the ark of the covenant, on which the Divine presence reposed, he proposed the matter for which he consulted. Behind him, in a direct line, at some distance, out of the sanctum, stood the person for whom he consulted, expecting with humility and reverence the answer of the Lord. The Rabbins think that the high-priest, having then his eyes fixed on the stones of the pectoral, which was on his breast, there read the answer of the Lord. The letters that raised themselves out of their places, and shone with more than ordinary lustre, were formed into the answer desired. For example, when David inquired of God, whether he should go up to one of the cities of Judah? (2 Sam. ii. 1.) it was answered him, עלה, Alah, Go up; that is, the three letters, ע ain, ל lamed, and ה he, rose out of their places, as we may say, above the rest, to compose the answer.

This notion is very old among the Jews, since Josephus understood it in this manner; and upon their authority several of the ancient fathers have thus explained the responses by Urim and Thummim. Yet there are difficulties in this. First, all the letters of the Hebrew alphabet were not found on the pectoral; there were four wanting, ה heth, ת teth, ז zade, פ phoph. To supply these, the Rabbins pretend that the names of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were also on the pectoral: but still ת teth would be wanting. Therefore they say this title also was there Col-elle-schibte-Israel, see here all the tribes of Israel. But all this is advanced without proof, and against probability.

Others think, with great probability, that God gave his answers in an articulate voice, heard from within the sanctuary, and from between the cherubim, over the ark of the propitiatory, called the oracle. (Exod. xxv. 18. 20.; xxxvii. 6.; xl. 20. Levit. xvi. 2.) When the Israelites made peace with the Gibeonites, they were blamed for not having inquired at the mouth of the Lord: which insinuates, that he had been used to make his voice heard, when he was consulted.

It remains to inquire, how long the custom of consulting God by Urim and Thummim subsisted. The Rabbins think it continued no longer than under the tabernacle. They have a maxim, that the Holy Spirit spoke to Israel by Urim and Thummim under the tabernacle; under the first temple, by prophets; under the second temple, or after the captivity of Babylon, by the Bath-col, or daughter of the voice; meaning a voice sent from Heaven, as that at the baptism of Jesus Christ, (Matt. iii. 17.) and at his transfiguration. (Matt. xvii. 5. 2 Pet. i. 17.)

VULGATE, the name given to what is called the vulgar Latin translation of the Bible. This is the most ancient version of the Scriptures into Latin, and the only one which the Church of Rome acknowledges as authentic.

The Vulgate of the Old Testament was translated almost verbatim from the Greek of the Septuagint; the author of it is not known, nor so much as guessed at. It was a long time known by the name of the Latin version, as being of very great antiquity in the Latin church. It was commonly in use before Jerome made another translation from the Hebrew. St. Austin preferred this Vulgate before all the other Latin versions, as rendering the words and sense of the sacred text more closely and justly than any of the rest. It has been since corrected from the emendations of Jerome; and it is this mixture of the ancient Italic version, with the corrections of Jerome, which is now called the Vulgate, and which the council of Trent has declared authentic.

The Vulgate of the New Testament is by the Romanists generally preferred to the Greek text. The priests read no other at the altar, the preachers quote no other in the pulpit, nor the divines in the schools. F. Bouhours spent the last years of his life in giving a French translation of the New Testament from the Vulgate: yet that judicious critic owns, that in some few passages the Greek appears more clear and intelligible than the Latin. The editors of the Oxford Greek Testament, 1675, declare, that there is no version in any language to be compared with the Vulgate.

It may be worth while to observe, that when the emigrant French clergy, who fled to save their lives from the fury of the Revolution in France, were in some respects settled in England, the University of Oxford printed two thousand copies of the Vulgate version of the New Testament, to be distributed gratis among them; and two thousand more were printed for the same purpose at the expense of the Marquis of Buckingham. On this occasion arose a controversy, for and against the authority of the Vulgate: the general opinion of well-informed persons seemed to be that, considered as a version, the Vulgate was not to be rejected; but that its authority should be restricted to that of a version only. The avidity with which this present was received by the French clergy was sufficient to justify a much more serious charge against the Church of Rome, namely, that even this version, which she patronizes, is little known, and, consequently, less understood, even by the priests of her communion: most of whom have never seen it otherwise than mutilated in their breviary; and very few of whom have considered and investigated it, as those ought to do who have the charge of instructing others. Broughton's Historical Dictionary, vol. ii. pp. 504, 505; Supplement. Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary of the Holy Bible.

UZZ, רַצ, Vulgate, Us, signifies counsel; otherwise wood; according to the Syriac, to fix, to fasten to. The land of Uz or Gnutz, (Job i. 1.) is evidently Idumæa, as appears from Lam. iv. 21. Uz was the grandson of Seir the Horite. (Gen. xxxvi. 20, 21. 28. 1 Chron. i. 38. 42.) Seir inhabited the mountainous tract which was called by his name antecedently to the time of Abraham; but his posterity being expelled, it was occupied by the Idumæans. (Deut. ii. 12.) Two other men are mentioned of the name Uz; one the grandson of Shem, the other the son of Nahor, the brother of Abraham; but whether any district was called after their name is not clear. Idumæa is a part of Arabia Petræa, situated on the southern extremity of the tribe of Judah (Numb. xxxiv. 3. Josh. xv. 1. 21.): the land of Uz, therefore, appears to have been between Egypt and Philistia, (Jer. xxv. 20.); where the order of the places seems to have been accurately observed in reviewing the different nations from Egypt to Babylon; and the same people seem again to be described in exactly the same situations. (Jer. xlv. 2.)

Nor does the statement of the inspired writer, that Job 'was the greatest of all the men of the East,' (Job i. 3.) militate against this situation of the land of Uz. For the expression 'men of the East,' 'children of the East,' or 'eastern people,' seems to have been the general appellation for that mingled race of people (Jer. xxv. 20.) who inhabited the country between Egypt and the Euphrates, bordering on Judæa from the south to the east; the Idumæans, the Amalekites, the Midianites, the Moabites, the Ammonites, (Judg. vi. 3. Isai. xi. 14.); of these the Idumæans and Amalekites certainly possessed the southern parts. (Numb. xxiv. 3.; xiii. 29. 1 Sam. xxvii. 8. 10.) This appears to be the true state of the case: the whole region between Egypt and the Euphrates was called the East at first in respect to Egypt, (where the learned Joseph Mede thinks the Israelites acquired this mode of speaking,) and afterwards absolutely, and without any relation to situation or circumstances. Hence, though Job is accounted one of the Orientals, it by no means follows that his residence must have been in Arabia Deserta. See Job. Horne's Introduction, vol. iv. pp. 79, 80.

UZZAH, רַצ, signifies strength, otherwise, goat, or kid. Uzzah was son of Abinadab (2 Sam. vi. 3, 4, 5, &c.); in the year of the world 2566. He, with his brother Ahio, conducted the new cart, on which the ark of the covenant was brought from Kirjathjearim to Jerusalem. When they were come as far as Nachon's threshing-floor, or, the floor that was prepared, Uzzah stretched out his hand to support the ark of God, which seemed to him in danger of falling, because of the stumbling of the oxen. The anger of the Lord smote Uzzah because of his rashness and ignorance; and he died on the place.

Opinions are much divided about the occasion of the death of Uzzah. Some think the Lord put him to death because he touched the ark irreverently, without showing sufficient respect to it. Others, that the Lord was provoked by his distrust on this occasion, in attempting to hold up the ark; as if God was not able to preserve it without his assistance. But the true cause is sufficiently explained by David himself, when he says, because there were no priests to carry the ark, (1 Chron. xv. 13.) Uzzah, who was not of the race of Aaron, was so rash as to handle it, and was (it is presumed) the adviser of carrying it in a cart, instead of having it carried on the shoulders of the priests.

It may be proper to notice, 1. that the law (Exod. xxv. 14.) ordered that the ark should be carried on the shoulders of the Levites; whereas in this instance it was drawn by oxen on a cart, as if this carriage by beasts was good enough for it; 2. it was by this means assimilated to the processions of the heathen, who drew their gods about in carriages; 3. if it had been borne by Levites, would Uzzah have been one to bear it? did he think this too much trouble? was the distance too great? &c.

2. That the ark ought to have been enveloped, wholly concealed, by the priests, before the Levites had approached it; whereas 1. no priest attended this procession: 2. was it carried openly, exposed to view, as it was by the Philistines? (1 Sam. vi. 13. 19.) Uzzah, being a Levite, ought to have known these rules, and being the principal in conducting the procession, and, probably, the elder brother, was principally guilty, whereas Ahio was subordinate to him.

3. It is likely that the oxen drew it safely while in a straight road, but when they came to turn into the threshing-floor that was prepared, one of them became restive, and, refusing to go in, started aside [tumbled], which provoked Uzzah, put him off his guard, and irritated his temper to rashness.

But the words are capable of another rendering; 'And they came to the threshing floor prepared: and Uzzah put forth his hand to the ark of God, and seized it,' laid hold of it strongly, held it back, 'inasmuch that—to such a degree that—'one of the oxen stumbled,' or started, 'and the Lord smote Uzzah upon this rashness: and he died on the spot with,' that is, as close as possible adjoining to, 'the ark.'

This history then may stand thus: Uzzah was so intent on preventing the oxen from drawing the cart any further than the entrance of the floor prepared to receive it, that he pulled, with all his might, against the oxen, who were going on; one of them slipped, and the whole weight of the cart, or, rather, of the ark, falling on Uzzah, he was crushed on the spot. In this view of the story, Uzzah may be said to have been the cause of his own death. This shows also, 1. how Ahio, though equally blameable in not covering, or not bearing the ark, might escape any disaster. 2. It gives the reason of the prepared floor being mentioned, the occurrence happening at the entrance of it; and, 3. it agrees with the name given by David to the place,

'the breach of Uzzah,' that is, where Uzzah was broken, — pressed out—crushed to death.

Had the ark been carried on the shoulders of the Levites, as it ought to have been, such a fatal event could not have happened, as they could have heard and obeyed orders to stop, &c. so that greater respect to the ark, had been greater security to its attendants. This is perfectly agreeable to what David afterwards observes: (1 Chron. xv. 13.) 'The Lord made a breach upon us formerly, because we sought him not after a due order,' &c. The order of the words is strongly in favour of this sense of the particle rendered insomuch; as is its frequent import, instead of for, as in our translation. Supplement. Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary.

WAH

WHABEES, a numerous and powerful sect in Arabia. By some they have been reckoned in the number of Deists; but as they acknowledge the Koran to have been sent by Heaven to Mahomet, the name of Deists can scarcely belong to them. This sect was founded nearly a century ago by an Arab named Shaikh Mahomet, the son of Abd-ool Wahab, whose name they have taken. Shaikh Mahomed connected himself, in an attempt to reform the religion of his country, with Ebn-Saoud, the prince of Dereah, the capital of the province of Nujud. Through the effort of the saint Shaikh Mahomet, and the temporal power of Ebn-Saoud, and of his son and successor, Abd-ool Azeez, the religion of the Wahabees is now established over the peninsula of Arabia. Their tenets are peculiar. They profess that there is one God, and that Mahomet is his prophet; but as the Supreme Being neither has nor can have any participator in his power, they say it is blasphemy to hold that Mahomet, the Imams, or any saints, have any superintendence over the affairs of men, or will render them any aid hereafter. They deem Mahometans infidels who deviate in any way from the plain literal meaning of the Koran, and maintain that to make war on all such is the duty of every Wahabee. It is one of their tenets, that all titles showing respect and honour to men are odious to God, who alone is worthy of high name: and they assert that in conformity to what is revealed in the Koran, true Mahometans should wage continual war against unbelievers, till they are converted, or agree to pay the tribute imposed on infidels; and that in the latter case they should be compelled to wear the coarsest garments, not be allowed to ride on horses, nor to live in splendid dwellings.

They maintain that the taxes levied by Mahomet are alone lawful; that swearing by Mahomet, or Ali, or any person, should be prohibited, since an oath is calling a witness to our secret thoughts, which no one can know but God. They deem it a species of idolatry to erect magnificent tombs; but to kiss relics, &c. is idolatry itself: and they therefore affirm, that it is an action acceptable to God to destroy the tombs of Mahometan saints in Arabia and Persia, and to appropriate their rich ornaments to worldly purposes, for which they were designed. They say that it is wicked to mourn for the dead; for if they were good Mahometans their souls are in paradise, at which their friends should rejoice.

The Wahabees reject the traditions, limiting their belief to the Koran, which, they say, was sent from Heaven to Mahomet, who was an excellent man, and much beloved by God. They continue to preserve the usages of circumcision, ablution, &c., which they found established, but consider them more as matters of practice and usage, than of faith. The leading principle of this sect, is their right to destroy and plunder all who differ from them; and those Mahometans who do not adopt their creed, are represented as far less entitled to mercy than either Jews or Christians. Their progress was so great about fifteen years ago, as to excite considerable alarm in the Turkish government. Among other places, they plundered the rich tombs of Ali and his sons at Nujuff and Kerbelah. Their inroads are always dreadful, for they spare none who do not conform to their opinions; but they have lately met with some severe checks, and appear to be declining. Sir John Malcolm's History of Persia, vol. ii. pp. 263, 264, Note; Adam's Religious World Displayed, vol. iii. pp. 469, 470; Monthly Magazine, vol. xxxiii. p. 60; vol. xxxviii. p. 565.

WALDENSES, or VALDENSES, a sect of reformers who first appeared about the year 1160. The learned Mosheim contends that they derive their name from Peter Waldo, an opulent merchant of Lyons. 'From the Latin word vallis,' says the late Mr. Robert Robinson, 'came the English word valley, the French and Spanish valle, the Italian valdesi, the low Dutch valleye, the Provençal vaur, vaudois, the ecclesiastical Valdenses, Ualdenses, and Waldenses. The words simply signify valleys, inhabitants of valleys, and no more. It happened that the inhabitants of the valleys of the Pyrenees did not profess the Catholic faith; it fell out also that the inhabitants of the valleys about the Alps did not embrace it; it happened, moreover, in the ninth century, that one Valdo, a friend and counsellor of Berengarius, and a man of eminence who had many followers, did not approve of the papal discipline and doctrine; and it came to pass about an hundred and thirty years after, that a rich merchant of Lyons, who was called Valdus [or Waldo] because he received his religious notions from the inhabitants of the valleys, openly disavowed the Roman religion, supported many to teach the doctrines believed in the valleys, and became the instrument of the conversion of great numbers; all these people were called Waldenses.' The Albigenes and Waldenses, says Gretzer, were two branches of the same sect, and the former sprang from the latter. See ALBIGENSES.

It was not till the twelfth century that the Vaudois appear in ecclesiastical history as a people obnoxious to the church of Rome. Even then it seems, in a great measure, to have been occasioned by the indefatigable labours, the ardent zeal, and the amazing success which crowned the ministry of Peter Waldo of Lyons, whose followers first obtained the name of Leonists, and who, when persecuted in France, fled into Piedmont, incorporating themselves with the Vaudois. Ardently solicitous for the advancement of rational piety and Christian knowledge, Peter, about the year 1160, employed Stephanus de Evisa, a priest, to translate into French the four Gospels, with other books of the Holy Scriptures, and the most remarkable sentences of the ancient fathers. No sooner, however, had he perused those sacred records with a proper degree of attention, than he perceived that the religion which was now taught in the Roman Church differed totally from that which was originally inculcated by Christ and his apostles. Struck with this glaring departure from the truth, and animated with a pious zeal for promoting his own salvation and that of others, he abandoned his mercantile vocation, distributed his riches among the poor, and forming an association with other pious men, who had adopted his sentiments and his turn of devotion, he began, in 1180, to assume the character of a public teacher. The archbishop of Lyons, and the other rulers of the church in that province, opposed with vigour this new instructor in the exercise of his ministry. But their opposition was unsuccessful; for the purity and simplicity of the doctrines inculcated by these sectaries, the spotless innocence of their lives and actions, and their noble contempt of riches and honours, appeared so engaging to all who were possessed of any true sense of piety, that the number of their disciples and followers daily increased. Hence the Waldenses were called poor men of Lyons. They formed religious assemblies, first in France, and afterwards in Lombardy, whence they propagated their tenets throughout the other countries of Europe with incredible rapidity, and with such invincible fortitude, that neither fire nor sword, nor the most cruel inventions of merciless persecution, could damp their zeal, or entirely ruin their cause.

The tenets of the Waldenses appear in the following confession of their faith, to which Sir Samuel Morland has fixed the date of the year 1120: '1. We believe and firmly maintain all that is contained in the twelve articles of the symbol, commonly called the Apostles' Creed, and we regard as heretical whatever is inconsistent with the said twelve articles. 2. We believe that there is one God, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. 3. We acknowledge for sacred canonical Scriptures the books of the Holy Bible. (Here follows the title of each, exactly conformably to our received canon.) 4. The books above-mentioned teach us that there is one God, almighty, unbounded in wisdom, and infinite in goodness, and who, in his goodness, has made all things. For he created Adam after his own image and likeness. But through the enmity of the devil and his own disobedience Adam fell, sin entered into the world, and we became transgressors in and by Adam. 5. That Christ had been promised to the fathers who received the law, to the end that, knowing their sin by the law, and their unrighteousness and insufficiency, they might desire the coming of Christ to make satisfaction for their sins, and to accomplish the law by himself. 6. That at the time appointed of the Father, Christ was born,—a time when iniquity every where abounded, to make it manifest that it was not for the sake of any good in ourselves, for all were sinners, but that He, who is true, might display his grace and mercy towards us. 7. That Christ is our life, and truth, and peace, and righteousness, our shepherd and advocate, our sacrifice and priest, who died for the salvation of all who should believe, and rose again for our justification. 8. And we also firmly believe that there is no other mediator, or advocate with God the Father, but Jesus Christ. And as to the Virgin Mary, she was holy, humble, and full of grace; and this we also believe concerning all other saints, namely, that they are waiting in heaven for the resurrection of their bodies at the day of judgment. 9. We also believe, that after this life there are but two places, one for those who are saved, the other for those who are damned, which [two] we call paradise and hell, wholly denying that imaginary purgatory of anti-christ, invented in opposition to the truth. 10. Moreover, we have ever regarded all the inventions of men, in the affairs of religion, as an unspeakable abomination before God; such as the festival days, and vigils of saints, and what is called holy water, the abstaining from flesh on certain days, and such like things, but above all, the masses. 11. We hold in abhorrence all human inventions as proceeding from antichrist, which produce distress, and are prejudicial to the liberty of the mind. 12. We consider the sacraments as signs of holy things, or as the visible emblems of invisible blessings. We regard it as proper and even necessary that believers use these symbols or visible forms when it can be done. Notwithstanding which, we maintain that believers may be saved without these signs, when they have neither place nor opportunity of observing them. 13. We acknowledge no sacraments (as of Divine appointment), but Baptism and the Lord's Supper. 14. We honour the secular powers, with subjection, obedience, promptitude, and payment.'

The rules of practice adopted by the Waldenses were extremely austere; for they took as the model of their moral discipline, the sermon of Christ upon the mount, which they interpreted and explained in the most rigorous and literal manner; and consequently condemned war, as the excess of human folly, and wickedness; prohibited law-suits, and all attempts towards the acquisition of wealth; dissuaded from the inflicting of capital punishments, self-defence against unjust violence, and oaths of all kinds. The government of the church was committed by the Waldenses to bishops, presbyters, and deacons; for they acknowledged that these three ecclesiastical orders were instituted by Christ himself. But they considered it as absolutely necessary, that all these orders should exactly resemble the apostles, and be, like them, poor in worldly possessions, and furnished with some laborious vocation, in order to gain by constant industry their daily subsistence.

An impartial review of the doctrinal sentiments maintained by the Waldenses, the discipline, order, and worship of their churches, as well as their general deportment, and manner of life, not to mention their determined and uniform opposition to the Church of Rome, affords abundant evidence of the similarity of their views and practices to those held by Luther, Calvin, and the other illustrious characters whose labours in the sixteenth century contributed so eminently to effect the glorious Reformation. They were fully agreed in most of their first principles; and reasoning consequently, their deductions generally coincided.

During the greatest part of the seventeenth century, those of the Waldenses, who lived in the valleys of Piedmont, and who had embraced the doctrine, discipline, and worship of the Church of Geneva, were oppressed and persecuted in the most barbarous and inhuman manner by the ministers of Rome. This persecution was carried on with peculiar marks of rage and enormity in the years 1655, 1656, and 1686, and seemed to portend nothing less than the total extinction of that unhappy people. The most horrid scenes of violence and bloodshed were exhibited in this theatre of papal tyranny. The few Waldenses that survived were indebted for their existence and support to the intercession made for them by the English and Dutch governments, and also by the Swiss cantons, who solicited the clemency of the Duke of Savoy on their behalf. Thus were the valleys of Piedmont dispeopled of its ancient inhabitants, and the lamp of heavenly light, which during a long succession of ages had here shined in resplendent lustre, was at length removed. Jones's Hist. of the Waldenses; Gregory's Hist. of the Christian Church, vol. ii. pp. 122—127.

WAR. The Hebrews were formerly a very warlike nation. The books that inform us of their wars are written neither by ignorant nor flattering authors, but inspired by the spirit of truth and wisdom. Their warriors were not fabulous heroes, but commonly wise and valiant generals, raised up by God 'to fight the battles of the Lord.' Such were Joshua, Gideon, Jephthah, Samson, David, Josiah, &c.

Their wars were not undertaken upon slight occasions, nor performed with a handful of people. Under Joshua the affair was of no less importance than to conquer a vast country, which God had given to Israel, from several powerful nations, which God had devoted to an anathema, to vindicate an offended Deity, and human nature, debased by a wicked and corrupt people, who had filled up the measure of their iniquities. Under the Judges, the matter was to assert their liberty, by shaking off the yoke of powerful kings, who kept them in subjection. Under Saul and David, to these motives were added that of subduing such provinces as God had promised to his people.

In the later times of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, we observe their kings bearing the shock of the greatest powers of Asia, the kings of Assyria and Chaldea, Shalmaneser, Sennacherib, Esar-haddon, and Nebuchadnezzar, who made the whole East tremble. Under the Maccabees, the business was with a handful of men, to oppose the whole power of the kings of Syria, to uphold the religion of their fathers, and to shake off the yoke of that authority which designed to subvert both their religion and liberty. In the last times of their nation, with what courage, with what intrepidity and constancy, did they sustain the war against the Romans, who were then masters of the world!

We may distinguish two kinds of wars among the Hebrews. Some were of obligation, as being expressly commanded by the Lord; but others were free and voluntary. The first were, for example, against the Amalekites, and the Canaanites, which were nations devoted to an anathema. The others were to revenge injuries, insults, or offences offered to the nation. Such was that against the city of Gibeah, and against the tribe of Benjamin: and such was that of David against the Ammonites, whose king had affronted his ambassadors; or to maintain and defend their allies; as that of Joshua against the kings of the Canaanites, to protect the Gibeonites. Lastly, whatever reasons may authorize a nation or a prince to make war against another, obtained likewise among the Hebrews. All the laws of Moses suppose that the Israelites might make war, and might oppose their enemies.

When a war was resolved on, all the people capable of bearing arms were assembled, or only part of them, according to the exigence of the case, and the necessity and importance of the enterprize. For it does not appear, that before the reign of David there were any regular troops in Israel. A general rendezvous was appointed; and a review was made of the people by tribes and by families. When Saul, at the beginning of his reign, was informed of the cruel proposal made by the Ammonites to the men of Jabesh-Gilead, he cut in pieces the oxen belonging to his plough, and sent them through the country, saying, 'Whosoever cometh not forth after Saul and Samuel, so shall it be done unto his oxen.' (1 Sam. xi. 7.)

them; hence these wars were generally of short continuance, because it was hardly possible to subsist a large body of troops for a long time with such provisions as every one carried with him. When David, Jesse's younger son, stayed behind, to look after his father's flocks, while his elder brothers went to the war with Saul, Jesse sent David to carry provisions to his brothers. (1 Sam. xvii. 13.) We suppose that this way of making war prevailed also under Joshua, the Judges, Saul, David at the beginning of his reign, the kings of Judah and Israel, successors to Rehoboam and Jeroboam; and under the Maccabees, till the time of Simon Maccabæus, prince and high-priest of the Jews, who kept soldiers in pay. (1 Macc. xiv. 32.) Every one also provided his own arms for war. The kings of the Hebrews did not begin to have magazines till David. We do not read of any horses, either for the generals or the officers, under the judges, Saul, or David. After this time they were not so scarce; and it appears that the kings of Judah and Israel went to war, riding in chariots. The officers of war among the Hebrews were the general of the army, the princes of the tribes or of the families of Israel, besides other princes or captains, some of a thousand, some of a hundred, some of fifty, and some of ten men. They had also their scribes, who were a kind of commissaries that kept the muster-roll of the troops; and these had others under them, who acted by their direction.

WEEK. The Hebrews had three sorts of weeks: 1. Weeks of days, which were reckoned from one sabbath to another. 2. Weeks of years, which were reckoned from one sabbatical year to another, and consisting of seven years. 3. Weeks of seven times seven years; or of forty-nine years, reckoned from one jubilee to another.

The Weeks of Daniel. It is agreed that the famous weeks of Daniel are weeks of years, and not of days. But some have made them of seventy years; so that the seventy weeks would contain four thousand nine hundred years. However, the generality of interpreters suppose them to consist of seven lunar or Hebrew years; and by this reckoning the seventy weeks would make four hundred and ninety years. (Dan. ix. 24—27.) There are many different hypotheses concerning the beginning and the end of Daniel's seventy weeks, even among Christian writers, who believe that this prophecy marks the time of the birth and death of our Saviour Jesus Christ. Some begin them from the first year of Darius the Mede, which is the epocha of Daniel's prophecy, and conclude them at the profanation of the temple, under the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes. Some begin them from the first year of Cyrus at Babylon, and end them at the destruction of the temple by the Romans. Others fix the beginning at the first year of Darius the Mede, in which this revelation was made to Daniel, and their end at the birth of Jesus Christ. Julius Africanus began the seventy weeks at the second year of Artaxerxes, who sent back Nehemiah into Judea, commissioned to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem; and he terminated them at the death of the Messiah, which happened, according to him, in the fifteenth year of Tiberius. Dr. Hales, and the late David Levi, reckon the seventy weeks of Daniel to commence from the time of Nehemiah's reform, before Christ 420 years, and to terminate with the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, A.D. 70. This is also agreeable to the opinion of Mede and Scaliger. 'The seventy weeks, or 490 years of which this period consists,' says Dr. Hales, 'are historically divided into 62, 7 and 1, weeks; and the one week subdivided into a half week. At the expiration of $62 + 7 = 69$ weeks, or 483 years, Messiah the Leader was to send forth his "armies (the Romans), to destroy those murderers (the Jews), and to burn their city." (Matt. xxii. 7.) And accordingly, the Jewish war commenced in the last or seventieth week, A.D. 65, during the administration of Gessius Florus, whose exactions drove the Jews into rebellion, according to Josephus.' Hales's New Analysis of Chronology, vol. ii. book i. p. 564.

WHALE, the greatest of fishes known. Pliny says that whales have been seen of six hundred feet long, and three hundred and sixty feet thick. And Solinus writes, that there have been seen some of eight hundred feet long. But these are fables, and extravagant exaggerations. We are however assured, that in America there are some so large, that they measure ninety or a hundred feet from head to tail; and it is owned that the whales in the North Seas are larger than those on the coast of Guinea, or in the Mediterranean. They might be much larger formerly, before the harpoon cut them off long before the natural term of their life.

In Scripture there is often mention made of the cetus or whale. But the Hebrew word תנינ thannim, translated by whale, includes all large fishes, whether of rivers, or of the sea. The fish that swallowed Jonah was probably the carcharias, great shark, or sea-dog. See FISH, and JONAH.

WHITFIELDITES, the followers of the late Rev. George Whitfield. About the year 1741, or soon after Mr. Whitfield's second return from America, which in the course of his life he is said to have visited seven times, he entirely separated from Mr. Wesley and his friends, 'because he did not hold the decrees.' Here was the first breach which warm men persuaded Mr. Whitfield to make, merely for a difference of opinion. Those, indeed, who held general redemption, had no desire to separate; but those who believed particular redemption, being determined to have no fellowship with men that 'were in such dangerous errors,' would not hear of any accommodation. So that, from the difference of the doctrines which each party maintained respecting the decrees of God and free-will, the body of Methodists, already immense, divided into two separate communions, the Calvinistic and the Arminian; these holding general, and those particular redemption.

Mr. Whitfield, on being excluded from the pulpits in the Establishment, preached both in chapels licensed under the Toleration Act, in places which were unlicensed, in the open air, in Moorfields, on Kennington Common, in the pulpits of the Associated Presbytery in Scotland, in those also of the Scottish national church; and 'if the pope himself,' said he, 'would lend me his pulpit, I would gladly proclaim in it the righteousness of the Lord Jesus Christ.' He distinctly professed himself a minister at large. 'Itinerating,' he used to say, 'is my delight.' As a preacher he was more popular than Mr. Wesley, but not more diligent; the lives of both were active and laborious in the extreme; but a period was much sooner put to Mr. Whitfield's exertions than to those of Mr. Wesley; for the former died in 1770, in the fifty-sixth year of his age, at Newbury Port, near Boston, in New England.

We are told that the followers of Mr. Whitfield 'are, in the aggregate, a body nearly as numerous' as those of Mr. Wesley, but not so compact and united. 'Their principles, being Calvinistic, recommended them especially to the various denominations of Dissenters, and to those of the reformed religion in Scotland and abroad. A great number of these joined Mr. Whitfield, as well as multitudes who left the established church. These were formed into congregations in divers places, who, though considering themselves as one body, have not the same union and interchange as the followers of Mr. Wesley. The first and principal of the churches, at Tottenham Court, observes the church ceremonials and liturgy, the others use in general free prayer. Yet these consider themselves not as distinct independent churches, but formed under a federal connexion: and some of these have no stated pastor, but are supplied by a rotation of ministers. They have an ordination among themselves; and where there is a stationary ministry, they still hold connexion with each other, and come up as invited or called upon to the greater congregations, for a fixed space, according to an appointed routine. All these places of worship are supported, not like Mr. Wesley's, by a general fund; but the expenses of the meeting, and salaries of ministers, are provided by the several congregations, and collected and expended in each by stewards chosen out of the principal people.

Some of Mr. Whitfield's followers, however, seeing that the order established, which permitted the well-disposed among them to preach, who were not altogether qualified either in language or grammar, had not so good an effect with the intelligent part of the hearers, separated themselves under the patronage of the Countess of Huntingdon, who, while she lived, was the guardian of a connexion, which, until this period, had never obtained such consequence and respectability. The cause of this prosperity is obvious. The intelligent among them saw how necessary it was for the credit of religion, that their preachers should receive instruction, that men should not be permitted to preach, who, so far from understanding the original languages in which the Scriptures were written, did not even understand their own language, so as to deliver their sentiments with that grammatical accuracy which is absolutely necessary for a public speaker.

Accordingly, the Countess of Huntingdon not only erected chapels in various parts of the kingdom, but built a college at Trevecka, in Wales, for the purpose of educating pious young men for the ministry. Her own labours, we are told, were unwearying, her liberality extensive, and her whole deportment humble and pious; and in this connexion alone, including the country congregations, in England, Wales, and Ireland, it is said there are now no less than one hundred thousand members. She 'left all her numerous chapels in the hands of devisees; they pursue exactly the same method of procedure as she did. A number of ministers of the established church, and especially from Wales, where she long resided, continue to supply in rotation the larger chapels of her erection; and those who were her students in her college in Wales, or have since been educated at Cheshunt, with others approved and chosen for the work, are dispersed through Great Britain and Ireland. All these ministers serve in succession; not depending upon the congregations in which they minister for their support, but on the trustees, under whose direction they move. Every congregation furnishes a stipulated maintenance to the minister during his residence among them, and his travelling expenses; but in no congregation do they remain as stated pastors, but expect a successor as soon as the time affixed for their stay is completed. Nor can any of the congregations dismiss the person resident, or procure a change, but by application to the trustees, such being the conditions on which they engage to supply them with a succession of ministers. If any minister is peculiarly useful, and request is made that his stay may be prolonged, it is usually complied with; nay, sometimes, at the desire of the people, he is allowed to settle among them, liable however to a call of two or three months annually, to be employed in the work at large. And if any minister is not acceptable, or his ministry beneficial, his stay is shortened, and he is removed to another station.'

On the death of Lady Huntingdon, which happened in 1791, Lady Ann Erskine, sister, or a near relation, of Lord Erskine, took her situation, and is said to have been equally attentive to the concerns of this part of the religious community. The property left by Lady Huntingdon for carrying on the work in which she had so warmly engaged was seized at her death by the Americans of Georgia and Carolina, where it lay; and her assets in England, her chapels excepted, were not found sufficient for her engagements; 'yet however unable to recover her estates, all claims have been discharged; and the chapels, according to her will, maintained with less encumbrances than at her decease.' The seminary in Wales ceased at her Ladyship's death, the lease being just expired, and no endowment left, her income dying with her. But a new college, on a plan more promising for literature, has been established at Cheshunt, in Hertfordshire, near London; and under the superintending care of trustees appointed for that purpose.' The students are not received into this college too young, nor much advanced in life; usually between the age of twenty and thirty; and the term allotted for their studies is three or four years. Their education and maintenance is entirely free; 'and at the expiration of the term of their studies, when they have been examined, and judged fit to proceed to the ministry, they are under no restrictions, but may apply for admission into the established church, or any other denomination of Christians. If Christ be but preached,' say they, 'the end of our seminary is answered.' Dr. Haweis's History of the Church of Christ, vol. iii. pp. 256—263; Adam's Religious World Displayed, vol. iii. pp. 140—149.

WICKLIFFITES, the followers of the famous John Wickliff, called 'the first reformer,' who was born in Yorkshire, in the year 1324. He was an English doctor, professor of divinity at Oxford, and afterwards rector of Lutterworth; and according to the testimony of the writers of these times, he was a man of enterprising genius and extraordinary learning. In the year 1360, animated by the example of Richard, archbishop of Armagh, he first defended the statutes and privileges of the University of Oxford against all the orders of the mendicants, and had the courage to throw out some slight reproofs against the popes, their principal patrons. After this, in the year 1367, he was deprived of the wardenship of Canterbury-hall, in the University of Oxford, by Simon Langham, archbishop of Canterbury, who substituted a monk in his place; upon which he appealed to Urban V.: but that pontiff confirmed the sentence of the archbishop against him, on account of the freedom with which he inveighed against the monastic orders. Highly exasperated at this treatment, he threw off all restraint, and not only attacked all the monks, and their scandalous irregularities, but even the pontifical power itself, and other ecclesiastical abuses, both in his sermons and writings. He even proceeded to still greater lengths, and, detesting the wretched superstitions of the times, refuted with great acuteness and spirit the absurd notions which were generally received in religious matters, and not only exhorted the laity to study the Scriptures, but also translated into English the sacred books, in order to render the perusal of them more universal.

These services, so important to the cause of rational piety, were received with very considerable approbation by persons of every rank; for all abhorred the vices of the clergy, the tyranny of the court of Rome, and the insatiable avarice of the monks. But his attack of the doctrine of Transubstantiation occasioned the defection of numbers, who had entered with avidity into every other object of his designs, and firmly attached themselves to his interests.

The monks, whom Wickliff had principally exasperated, commenced a violent persecution against him at the court of Gregory XI.; and, in the year 1377, that pontiff ordered Simon Sudbury, archbishop of Canterbury, to take cognizance of the affair, in a council held at London. Imminent as the danger evidently was, Wickliff escaped it by the interest of the Duke of Lancaster: and soon after the death of Gregory XI. the fatal schism of the Romish church commenced, during which there was one pope at Rome, and another at Avignon, so that of necessity the controversy lay dormant for a considerable time. No sooner, however, was this embroiled state of affairs tolerably settled, than the process against him was revived by William de Courtenay, Archbishop of Canterbury, in the year 1385, and was carried on with great vehemence, in two councils held at London and Oxford. The event was, that, of the twenty-three opinions for which Wickliff had been prosecuted by the monks, ten were condemned as heresies, and thirteen as errors. He himself, however, returned in safety to Lutterworth, where he died peaceably in the year 1387. He left many followers in England, and other countries, who were styled Wickliffites and Lollards, the latter of which was a term of popular reproach transferred from the Flemish tongue into the English. Wherever they could be found, they were persecuted by the inquisitors, and other ministers of the Romish church; and, in the council of Constance, in the year 1415, the memory and opinions of Wickliff were condemned by a solemn decree; and about thirteen years after, his bones were dug up, and publicly burnt. Gregory's History of the Christian Church, vol. ii. pp. 214—216.

WIDOW. Among the Hebrews, even before the law, a widow, who had no children by her husband, was to marry the brother of her deceased spouse, in order to raise up children who might inherit his goods, and perpetuate his name and family. We find the practice of this custom before the law, in the person of Tamar, who married successively Er and Onan, the sons of Judah, and who was likewise to have married Selah, the third son of this patriarch, after the two former were dead without issue. (Gen. xxxviii. 6—11.)

The law that appoints these marriages is Deut. xxv. 5, &c.

Two motives prevailed to the enacting of this law. The first was, the continuation of estates in the same family, and the other was to perpetuate a man's name in Israel. It was looked on as a great misfortune for a man to die without an heir, or to see his inheritance pass into another family. This law was not confined to brothers-in-law only, but was extended to more distant relations of the same line, as we see in the example of Ruth, who married Boaz after she had been refused by a nearer kinsman.

WIDOWHOOD, as well as barrenness, was a kind of shame and reproach in Israel. Isaiah, (liv. 4.) says, 'Thou shalt forget the shame of thy youth,' passed in celibacy and barrenness, 'and shalt not remember the reproach of thy widowhood any more.' It was presumed that a woman of merit and reputation might have found a husband, either in the family of her deceased husband, if he died without children; or in some other family if he had left children.

God frequently recommends to his people to be very careful in relieving the widow and orphan. (Exod. xxii. 22. Deut. x. 18.; xiv. 29.) St. Paul would have us honour widows that are widows indeed, and desolate (Tim. v. 3, &c.); that is, have a great regard for them, and supply them in their necessity; for this is often signified by the verb to honour. God forbids his high-priest to marry a woman who is either a widow, or divorced. (Levit. xxi. 14.)

Formerly there were widows in the Christian church, who, because of their poverty, were placed on the list of persons to be provided for at the expense of the church. There were others, who had certain employments in the church; as, to visit sick women, to assist women at baptism, and to do several things which decency would not permit the other sex to do. St. Paul did not allow any woman to be chosen into this number, unless she were threescore years old at least. (1. Tim. v. 9.) They must have been married but once; must produce good testimony of their good works; must have given good education to their children; must have exercised hospitality; washed the feet of the saints; and given succour to the miserable and afflicted.

WILDERNESS, or DESERT, Ἔρημος, מִדְבָּר; by Midbar, 'desert,' the Hebrews mean an uncultivated place, particularly if mountainous. Some deserts were entirely dry and barren; others were beautiful, and had good pastures. The Scripture speaks of the beauty of the desert (Psalm lxiv. 13. Jer. ix. 10. Joel i. 20.); and it names several deserts of the Holy Land. Indeed, there was scarcely a town without a desert belonging to it; that is, uncultivated places, for woods and pastures, like our English commons, or common lands.

ARABIA PETRÆA, Wilderness or Desert of, in which the Israelites sojourned forty years after leaving Egypt, is particularly called the Wilderness or Desert. The journey of the Israelites, forty years, from their departure out of Egypt, till their arrival in the promised land of Canaan, is the most extraordinary event recorded in history.

Almost every stage of it is marked by a succession of miracles the most signal and astonishing. For the instruction and admonition of posterity, Moses was directed to form a journal of their several stations and encampments, the principal of which he has recorded. (Numb. xxxiii. 1—49.) Dr. Shaw, Dr. Pococke, and several others, have endeavoured to trace the intricate route of the Israelites through 'the great and terrible, the waste and howling wilderness' of Arabia Petræa. By them many of the stages have been ascertained. However, no part of the history of the Israelites is more perplexing and obscure, in its geography, than the stations of this people during their continuance in the wilderness, and their progress towards Canaan. For though the descriptions of many are so particular, that the places are readily ascertained by them, yet this is not the case with all.

The following Table of the Stations, &c. of the Israelites in the wilderness, is copied from Dr. Hales's 'New Analysis of Chronology,' vol. i. pp. 365—400:

WINE. Several of the ancients were of opinion that wine was not in use before the Deluge, and that Noah was the first that introduced this liquor. However, scarcely any sacrifices were made to the Lord, but they were accompanied with libations of wine. (Exod. xxix. 40. Numb. xv. 5, 7.) Wine was forbidden to the priests during the time they were in the tabernacle, and employed in the services of the altar. (Levit. x. 9.) This liquor was also forbidden to the Nazarites. (Numb. vi. 3.) The Rechabites observed a strict abstinence from wine, in pursuance of the commands they had received from their father Rechab.

In the style of the sacred penmen, the wine, or the cup, often represents the anger of God: 'Thou hast made us drink the wine of astonishment.' (Psaln lx. 3.) The Lord says to Jeremiah, (xxv. 15.) 'Take the wine-cup of this fury at my hand, and cause all the nations to whom I send thee, to drink it.' Wine was administered medicinally to such as were in trouble and sorrow. 'Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine to those that be of heavy hearts.' (Prov. xxxi. 4, 5, 6, &c.) The Rabbins tell us, that they used to give wine and strong drink to those who were condemned to die, at their execution, to stupify them, and take off some part of the fear and sense of their pain. There were certain charitable women at Jerusalem, they tell us, who used to mix certain drugs with wine, to make it stronger, and more capable of abating the sense of pain. Some think that such a kind of mixture was offered to Jesus Christ to drink, before he was fastened to the cross, (Mark xv. 23.); 'And they gave him to drink wine mingled with myrrh: but he received it not.'

We read in the Evangelists of three portions offered to our Saviour at his passion. St. Matthew says, (xxvii. 33.) that when they came to Calvary they gave him to drink wine mixed with gall; but when he had tasted it, he would not drink it. St. Mark says, (xv. 23.) that they offered him wine mixed with myrrh; but he would not drink of it. St. Matthew says, (xxvii. 48.) that Jesus Christ being upon the cross, a soldier filling a sponge with vinegar, put it upon the end of a reed, and raised it to his mouth. This is entirely different from the two former. The business is, to reconcile Matthew and Mark, and to determine whether the wine mingled with gall, mentioned by Matthew, be the wine mixed with myrrh of Mark.

Some have advanced, that Matthew having written it was wine mixed with gall, that was offered to our Saviour, Mark intended to express the bitterness of the gall by the word myrrh, which is a very bitter ingredient. Some have conceived that these two potions were offered our Saviour at different times; that the devout women who attended on him offered him myrrhed wine, to diminish his sense of pain, whereas that of the soldiers was wine mixed with gall. Might the first potion be prepared by friends, the second common to ordinary criminals?

WINE of Helbon (Ezekiel xxvii. 18.) was sold at the fairs of Tyre. Some say, that wine was well known to the ancients; they called it Chalibonium vinum. It was made at Damascus; and the Persians had planted vineyards there on purpose, as Posidonius affirms. This author says, that the kings of Persia used no other wine for their common drink. Others make Helbon a common name, 'sweet or fat wine:' for Helbon comes from a word that signifies fat.

WINE of Lebanon. Hosea (xiv. 7.) speaks of this wine: 'The scent thereof shall be as the wine of Lebanon.' The wines of those sides of Mount Libanus that had a good aspect were heretofore much esteemed. But some think that the Hebrew text, 'Wine of Lebanon,' may signify a sweet-scented wine, wine in which perfumes are mixed, or other drugs, to give it a better flavour. Odoriferous wines were not unknown to the Hebrews. In the Canticles, (viii. 2.) mention is made of a medicated wine mixed with perfumes. The wines of Palestine being heady, they used to qualify them with water; or rather, perhaps, they mingled two kinds of wine together; that they might be drunk without any inconvenience. 'She hath mingled her wine; she hath also furnished her table. Come, eat of my bread, and drink of the wine which I have mingled.' (Prov. ix. 2. 5.) 'The wicked eat the bread of wickedness, and drink the wine of violence,' (Prov. iv. 17.) that is to say, they are maintained with ill-gotten goods, or they abuse the good things that God gives them: they offend him by the bad use they make of the necessaries of life.

In Amos (ii. 8.) it is said, 'they drink the wine of the condemned in the house of their God:' that is, they drink the wine, they make themselves merry at the expense of those whom they have unjustly condemned. The Septuagint say, they drink wine earned by their slanders. The Chaldees, the wine of rapine, of fines, mulcts.

WISDOM, sapientia; in Greek Σοφία Sophia; in Hebrew חכמה, Chachemah. 1. Wisdom signifies understanding, or the knowledge of things supernatural and divine. It occurs in this sense in the Psalms, &c. This wisdom Solomon entreated of God with so much earnestness, and God granted him with so much liberality. This may be called Sacred Understanding.

2. Wisdom expresses quickness of invention, and dexterity in the execution of works, which require not so much strength of body as exertion of mind. God told Moses that he had filled Bezaleel and Aholiab with wisdom, and understanding, and knowledge, to invent and perform several sorts of work for the tabernacle. (Exod. xxxiii. 3.; xxxi. 3.) This may be called Ingenuity.

3. Wisdom is used for craft, cunning, and stratagem; whether good or evil. It is said, (Exod. i. 10.) that Pharaoh dealt wisely with the Israelites, when he oppressed them in Egypt. It is observed (2 Sam. xiii. 3.) of Jonadab, the friend of Ammon and nephew of David, that he was very wise, that is, very subtle and crafty. And Job says (v. 13.) that God taketh the wise in their own craftiness. This may be called Subtily.

4. Wisdom is taken for doctrine, learning, and experience. (Job xii. 2—12.) 'With the ancient is wisdom, and in length of days understanding.' This may be called Sagacity.

5. Scripture gives the name of wisdom sometimes to magicians, enchanter, fortune-tellers, soothsayers, and interpreters of dreams. This may be called Science.

6. Wisdom is put for eternal Wisdom, the Word, the Son of God. (Prov. iii. 19.) By Wisdom God established the heavens, and founded the earth; this Wisdom the Lord possessed 'from everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was.' (Prov. viii. 22, 23.) It existed before God created any thing, and was present with the Creator at his production of sensible beings.

The Book of WISDOM is an apocryphal book of Scripture, and is so called from the wise maxims and useful instructions which it contains. This book is commonly ascribed to king Solomon; either because the author imitated that king's manner of writing, or because he sometimes speaks in his name. It is certain, however, that Solomon was not the author of it; for it was not written in Hebrew, nor was it inserted in the Jewish canon, nor is the style like that of Solomon. Hence Jerome observes justly, that it savours much of Grecian eloquence; that it is composed with art and method, after the manner of the Greek philosophers; very different from that noble simplicity found in the Hebrew books. It has been attributed by many of the ancients to Philo, a Jew, but more ancient than him whose works are now extant. It is, however, commonly ascribed to an Hellenistic Jew, who lived since Ezra, and about the time of the Maccabees. It may be divided into two parts: the first is a description and encomium of wisdom; the second, beginning at the tenth chapter, is a long discourse, in the form of prayers, in which the author admires and extols the wisdom of God, and of those who honour him, and discovers the folly of the wicked, who have been the professed enemies of the good and virtuous in all ages of the world. Broughton's Histor. Diet. vol. ii. p. 512.

WORD, in Heb. דבר, Dabar; in Latin, Verbum, or Sermo; in Greek, ῥῆμα, Rhema, or λόγος, Logos. Sometimes Scripture ascribes to the Word of God certain supernatural effects; or represents it as animated and active: "He sent his Word and healed them."

Word is also consecrated and appropriated to signify the only Son of the Father, the uncreated Wisdom, the second person of the most Holy Trinity, equal and consubstantial to the Father. St. John the Evangelist, more expressly than any other, has opened to us the mystery of the Word of God, when he tells us, 'In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him, and without him was not any thing made that was made.' The Chaldee paraphrasts, the most ancient Jewish writers extant, generally use the name Memra, or Word, where Moses puts the name Jehovah. In effect, according to them, it was Memra who created the world; who appeared to Abraham in the plain of Mamre; and to Jacob at Bethel. It was Memra to whom Jacob appealed to witness the covenant between him and Laban. The same Word appeared to Moses at Sinai; gave the law to the Israelites; spoke face to face with that lawgiver; marched at the head of that people; enabled them to conquer nations, and was a consuming fire to all who violated the law of the Lord. All these characters, where the paraphrast uses the word Memra, clearly denote Almighty God. This Word, therefore, was God, and the Hebrews were of this opinion, at the time that the Targum was composed.

YEA

YEAR. The Hebrews had always years, of twelve months. But at the beginning, and in the time of Moses, they were solar years, of twelve months each, having thirty days to the month; but the twelfth month had thirty-five days. We see, by the reckoning of the days of the deluge, (Gen. vii.) that the Hebrew year consisted of three hundred and sixty-five days. It is supposed that they had an intercalary month at the end of one hundred and twenty years; at which time the beginning of their year would be out of its place full thirty days. But it must be owned that no mention is made in Scripture of the thirteenth month, or of any intercalation. It is probable that Moses retained the order of the Egyptian year, since he himself came out of Egypt, was born there, had been instructed and brought up there, and since the people of Israel had been long accustomed to this year. But the Egyptian year was solar, and consisted of twelve months of thirty days each, and had been so calculated for a very long time before.

After the time of Alexander the Great, and of the Grecians in Asia, the Jews reckoned by lunar months, chiefly in what related to religion, and to the festivals. St. John (Rev. xi. 2, 3; xii. 6. 14; xiii. 5.) assigns but twelve hundred and sixty days to three years and a half, that is, thirty days to every month, and three hundred and sixty days to a year. Maimonides tells us, that the years of the Jews were solar, and their months lunar. Since the completing of the Talmud, they use years purely lunar; having alternately a full month of thirty days, and a defective month of twenty-nine days. To accommodate this lunar year to the course of the sun, at the end of three years they intercalate a whole month after Adar; which intercalated month they call Ve-adar, that is, second Adar.

The civil year of the Hebrews has always begun at autumn, at the month Tisri (that is, September, and sometimes enters October, according as the lunations happen). But their sacred years, by which the festivals, assemblies, and other religious acts were regulated, begin in the spring at the month Nisan (March, and sometimes a part of April, according to the course of the moon).

Nothing is more equivocal among the ancients than the term year. The year always has been, and still is, a source of dispute among the learned; on account of its duration, its beginning, or its end. Some nations formerly made their year to consist of one month, some of four, some of six, some of ten, others of twelve. Some have made one year of winter, another of summer.

The beginning of the year was fixed sometimes at autumn, sometimes at spring, sometimes at mid-winter. Some used lunar, others solar months. Even the days have been differently divided; some beginning them at evening, others at morning, others at noon, others at midnight. With some the hours were equal, both in winter and summer; with others they were unequal. They counted twelve hours to the day, and twelve to the night. In summer, the hours of the day were longer than those of the night; on the contrary, in winter, the hours of the night were longer.

The Hebrews always reckoned by weeks, as a memorial of the creation of the world in seven days. They had weeks of seven years each, at the term of which was the sabbatical year; also weeks of seven times seven years, terminated by the year of jubilee; and finally, weeks of seven days.

'In some parts of the East,' says a late writer, 'the year ending on a certain day, any portion of the foregoing year is taken for a whole year: so that supposing a child to be born in the last week of our December, it would be reckoned one year old on the first day of January. This sounds like a strange solecism to us: a child not a week old, not a month old, is yet one year old! because born in the old year. If this mode of computation obtained among the Hebrews, the principle of it easily accounts for those anachronisms of single years or parts of years taken for whole ones, which occur in sacred writ; it eases the difficulties which concern the half years of several princes of Judah and Israel, in which the latter half of the deceased king's last year has hitherto been supposed to be added to the former half of his successor's first year.

'This mode of enumeration clears the phrase "three days," &c. where it occurs, reckoning as the entire first day whatever small portion of that day was included, even if only a quarter of it; and the same as to the third day; so that a few hours pass for a whole day in this case, as a few months or weeks pass for a whole year in the other case.

'We are told (1 Sam. xiii. 1.) 'a son of one year was Saul in his kingdom; and two years he reigned over Israel,' that is, say he was crowned in June; he was consequently one year old, as king, on the first of January following, though he had only reigned six months; the son of a year; but after this so following first of January he was in the second year of his reign, though according to our computation, the first year of his reign wanted some months of being completed: in this, his second year, he chose three thousand military &c. guards. The phrase (ἀπὸ διέτης) used to denote the age of the infants slaughtered at Bethlehem, (Matt. ii. 16.) 'from two years old and under,' is a difficulty which has been strongly felt by the learned. Some infants two weeks old, some two months, others two years, equally slain! Surely those born so long before could not possibly be included in the order, whose purpose was to destroy a child, certainly born within a few months. This is regulated at once, by the idea that they were all nearly of equal age, being recently born; some not long before the close of the old year, others a little time since the beginning of the new year. Now these born before the close of the old year, though only a few months, or weeks, would be reckoned not merely one year old, but also, in their second year, as the expression implies; and those born since the beginning of the year, would be well described by the phrase 'and under,' that is, under one year old;—some two years old, though not born a complete twelve-month, (perhaps, in fact, barely six months,) others under one year old, yet born three, four, or five months; and therefore, a very trifle younger, than those before described: 'according to the time which he had diligently inquired of the wise men.'—*In their second year, and UNDER. ZAC

ZACCHEUS Ζακχαῖος, signifies pure, clean; according to the Syriac, just or justified. Judas Maccabæus left Simon, Joseph, and Zaccheus, to besiege the sons of Bean, in two towers. (2 Macc. x. 19. 1 Macc. v. 4, 5,) in the year of the world 3840. But Simon's people being bribed with money, permitted some to escape. Judas put these traitors to death. It is not plain that Joseph, Simon, or Zaccheus, had share in this treachery.

ZACCHEUS, chief of the Publicans; that is, farmer-general of the revenue. (Luke xix. 1, 2, 3, &c.) A little before the death of our Saviour, when Jesus Christ passed through Jericho, Zaccheus greatly desired to see him, but could not, because of the multitude, and because he was low of stature. He therefore ran before, and climbed up into a sycamore tree. When Jesus came to that place, he lifted up his eyes, and said to him, Zaccheus make haste and come down; for to-day I must abide at thy house. Zaccheus immediately came down, and received him with much joy. Those who saw this murmured, and said within themselves, 'he is gone to be a guest with a man that is a sinner.' In the mean time, Zaccheus said to Jesus, 'Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor; and if I have taken any thing from any man by false accusation, I restore him four-fold.' The Roman laws condemned publicans, when convicted of extortion, to make restitution to four times the value.

Jesus Christ answered him, 'This day is salvation come to this house, forasmuch as he also is a son of Abraham.' This is all that the Scripture informs us of Zaccheus the publican. Some have thought that he was a Gentile before his conversion; but the opinion of commentators is, that he was a Jew: for many of this nation exercised the employment of a publican. Clemens Alexandrinus says, many did not distinguish Zaccheus from St. Matthew, pretending he was advanced to the apostleship after the death of Judas. Others have affirmed, that St. Peter ordained him bishop of Cesarea in Palestine. But it is probable they confounded him with another Zaccheus, bishop of this church, in the second century.

Notwithstanding the great disrepute of publicans or tax-gatherers, Zaccheus could not have acquired all his property by injustice, if one eighth part of it would have enabled him to make four-fold restitution: indeed, he seems rather to say that he had not wronged any, by his use of the particle if. Supplement. Addenda to Calmet's Dictionary of the Holy Bible.

ZACHARIAH, זכריה, signifies, memory of the Lord, or male of the Lord. Zachariah, king of Israel, succeeded his father Jeroboam II. in the year of the world 3220. He reigned but six months, and did evil in the sight of the Lord. (2 Kings xiv. 29.) Shallum, the son of Jabesh, conspired against him, killed him in public, and reigned in his stead. Thus was fulfilled what the Lord had foretold to Jehu, that his children should sit on the throne of Israel to the fourth generation. (2 Kings xv. 8—11.)

ZACHARIAH, son of Jehoiada, high-priest of the Jews; probably the Azariah of 1 Chron. vi. 10, 11. He was put to death by order of Joash, in the year of the world 3164. The Scripture observes, (2 Chron. xxiv. 21, 22.) 'Joash the king remembered not the kindness which Jehoiada, father of Zachariah, had done to him, but he slew his son: and when he died, he said, The Lord look upon it, and require it.' The year following God sent the army of Syria against Judah, which entered Jerusalem, slew the princes of the people, and sent a great booty to Damascus.

Several commentators are of opinion, that this is the Zacharias the son of Barachias, who, as our Saviour tells us (Matt. xxiii. 34, 35.) was slain by the Jews between the temple and the altar. See BARACHIAS.

ZACHARIAH, the eleventh of the lesser prophets. He was son of Barachiah, and grandson of Iddo. He returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, and began to prophesy in the second year of Darius, son of Hystaspes, in the year of the world 3484, in the eighth month of the holy year, and two months after Haggai. These two prophets, with united zeal, encouraged the people to resume the work of the temple, which had been discontinued for some years. (Ezra v. 1.) The time and place of the birth of Zachariah are unknown. Some think him to have been born at Babylon, during the captivity: others think at Jerusalem, before Judah and Benjamin were carried away. Some maintained that he was a priest: others, that he was no priest. Many say he was the son of Iddo; others, with much more reason, that he was the son of Barachiah, and grandson of Iddo. (Zech. i. 1.) He has been confounded with a Zachariah, the son of Barachias, contemporary with Isaiah (viii. 2.) and, with Zachariah, the father of John the Baptist; which opinion is plainly incongruous. He has been thought to be the Zachariah, son of Barachias, whom our Saviour mentions, as killed between the temple and the altar; though no such thing is any where said of this prophet. At the foot of Mount Olivet they show a tomb which they pretend belongs to the prophet Zachariah. Dorotheus maintains that he was buried in a place called Bethariah, an hundred and fifty furlongs from Jerusalem.

Zachariah begins his prophecy with an exhortation to the people to be converted to the Lord, and not to imitate the stubbornness of their fathers. In the fourth year of Darius, in the year of the world 3486, on the fourth day of the ninth month, the prophet was consulted by Sherezer, Regem-melech, and others, whether they ought to continue to fast on the fifth month, as they had hitherto done since the ruin of the temple? He answered, that these fasts were of their own invention; that what God chiefly required of them, was piety and justice, and that, finally, their days of fasting should be soon changed into days of joy and thanksgiving. He foretells, in a very express manner, the coming of Jesus Christ, a Saviour, poor, and sitting on an ass, and a colt, the foal of an ass. In the eleventh chapter he speaks of the war of the Romans against the Jews, of the breach of the covenant between God and his people; of thirty pieces of silver given for a recompense to the shepherd; of three shepherds put to death in one month, &c.

Zachariah is the longest and the most obscure of all the twelve minor prophets. His style is interrupted, and without connexion. His prophecies concerning the Messiah are more particular and express than those of the other prophets. Some modern critics, as Mede and Hammond, have been of opinion, that chap. ix. x. xi. of this prophet were written by Jeremiah; because, in Matthew (xxvii. 9, 10.) under the name of Jeremiah we find quoted Zach. (xi. 12.); and as the aforesaid chapters make but one continued discourse, they concluded from hence that all three belonged to Jeremiah. But it is much more natural to suppose that the name of Jeremiah, by some unlucky mistake, has slipped into the text of St. Matthew.

ZACHARIAH, the son of Barachiah, or Jeberechiah, mentioned in Isaiah, (viii. 2.); or according to Jerome, this is the prophet mentioned in the Chronicles, under the reign of Hezekiah, or rather under that of Azariah, or Uzziah, (2 Chron. xxvi. 5.): 'And he sought God in the days of Zachariah, who had understanding in the visions of God.' This Zachariah might live to the reign of Ahaz, in the year of the world 3262, when the Lord said to him, 'Take thee a great roll, and write in it with a man's pen, concerning Maher-shalal-hash-baz.' Isaiah adds, 'And I took unto me faithful witnesses to record, Uriah the priest, and Zachariah the son of Jeberechiah.'

ZACHARIAH, a priest of the family of Abia, father of John the Baptist, and husband to Elisabeth. (Luke i. 5. 12, &c.) This is what we are told in the Gospel: Zacharias and Elisabeth were both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless. And they had no child, because that Elisabeth was barren, and they both were now well stricken in years.' But in the year of the world 3999, about fifteen months before the birth of Jesus Christ, as Zachariah was waiting his week, and performing the functions of priest in the temple, 'according to the custom of the priest's office, his lot was to burn incense, when he went into the temple of the Lord,' on the altar of gold in the holy place. There the angel Gabriel appeared to him, and told him that his prayer was heard; and declared that his wife Elisabeth should bear a son, whom he should call by the name of John. Zachariah asked the angel how he was to be convinced of that, seeing both he and his wife were greatly advanced in years. The angel told him that he should be dumb, and not able to speak, until the time that this prophecy should be accomplished, because he believed not the Divine promise.

The people were waiting till Zachariah came forth out of the holy place; and they were surprised at his long delay. But when he came out he was not able to speak; by his making signs to them, they found that he had seen a vision, and was become dumb. When the days of his ministry were completed, that is, at the end of about a week, he returned to his own house; and his wife Elisabeth conceived a son, of whom she was happily delivered in due time. Her neighbours and kinsfolk assembled to congratulate her on this occasion; and on the eighth day they circumcised the child, calling his name Zachariah, after the name of his father; but Elisabeth then interposed, and said, No; his name is John. Then they desired a token from his father, how he would have him named; he making signs for a tablet, wrote on it, His name is John, which was a cause of admiration to all present. At this instant his mouth was opened, his tongue was loosed, and he spake, praising God. And Zachariah, being filled with the Holy Ghost, prophesied, by a canticle, which St. Luke has preserved. (chap. ii.) Some have thought that Zachariah, the father of the Baptist, was high-priest; but no more appears from St. Luke than that he was an ordinary priest.

ZA'DOK, צִדְקָה, signifies just, or justified. Zadok or Sadoc, son of Ahitub, high-priest of the Jews, of the race of Eleazar. From the time of Eli, the high-priesthood had been in the family of Ithamar, but was restored to the family of Eleazar, in the time of Saul, in the person of Zadok, who was put in the place of Ahimelech, slain by Saul, in the year of the world 2944. (1 Sam. xxii. 17, 18.) While Zadok performed the functions of the priesthood with Saul, Ahimelech performed it with David; so that till the reign of Solomon there were two high-priests in Israel: Zadok of the race of Eleazar, and Ahimelech of the race of Ithamar. (2 Sam. viii. 17.)

When David was forced to quit Jerusalem, on account of the rebellion of his son Absalom, Zadok and Abiathar would have accompanied him with the ark of the Lord. (2 Sam. xv. 24.) But David would not permit them. To Zadok, he said, O seer, return into the city with Ahimaaz your son, and let Abiathar and his son Jonathan return also. I will conceal myself in the country, till you send me news of what passes. Zadok and Abiathar returned therefore to Jerusalem; but their two sons Ahimaaz and Jonathan hid themselves near the fountain of Rogel: and when Hushai the friend of David had defeated the counsel of Ahithophel, they communicated this to David.

After the defeat of Absalom, David sent word to Abiathar and Zadok to persuade the elders of Judah to show their zeal for the king, by making haste to come, and invite his return into his metropolis. (2 Sam. xix. 11, 12.)

The high-priest, Zadok, did not engage in the party of Adonijah, who aspired at the kingdom to the exclusion of Solomon (1 Kings i. 5. 10, &c.); and David sent Zadok with Nathan, and the chief officers of his court, to give the royal unction to Solomon, and to proclaim him king instead of his father.

After the death of David, Solomon excluded Abiathar from the high-priesthood, because he had espoused the party of Adonijah, and made Zadok high-priest alone. (1 Kings ii. 35.) It is not very well known when he died; but his successor was his son Ahimaaz, who enjoyed the high-priesthood under Rehoboam.

ZAREPHATH, or SAREP'TA, צרפחה, signifies the narrows of the puffed cheek, or of bread; otherwise, blowing, or of the blowers; otherwise, the narrows of swelling, or of persuasion. Zarephath, or Sarepta, was a city of the Sidonians, between Tyre and Sidon, upon the coast of the Mediterranean Sea. It was remarkable for being the residence of the prophet Elijah, with a poor woman here, during a famine in the land of Israel. (1 Kings xvii. 9, 10.) In all probability it is, as Mr. Maundrell observes, the same as that now called Sarphan, distant about three hours' travel from Sidon towards Tyre. This writer says, that the place shown for this city consists at present only of a few houses on the tops of the mountains about half-a-mile from the sea. But it is more probable the principal part of the city stood below, in the space between the hills and the sea, there being ruins of considerable extent still seen in that place. Wells's Geography of the Old and New Testament, vol. ii. p. 165.

ZEBO'IM, צבאים, signifies young of sheep or goats; otherwise fair, or exemplary; otherwise, puffed up; or from the Syriac, volunteers. Zeboim was one of the four cities of Pentapolis, consumed by fire from Heaven. (Gen. xix. 24.) Eusebius and Jerome speak of Zeboim, as of a city extant in their time, on the western shore of the Dead Sea. Therefore, after the time of Lot and Abraham, a city must have been re-built near where Zeboim was before. The valley of Zeboim is mentioned (1 Sam. xiii. 18.) also Zeboim a city of Benjamin. (Nehem. xi. 34.)

ZEB'ULUN, זבולון, signifies to endow; otherwise dwelling, habitation. Zebulun, or Zabulon, the sixth son of Jacob and Leah.

(Gen. xxx. 20.) He was born in Mesopotamia, about the year of the world 2256. His sons were Sered, Elon, and Jahleel. (Gen. xlv. 14.) Moses acquaints us with no particulars of his life; but Jacob, in his last blessing, said of Zebulun, (Gen. xlix. 13.) 'Zebulun shall dwell at the haven of the sea, and he shall be for a haven of ships, and his border shall be unto Zidon.' His portion extended along the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, one end of it bordering on this sea, and the other on the Sea of Tiberias. (Josh. xix. 10, &c.) In the last words of Moses, he joins Zebulun and Issachar together; saying, (Deut. xxxiii. 18.) 'Rejoice, Zebulun, in thy going out, and Issachar in thy tents. They shall call the people unto the mountain, there they shall offer sacrifices of righteousness. For they shall suck of the abundance of the seas, and of treasures hid in the sand.' Meaning that these two tribes being at the greatest distance north, should come together to the temple at Jerusalem, to the holy mountain, and should bring with them such of the other tribes as dwelt in their way; and that being situated on the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, they should apply themselves to trade and navigation, and to the melting of metals and glass, denoted by those words, 'Treasures hid in the sand.' The river Belus, whose sand was very fit for making glass, was in this tribe.

When the tribe of Zebulun left Egypt, it had for its chief Eliab, the son of Elon, and comprehended 57,400 men able to bear arms. (Numb. i. 9-30.) In another review, thirty-nine years afterwards, this tribe amounted to 60,500 men, of age to bear arms. (Numb. xxvi. 26, 27.) The tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali distinguished themselves in the war of Barak and Deborah against Sisera, the general of the armies of Jabin. (Judg. iv. 5, 6. 10.; v. 4. 14.) It is thought these tribes were the first carried into captivity beyond the Euphrates, by Pul, and Tiglath-pileser, kings of Assyria. (1 Chron. v. 26.) They had also the advantage of hearing and seeing Jesus Christ in their country, oftener and longer than any other of the tribes. (Isaiah ix. 1. Matt. iv. 13. 15.)

ZEBULON, a city of Asher, (Josh. xix. 27.) but, probably, afterwards yielded to Zebulun, whence it took its name. It was not far from Ptolemais, since Josephus makes the length of Lower Galilee to be from Tiberias to Ptolemais. Elon, the judge of Israel, was of the tribe of Zebulun, and was buried in this city. (Judg. xii. 12.)

ZEDEKIAH, צדקיהו, signifies the Lord is my justice, or the justice of the Lord. Zedekiah or Mattaniah, was the last king of Judah before the captivity of Babylon. He was the son of Josiah, and uncle to Jehoiachin his predecessor. (2 Kings xxiv. 17.

19.) When Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem, he carried Jehoiachin to Babylon, with his wives, children, officers, and the best artificers in Judea, and put in his place his uncle Mattaniah, whose name he changed into Zedekiah, and made him promise, with an oath, that he would continue in fidelity to him, in the year of the world 3405. (2 Chron. xxxvi. 13. Ezek. xvii. 12, 14, 18.) He was twenty-one years old when he began to reign at Jerusalem, and he reigned there eleven years. He did evil in the sight of the Lord, committing the same crimes as Jehoiakim. (2 Kings xxiv. 18, 19, 20. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 11, 12, 13.) He regarded not the menaces of the prophet Jeremiah, from the Lord; but hardened his heart. The princes of the people, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, imitated his impiety, and abandoned themselves to all the abominations of the Gentiles.

In the first year of his reign, Zedekiah sent to Babylon Elasah, the son of Shaphan, and Gemariah, the son of Hilkiyah, probably to carry his tribute to Nebuchadnezzar. By these messengers Jeremiah sent a letter to the captives at Babylon. (Jer. xxix. 1—23.) Four years afterwards, either Zedekiah went thither himself, or at least he sent thither; for the Hebrew text may admit either of these interpretations. (Jer. li. 59. Baruch i. 1. Jer. xxxii. 12.) The chief design of this deputation was to entreat Nebuchadnezzar to return the sacred vessels of the temple. (Baruch i. 8.) In the ninth year of his reign, he revolted against Nebuchadnezzar. (2 Kings xxv. 1, 2, 3.) It was a sabbatical year, in which the people should set their slaves at liberty, according to the law. (Exod. xxi. 2. Deut. xv. 1, 2, 12. Jer. xxxiv. 8, 9, 10.) Then king Nebuchadnezzar marched his army against Zedekiah, and took all the fortified places of his kingdom, except Lachish, Azekah, and Jerusalem.

He sat down before Jerusalem on the tenth day of the tenth month of the holy year (which answers to our January.) Some time afterwards, Pharaoh Hophrah, king of Egypt, marched to assist Zedekiah. (Jer. xxxvii. 3, 4, 5, 10.) Nebuchadnezzar left Jerusalem, and went to meet him, defeated him, and obliged him to return into Egypt; after which he resumed the siege of Jerusalem. In the mean while the people of Jerusalem, as if freed from the fear of Nebuchadnezzar, retook the slaves whom they had set at liberty, which drew upon them great reproaches and threatenings from Jeremiah. (xxxiv. 11, 22.) During the siege, Zedekiah often consulted Jeremiah, who advised him to surrender, and pronounced the greatest woes against him, if he should persist in his rebellion. (Jer. xxxvii. 3, 10.) But this unfortunate prince had neither patience to hear, nor resolution to follow, good counsels. In the eleventh year of Zedekiah, on the ninth day of the fourth month, (July) Jerusalem was taken. (2 Kings xxv. 2, 3, 4. Jer. xxxix. 2, 3.; lii. 5, 6, 7.) Zedekiah and his people endeavoured to escape by favour of the night, but the Chaldean troops pursuing them, they were overtaken in the plains of Jericho.

He was taken, and carried to Nebuchadnezzar, then at Riblah, a city of Syria. The king of Chaldea reproaching him with his perfidy, caused all his children to be slain before his face, and his eyes to be put out; then loading him with chains of brass, he ordered him to be sent to Babylon. (2 Kings xxv. 4—7. Jer. xxxii. 4—7.; lii. 4—11.) Thus were accomplished two prophecies which seem contradictory: one of Jeremiah, who said, that Zedekiah should see, and yet not see Nebuchadnezzar with his eyes (Jer. xxxii. 4, 5.; xxxiv. 3.); and the other of Ezekiel, (xii. 13.) which intimated that he should not see Babylon, though he should die there. The year of his death is not known. Jeremiah had assured him (Jer. xxxiv. 4, 5.) that he should die in peace, that his body should be burned, as those of the kings of Judah usually were; and that they should mourn for him, saying, Ah, lord!

ZEPHANIAH, צפניה, signifies the Lord is my secret, or the secret of the Lord, or the north of the Lord. Zephaniah, son of Maaseiah; called (2 Kings xxv. 18.) the second priest, while the high-priest Seraiah performed the functions of the high-priesthood, and was the first priest. It is thought Zephaniah was his deputy, to discharge the duty when the high-priest was sick, or when any other accident hindered him from performing his office. After the taking of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, Seraiah and Zaphaniah were taken and sent to Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah, who caused them to be put to death, in the year of the world 3416. Zephaniah was sent more than once by Zedekiah, to consult Jeremiah. (Jer. xxi. 1.; xxxvii. 3.) We know not whether Josiah and Hen, (Zech. vi. 10, 14.) were sons of this Zephaniah, or of some other.

ZEPHANIAH, son of Cushi, and grandson of Gedaliah, was of the tribe of Simeon, according to Epiphanius, and of Mount Sarabata, a place not mentioned in Scripture. The Jews are of opinion, that the ancestors of Zephaniah, recited at the beginning of his prophecy, were all prophets themselves. Some have pretended, without any foundation, that he was of an illustrious family. We have no exact knowledge, either of his actions, or the time of his death. He lived under king Josiah, who began to reign in the year of the world 3363. The description that Zephaniah gives of the disorders of Judah leads us to judge, that he prophesied before the eighteenth year of Josiah; that is, before this prince had reformed the abuses and corruptions of his dominions. (2 Kings xxii. 3. 10. 12.) Besides, he foretells the destruction of Nineveh, (Zeph. ii. 13.) which could not fall out before the sixteenth year of Josiah, by allowing, with Berosus, twenty-one years to the reign of Nabopolassar over the Chaldeans. Therefore, we must necessarily place the beginning of Zephaniah's prophecy early in the reign of Josiah.

This prophet denounces the judgments of God against the idolatry and sins of his countrymen, and exhorts them to repentance; he predicts the punishment of the Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, and Ethiopians, and foretells the destruction of Nineveh; he again inveighs against the corruptions of Jerusalem, and with his threats, mixes promises of future favour and prosperity to his people, whose recall from their dispersion shall glorify the name of God throughout the world. The style of Zephaniah is poetical; but it is not distinguished by any peculiar elegance or beauty, though generally animated and impressive. Bishop Tomline's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. i. pp. 127, 128.

ZERUBABEL, זרובבל, signifies, banned, or a stranger at Babylon. Zerubabel, or Zorobabel, was son of Salathiel, of the royal race of David. St. Matthew (i. 12.) and Chronicles (1 Chron. iii. 17. 19.) make Jeconiah king of Judah, to be father to Salathiel; but they do not agree as to the father of Zerubbabel. The Chronicles say Pedaiah was father of Zerubbabel; but St. Matthew, St. Luke, Ezra, and Haggai, constantly make Salathiel his father. We must therefore take the name of son in the sense of grandson, and say that Salathiel having educated Zerubbabel, he was always afterwards looked upon as his father. Some think that Zerubbabel had also the name of Sheshbazzar, and that he had this name in Ezra (i. 8.). Zerubbabel returned to Jerusalem long before the reign of Darius, son of Hystaspes. He returned at the beginning of the reign of Cyrus, in the year of the world 3468, fifteen years before Darius.

Cyrus committed to his care the sacred vessels of the temple, with which he returned to Jerusalem. (Ezra i. 14.) He is always named first, as being the chief of the Jews that returned to their own country. (Ezra ii. 2.; iii. 8.; v. 2.) He laid the foundations of the temple, (Ezra iii. 8. 9. Zech. iv. 9, &c.) and restored the worship of the Lord, and the usual sacrifices. When the Samaritans offered to assist in rebuilding the temple, Zerubbabel and the principal men of Judah refused them this honour, since Cyrus had granted his commission to the Jews only. (Ezra iv. 2. 3.)

ZI'BA, זיבא, signifies army, fight, strength, flag. Ziba was a servant to Saul. (2 Sam. ix. 2, 3, &c.) King David having resolved to show kindness to some descendants of Saul, for the sake of Jonathan, he asked Ziba if there was any remaining of his house? Ziba mentioned one of Jonathan's sons named Mephibosheth, who was lame, and dwelt at the house of Machir, at Lodebar. David sent for him, and gave him the privilege of his table all the rest of his life. He said to Ziba, I have given to Mephibosheth all that belonged to Saul; therefore make the best of his estate, that your master may have a sufficient subsistence. Ziba replied, My lord, your servant will obey your commands; and Mephibosheth shall be served at my table, when he shall please to be there, as one of the king's sons. Now Ziba had fifteen sons and twenty servants, who were employed to attend Mephibosheth, and to make the best of his estate. But Mephibosheth ate at the king's table, though he dwelt with Ziba.

Some years after, (2 Sam. xvi. 1, 2, &c.) when David was expelled from Jerusalem by his son Absalom, Ziba went to meet David, with two asses loaded with provisions. The king asked him, What do you mean by these? Ziba answered, The asses are to mount some of the king's officers, and the provisions are for those that attend you. David then asked him, Where is Mephibosheth? Ziba replied, He continues at Jerusalem, saying, The house of Israel will now restore me to the kingdom of my father. The king then said to Ziba, I will give you all that belongs to Mephibosheth.

After the defeat of Absalom, Ziba came to meet the king, with his fifteen sons and twenty servants. Mephibosheth also came to meet the king, and in such a plight as sufficiently showed his trouble for the king's absence. For, from the time of David's flight, he had neither washed his feet, nor trimmed his beard, nor taken any care of his dress. David asked him, Mephibosheth, why did not you go with me, but stay at Jerusalem? Mephibosheth replied, My lord, my servant Ziba deceived me, for being, as you know, lame of my feet, I bid him prepare me an ass, to follow you; but, instead of that, he went himself to accuse me falsely. The king interrupted him, and said, Say no more. What I have determined shall stand; you and Ziba divide the estate.

ZO'AR, זואר, ζοωρά, σοχώρ, σηχώρ, signifies small, or poor. Zoar, or Bela, was a city of Pentapolis, on the southern extremity of the Dead Sea. It was intended, as the other five cities, to be consumed by fire from Heaven; but at the intercession of Lot, it was preserved. (Gen. xiv. 2.) It was called Bela before; but when Lot desired of the angel that he might take refuge in it, and often insisted on the smallness of this city, it had the name Zoar, which in Hebrew signifies small, or little.

ZUZIM, זוזים, ἑθνη ἰσχυρά, signifies posts of a door; otherwise, splendour, beauty; otherwise, revolters, according to the Syriac. The Zuzim were certain giants who dwelt beyond Jordan, and who were conquered by Chedorlaomer and his allies, in the year of the world 2079. (Gen. xiv. 5.) The Vulgate and the Septuagint say they were conquered with the Rephaim in Ashteroth-karnaim. The Chaldee interpreters have taken Zuzim in the sense of an appellative, for stout and valiant men; and the Septuagint have rendered the word Zuzim ἑθνη ἰσχυρά, that is, robust nations. Calmet is of opinion that the Zuzim are the same with the Zamzumim.
